French Revolution.

CHAPTER I.

Events which led to the Overthrow of Monarchy in France.

BEFORE we treat of the memorable French Revolution, which was the cause of such long and sanguinary wars between Europe and France, we shall briefly enumerate those events which rendered monarchy disgusting to the French nation. That despotism, by which the Gallic race had been for ages oppressed, and for which the unfortunate Louis XVI. suffered, may be justly said to originate with the reign of Charles VII. The victories of this monarch rendered him acceptable to the people; but, availing himself of that popularity, he became absolute, and was the first king of France who, by his own royal edicts, and without the concurrence of the States-general of the kingdom, levied subsidies whenever he thought proper. Then "the will of the king is the will of the law," was the doctrine held out by the French lawyers, and by the corrupt sentiments of a sycophantic tribe, this maxim was established. During the reign of his successor, Louis XI. these innovations were reduced to a regular system, and tyranny became formidable. The ministry of Richelieu considered the crown of France independent both of the nobles and the people, and a series of enormous taxes were imposed by his successor, Mazarine. The reign of Louis XIV. though remarkable for grandeur, was equally so for oppression: the revenue was expended for useless pageantry, while the happiness of the people was totally neglected. During the minority of Louis XV. the government devolved upon ignorant agents, who adopted temporary expedients for the removal of present embarrassments, without making any provision for future exigencies. The monarch, after he had attained manhood, assisted in corrupting the manners of the court by his degenerate example. The wars and dissipation of this reign contributed to harass the nation, particularly as they led to arbitrary measures. Personal liberty became insecure by means of sudden arrests, under the authority of lettres de cachet; religious opinions were subject to grievous persecutions; and the people were irritated by an odious tax, called in that country Gabelle. The spirit of resistance was occasionally displayed, but immediately subdued, not having sufficient strength at that time to render it efficacious. The parliament opposed the king's proceedings, for which the members were, at length, severally arrested, and a new tribunal was created in the room of the exiled parliament, composed of men entirely devoted to the court. Not the monarch only became the object of reproach and execration at the time, but even the monarchy itself, though the French nation had been for ages attached to this form of government. The king, at length, fell a martyr to his debaucheries, and he was interred without pomp or ceremony. Under these unpleasant circumstances Louis XVI. succeeded his grandfather, when only twenty years of age. While dauphin, he had conducted himself with such propriety, that the French fondly expected their new sovereign would terminate all their grievances. The young monarch, immediately on his accession, selected for his prime minister and adviser the Count de Maurepas, who had been thirty years in exile. Desirous of recommending himself to the favor of his subjects, he dismissed those who were obnoxious to the people, and restored their ancient parliaments. The first meeting of this assembly took place amid unbounded acclamations. As the new monarch was of a disposition pacific and unambitious, his speech, and the recal of parliament, must, from its imperious style, be considered not his own, but that of advisers, who, probably, found that condescension would be attended with danger. In this speech he told the parliament "that he was determined to preserve his authority in all its plenitude; that the king, his grandfather, was compelled, by their resistance to his repeated commands, to adopt such measures as his wisdom suggested; and that, as he had thought proper to recal them to the exercise of those functions which they ought never to have quitted, he desired them to learn to prize his favors, and never to lose the remembrance of their extent." A royal ordinance was then read, containing the various limitations by which the monarch thought proper to restrain the authority of that assembly; and he concluded with a promise of his royal protection and countenance, as long as they conformed to what he had prescribed.

In the year 1770 (four years before he came to the throne), Louis XVI. had married Maria Antoinette, daughter of Maria Theresa, and sister to Joseph II. emperor of Germany. While some describe her as a woman of high spirit, busy, bold, and blind to consequence, others paint her as a princess of great dignity of mind, and of an excellent capacity. The views of the minister, M. de Maurepas, who wished to preserve his own, and the public repose, were assiduously directed to the extension of commerce, and the re-establishment of the French marine. Turgot was soon after placed at the head of the finances, and exhibited so much probity, and strict economy, as rendered his administration truly laudable. The king expressed the highest approbation of his conduct, in a letter, dated April 15, 1776, which rendered the dismissal of this able minister the more remarkable; but it was solicited, and obtained by the queen, to whose entreaties not only in this, but in other instances, the king too readily acceded. Others ascribe his dismissal to the bigotry and selfishness of the clergy and nobles, who oppressed the people by severe exactions of tithes and services, whilst they themselves refused to contribute towards the burdens of the state. The abolition of these immunities, and a general toleration, had been recommended to the king by M. Turgot, a measure which was even countenanced by his brother-in-law, Joseph II.; but he was deterred from following this salutary counsel.

The administration of finances was next confided to M. Clugny, who, during the short space of six months, in which he remained in office, exhibited proofs of the most flagrant corruption and profusion. On his death M. Taboureaux succeeded; but he was quickly superseded by M. Necker, a Genevan protestant, who undoubtedly possessed, in many respects, great merit, though far inferior to his illustrious predecessor, M. Turgot.

When the unhappy contest took place between Great Britain and her colonies, France, though already involved in debts and difficulties, gave her assistance to America, and the French and American forces acted in conjunction for nearly six years. The expences of the civil, military, and naval establishments, and the extravagance which had so long pervaded all the departments of the French government, exceeded the ability of M. Necker to counteract. He had entertained the romantic, but benevolent idea, of defraying the expences of war without imposing on the people new taxes. He had raised loans on the annual savings obtained by a reduction of the public expenditure; but that reduction not being real, the revenue continued to be forestalled from year to year, and the ruin of the Caisse d'Escompte was the consequence of its reliance on paper transactions with the government. The plan of this celebrated financier being impracticable, the addition of debt contracted during the war was of serious magnitude; and, at the era of the peace, M. Necker was removed from his office (May, 1781) through the machinations of M. Maurepas, a few months previous to the decease of that minister.

After a short interval, in which M. Pleury and M. d'Ormesson filled, in succession, that difficult station, M. Calonne was appointed, November, 1783. This man, notwithstanding his great talents, was so immersed in dissipation and intrigue that he was neither capable nor desirous of reforming the abuses of government. His projects proved unsuccessful and abortive. In the latter end of the year 1785, a loan of 3,330,000*l.* being the acknowledged deficit of the current year, was negociated, which the parliament of Paris, after repeated remonstrances, at last registered, in obedience to the king's positive commands; at the same time accompanying it with a resolution, importing "that public economy was the only genuine source of revenue; and the means of providing for the necessities of the state, and of restoring that credit which borrowing had reduced to the brink of ruin." The minister, perceiving the impossibility of obtaining the concurrence of parliament to the measures he had in contemplation, had recourse to the practice of former reigns, and solicited the monarch to convene an assembly of the most considerable and enlightened persons in the kingdom, under the denomination of Notables, by whose influence he might be able to effect a reformation. The king readily acceded, and summonses were issued for the meeting at Versailles. This convention, consisting of 144 persons, among whom were seven princes of the blood, nine dukes and peers of France, eight field-mareschals, eight counsellors of state, and eleven bishops and archbishops, accordingly took place February 22, 1787, and was opened in great state by the king in person. The royal speech was followed by a long and elaborate harangue from M. de Calonne, who ascribed the pecuniary embarrassments of the state to the administration of M. Necker. There is no doubt but the patriotic professions of the king and his minister were, at this time, sincere; but notwithstanding the admirable adroitness of the latter, the notables displayed a refractory disposition, and contributed in no degree towards removing the national difficulties. The public clamor rising high against M. de Calonne, whom it was now the fashion to style a profligate and extravagant minister, he was exiled by the king to his estate at Lorraine; and so great was the inveterate rage and odium of his enemies, that he soon after found it expedient to take refuge in foreign parts. He was succeeded, after a short interval, by M. Lomenie de Brienne, archbishop of Toulouse, a leading member of the assembly of notables, and of great popularity for his patriotism. On the 25th of May, 1787, the assembly of notables was dissolved.

Unfortunately, the patriotism of the Archbishop of Toulouse, on his elevation to the post of minister, seemed to vanish; and consequently, losing the confidence of the people, he deprived himself of the power of being serviceable to the king. Recourse was again had to the parliaments of Paris; and, on the 12th of June, an edict was sent to the body for enregistry, imposing a heavy duty on stamps. The parliament demanded the communication of such documents as should enable them to judge of the necessity of introducing new taxes. The refusal of this demand produced a refusal on their parts to enregister the edict. The stamp-act was pronounced more dangerous than even the exploded Gabelle. The king, reserving to a future day the declaration of his intentions respecting the stamp-tax, transmitted to them a new edict of far greater importance, for commuting the existing vingtièmes into a regular and equal land-tax; but, as the danger became more imminent, the parliament became more intrepid, and the States-general were loudly called for.

A royal message was suddenly delivered, announcing the intention of the king to hold a bed of justice. The parliament immediately re-assembled, and several resolutions passed, expressive of their determined resistance. The bed of justice, a very unpopular measure, and seldom resorted to in the most despotic times, was however held, August 6, 1787; and, in spite of the resolutions, which were read by the president, the edicts were forcibly enregistered. The parliament, though defeated, was not subdued; for, on the following day, the members entered a formal protest against the proceedings, declaring the edicts null and void; and that he who should presume to carry them into execution, should be adjudged a traitor, and condemned to the galleys.

So great were the apprehensions of government at this time, that great numbers of the military were assembled at Paris, and the members of the courts of justice were obliged to pass to their sittings through armed ranks of soldiers with bayonets fixed. August 13, 1787, lettres de cachet were issued against the parliament of Paris, transferring their sittings to Troyes, in Champagne, 100 miles from the capital. Previous to their exile they drew up an animated remonstrance, and almost all the public bodies in the kingdom joined in boldly petitioning the throne for the recall of that assembly and the convocation of the States-general. The parliament of Grenoble declared "the rights of property to be equally sacred and secured by the same laws as the right of the king to the throne;" and the parliament of Besançon, in reprobating the emission of the lettres de cachet, scrupled not to say, "that the Parisian magistrates should not have obeyed them."

The minister, alarmed at his critical situation, advised the king to recall the parliament and suspend the execution of the obnoxious edicts. On the 19th of September, letters of revocation were accordingly issued, and the parliament was permitted to resume its functions. Discontents however prevailed; the treasury was exhausted; and though several economical regulations had taken place in the royal household, still the public expenditure required an extraordinary supply. The plan proposed by the minister was that of a series of loans, amounting in the aggregate to about eighteen millions sterling, for five successive years, at the end of which time he engaged the honor of the sovereign that the States-general should be convoked. This proposal was treated with scorn, as the promised convocation could at that time be of no utility. It was therefore resolved to hold a séance royale, that the matter should be debated in the presence of the king previous to the enregistry. Notwithstanding the presence of the sovereign, the debates were, on the 14th of November, conducted not only with freedom but with violence. The discussion continued for nine hours, when his majesty suddenly arose and commanded the edicts to be immediately registered. This was unexpectedly opposed by the Duke of Orleans, first prince of the blood; who, conceiving the royal mandate an infringement of the rights of parliament, protested against the whole proceedings of the day as being thereby null and void. The king repeated his orders, and, quitting the assembly in anger, departed for Versailles. The duke, on the king's departure, formally recorded his dissent, and the parliament passed a resolution abjuring every sort of concern in the enregistry that had then taken place. On the following day the Duke of Orleans received a letter, commanding him to retire to his chateau in the country, accompanied only by his family. The members, Sahatiere and M. Futeau, who had distinguished themselves in the debate, were, under the authority of lettres de cachet, sent to different prisons; and, by express command of the king, the resolution of parliament was erased from their records.

A remonstrance against these violent proceedings was presented to the king from the parliament, who expressed their astonishment and concern that a prince of the blood was exiled, and two of their members imprisoned for having, at a time when his majesty said he came to take the sense of the assembly, declared what their duty and consciences dictated. The king, in his answer to this remonstrance, forbade them to publish any further deliberations on the subject.

In order to supersede the existing parliaments, the minister had recourse to another wild project. A supreme court, by the name of Cour Pleniére, was to be established, consisting of members to be nominated by the king, and to be vested with the power of enregistering the royal edicts. The dernier resort excited the indignation of the public. The parliament called loudly for the States-general to be assembled; and this appeal to the paramount authority rendered the parliament the idol of the people. The court still prosecuted its nefarious designs, and orders were issued for arresting Messrs. D'Espremenil and Monsambert, two celebrated counsellors and patriotic members of the parliament. A party of the military, surrounding the seat of justice at midnight, demanded the immediate surrender of the two magistrates. This act of despotism occasioned the following animated address from the parliament to the king, delivered May 7, 1788.

"Sire,

"Your Parliament is confirmed, by every proceeding, of the entire innovation which is aimed at in the system of monarchy. At the moment even when your Parliament were offering their suspicions and remonstrances at the foot of the throne, an act of absolute authority is exercised in your name against two magistrates, whose conduct is irreproachable, and who should rather deserve your Majesty's protection for their support of the rights of monarchy. At the time, that the deputies of Parliament were soliciting an audience at the foot of the throne, which public circumstances seemed to require, the seat of sovereign justice was invested by a body of armed people, who committed acts of violence in the middle of the night, and at the time your Parliament were sitting.

"Your Majesty has been advised not to receive the deputation of your Parliament, because you had not been made acquainted with their coming by a special message. The efforts that have been made to conceal truth from your knowledge, but too plainly indicate the changes in the constitution which the enemies of magistracy have endeavoured to effect since 1771, and which they flatter themselves to attain by a specious plausibility. Your Majesty, in summoning your Parliament to the throne, was about to conciliate the love of your people by a measure so conformable to ancient practice. But, Sire, the French nation will never adopt the despotic measures to which you are advised, and whose effects alarm the most faithful of your magistrates. We shall not repeat all the unfortunate circumstances which afflict us; we shall only represent to you, with respectful firmness, that the fundamental laws of the kingdom must not be trampled on, and that your authority can only be esteemed so long as it is tempered with justice. It is the interest of the nation which has determined each and every member not to take any part, either as a body or as individuals, in any functions which may be the consequences of new regulations; nor will they assist in any measures which are not the unanimous resolutions of Parliament, endowed with all its privileges. Such is the nature of the French monarchy; and we beseech your Majesty not to suffer apparent or momentary advantages to divert your attention, as they only produce unhappy consequences. This objection is of such importance to the public tranquillity, that the consideration of it absorbs every other sentiment, and scarcely leaves us power to beseech your justice in favor of the two magistrates who have been recently torn from us, attended by circumstances which we dare not describe. Your Majesty will sooner or later discover the justice of our representations; and, in whatever situation your parliament may find itself, it will feel the pleasing and conscious satisfaction of having used its best endeavours for the service of the King and the nation."

On the same day the king had addressed the assembly of notables in these words:

"It is now twelve months past, that my Parliament of Paris has continued to commit the greatest excesses. Its members have not only endeavoured to place themselves on a level with my authority, but they have even dared to assert, that no act had force if not enregistered. They have declared that they were not obliged to do it, although the nation suffered by their refusal. The provincial parliaments have followed their example in their pretensions and undertakings. The consequences have been, that the most necessary laws have not been executed,—that all the most useful operations of government have been stopped, and that public credit is diminished, justice has been suspended, and in short, that the national tranquillity is overthrown. The suppression of those excesses is what I owe to my subjects, to myself, and to my successors. I might have punished them, but I rather choose to prevent their effects. I have been obliged to punish a few of the magistrates; but, though it was indispensable, I have done it with reluctance. I will not then annihilate my parliament; but I will bring them back to their duty, and the limits of their institution. I mean to avail myself of converting this momentary tempest to a salutary epocha for my people, to begin the reformation of judicial proceedings by the tribunals on which they are to be founded; to procure justice to be rendered in a more expeditious and less expensive manner; to entrust the nation with the exercise of its lawful rights, which ought always to be conciliated to mine. I will moreover establish, in every part of my kingdom, that unity of system, without which a great state is always weakened by the number and extent of its territories. The order I mean to maintain is not new—there was but one parliament when Philip the Fair fixed it at Paris. A large state should have but one king, one law, and one power, to enregister acts. Tribunals, with a limited power, shall superintend the majority of law-suits; the parliament, those of more important consequences; a single court of judicature, for the deposit of all the common law of the kingdom, and which shall be charged with its enregistrement. In short, a general assembly of the states to assemble not only once, but every time that the state of affairs shall require it. Such is the restoration which my love for my people has prepared, and consecrated this day for their happiness, which is my only desire. My keeper of the seals will deliver you my intention more at length."

To the remonstrance which the parliament of Paris had delivered, the king thus replied on the 9th of May:—

"Gentlemen, I made you yesterday acquainted with my will, and now I call you together again to confirm it. I shall continue to persist in the execution of a plan which has for its object the general tranquillity of the kingdom, and the welfare of my people. I rely on your zeal and fidelity for the good of my service, when I shall have fixed on proper persons to compose my supreme assembly. I shall call you together before the ordinary time of your sitting, if the good of the service and the necessity of the state require it."

His majesty had, on the preceding day, presented a number of edicts to be registered: among these was one for the establishment of the cour plénière, and another for the diminution of the members of the parliament of Paris from 120 to 67, as had been done by Louis XI. The parliament of Paris protested against these measures, declaring their determination not to assist in any supreme court about to be instituted. In defiance of this declaration a bed of justice was held, and the edict for the establishment of the cour plénière forcibly enregistered. Violent commotions now ensued. The first president of the parliament, in the name of that assembly, informed the king, that the parliament would acknowledge no authority which infringed on the complete exercise of their prerogatives. The parliament of Rouen announced the edicts in question to be null and void, and all persons assisting in the execution of them to be traitors to the nation. Lettres de cachet were immediately executed against them. The parliaments of Rheims, Grenoble, and Metz, were, for their patriotic endeavours, ordered into banishment. National deliberations were thus suspended by an armed force; but this violence was opposed by the parliament of Paris, who thus addressed the throne on the 16th of May:—

"May it therefore please your majesty to consider, it is the duty of your parliament to watch over the people's wants, and the rights of the sovereign; the people may be misled by factious men, and kings are too much exposed to dangerous surprises. Parliament, Sire, will speak of liberty to monarchs, and recommend submission to subjects. They render that submission honorable by their example, and that authority solid by their principles. In short, the most essential function of your majesty's parliament is, to summon the royal power to the standard of justice, and public liberty to the oath of allegiance. Such, Sire, have been their patriot views, and the object of their unremitted zeal, in the most severe and turbulent times.

"Still animated by the same sentiments, and ever jealous to deserve the good-will of our gracious monarch, and insure the liberty of our fellow-citizens; we come to point out, at the foot of the throne, the fatal error that would seduce the heart of a sovereign; we come to invoke your majesty's justice, wisdom, and humanity, against the pernicious employing of lettres de cachet. At this terrible word all hearts shudder, all ideas are clouded with horror. The individuals seized with these dreadful symptoms, look with amazement at one another, and, afraid of explaining themselves, remain in a state of inaction. The people in silence scarce dare to lift their thoughts to that inconceivable power, which disposes of men without hearing or judging them; that plunges and keeps them at pleasure in total darkness, whither the cheerful light of day never enters no more than the reviving aspect of the law, the cry of nature, or the voice of friendship; to that power that for existence depends on mystery, and derives its title from force alone; to a power exercised with impunity by the ministers of state, their deputies, and the agents of the police; to a power, in short, which from the prime minister to the very inferior officers of the police, lays over our heads an endless chain of formidable oppressors, before whom remain silent and inactive the sacred laws of nature, and those of the constitution. No, Sire, the laws of nature, and the laws of the constitution, shall never reproach your parliament (the living law at the foot of the throne) with having stood shamefully inactive, and with having preserved a guilty silence.

"Man was born free, and his happiness depends on justice. Liberty is an inproscriptible right. It consists in the power of living suitably to the tenor of the laws; justice is an universal duty, and this duty is anterior to the laws themselves that acknowledge it, and ought to guide it, but never to dispense with it in the monarch or the subject. Justice and liberty! This, Sire, is the principle and end of all society, the stable and immovable foundation of all power; and such is, for the happiness of mankind, the wonderful connection of these two inestimable blessings, that no reasonable authority, no solid obedience, can ever subsist without them. The practice of lettres de cachet overturns all this system. Justice thereby becomes mere illusion, and liberty retains but the name. Such a practice is repugnant to reason, and contrary to the orders of the state; the motives alleged in order to authorise

BOOK I.

CHAP. I.

1787.

it, are but pretences, clearly refuted by examples. It must certainly be repugnant to reason, since it evidently is to the nature of man, to that of royalty, and to the primitive notions of morality. Such are the essential characters of lettres de cachet.

"The nature of man is not that of being independent. Independence to him is a state of war; force and cunning are by turns his predominant passions; and justice divested of sanction is divested of power. The nature of man is, therefore, a propensity to join his fellow-creatures, and to live in society, under the restriction of certain general rules, named the laws. But all rules, conventions, or agreements, that constrain, without protecting him, could no longer be termed laws, but fetters. Force may prepare them, it is true, and weakness or folly may wear them; but force does not oblige, and weakness and folly cannot engage themselves. All lawful submission is voluntary in its principle; a guilty citizen has consented beforehand to the sentence that condemns him. Were some men to say to others, 'Exercise an arbitrary power over us; we give our consent, that the tribunals be without power, and the laws of no use; a word from your mouth, a signature from your hand, shall deprive us of our liberty, of our goods, of our wives, of our children, of the very right of defending ourselves;' were some men to hold such language, they would certainly pass for madmen. The people's consent, therefore, to the power of using lettres de cachet, is incompatible with the use of reason; reason is the natural state of man, as well as of society; the practice, therefore, of such lettres, is repugnant to the nature of man, both as a rational and a social being. Will they say that this practice is founded on the nature of monarchical power?

"The answer could easily be found. Kings reign either in virtue of conquest, or by law: if the conqueror abuses his conquest; if he strikes at the rights of man; if the conquest is not changed into capitulation, force, that disposes of the fruits of victory, does not retain subjects at the conqueror's feet, but slaves. Whatever reason forbids the people to consent to, kings have it not in their power to ordain. Besides, how could reason bear to see the whole system of morality overturned? The tutelary maxims of mankind happily want no proofs. They support themselves by their own evidence. It is evident that justice must equally hold the scales between the poor and the rich; and it is evident that shame and punishment are due to the guilty, and to them alone. If there existed a power that could interrupt the course of laws, and partially defend the guilty, by preserving the one and abandoning the others, it is evident that this power, in compromising justice in the punishments she has already pronounced, would add to the idea of a precedent, that likewise of preference: and if the preference granted by this power were to be constantly reserved for a particular class of citizens, and refused to all others, it is evident that the law not allowed to punish such and such a crime, but such and such a class of society, would invariably keep in a state of terror and disgrace all those classes that are proscribed, without any regard for innocence or justice. The application of these incontestable marks is very opposite to the practice of lettres de cachet. Two men, for instance, meet; one is weak, the other strong; one poor, the other rich; the poor may say to himself,—"If this man offends me, if he attacks my honour, my liberty, my life, the laws assure me that they will grant me their support—the laws deceive me—authority may dispose of it otherwise—authority will prevail—but, should I offend him, I shall be pursued, imprisoned, abandoned, dishonored, punished;—this very authority will be silent for me; these very laws inexorable. Where then is justice? Is misery a crime? Is humanity alone no longer a title? A poor man friendless, without any credit, is he no longer a citizen?

"The orders of the state are no less contrary to the practice of lettres de cachet, than the principles themselves. Ambition, revenge, flattery, and avidity, in a word, the most violent and the most abject passions, have besieged at all times the monarch's throne; but at all times, too, the laws have forewarned the sovereign, and protected the subjects, and if not with equal success, at least with equal energy; and this continual struggle of arbitrary power against liberty, has not prevented liberty from triumphing in the people's and the monarch's minds. The last states of Blois have intreated his majesty to confine the use of lettres de cachet to those who had the honor to dine at his royal mansion, not to seclude them from their occupations, or deprive them of their household goods, and of their families, but to prevent their being admitted into the palace of his royal presence, without depriving them, however, of his justice. It is a maxim in our monarchy, that no citizen can become a prisoner without an order from the judge. All the kings of the two first races have acknowledged it. Hugues Capet found it at his accession to the throne. All orders and decrees issued under the third race have confirmed it. It is this maxim that became the foundation of the only distinction we find in our laws between the prisoners for crimes and those for debts; and the clause in the edict of 1670, agreeable in this point to all the preceding ones, has stamped it with the seal of validity, by requiring that prisoners for crimes should be examined within twenty-four-hours after imprisonment; but how ineffectual such a wise disposition, how ridiculous such a precaution, as long as the practice of lettres de cachet shall subsist!

"Thus the rights of mankind, the fundamental principles of society, the most brilliant lights of reason, the dearest interests of the lawful power, the elementary maxims of morality, the laws of the constitution; all, in short, unanimously rise against the practice of lettres de cachet. By what fatality, Sire, has it been introduced and continued in your dominions? We are not astonished to see that men, jealous of a transitory, but personal power, and greedy, ambitious courtiers, regardless of time to come, should color this practice with the specious motives of public safety, or of the tranquillity and honor of many families; the servile mind follows the train of ambition with avidity; but that there should be citizens blind enough not to see, in every letter they solicit or acquiesce in, the dreadful danger that awaits them, fills us really with the greatest astonishment, and causes in our breast the deepest affliction. It is time to combat an error set off with the appearance of disinterestedness; it might make an impression on the mind and heart of your majesty.

"Evidence wants but few words. The interest of those who choose to be inactive, out of temper, or resentful in the place they enjoy, does not by any means contribute to the public safety. Public safety has two certain bases; the terror of wickedness, and the shelter of innocence. The terror of wickedness, the more exalted it is; and the shelter of innocence, in proportion to its weakness.

"We have had the honor to prove to your majesty, that the use of the lettres de cachet is positively contrived for abetting the powerful criminal, and intimidating the feeble innocent.

"Where no personal security exists, public safety is but an imaginary bliss; and where the practice of lettres de cachet subsists, personal security cannot exist; public safety is then but an imaginary bliss, when the practice of lettres de cachet subsists. If there are circumstances, Sire, that require the sudden exercise of your authority, there are none that can authorise the secret detention of a prisoner who solicits his trial; there are none that can prevent his claim to justice; not his silence itself, nor even his formal consent to the loss of his liberty, could be sufficient to do it.

"Your majesty's answer, in 1777, has given an indelible sanction to these national maxims. You declare, Sire, that you will never suffer any attacks on the liberty of your subjects; but there are circumstances in which public safety requires that your authority should appear in support of justice, to prevent a culprit's evasion. How remarkable and how comforting were these words for the cause of justice: they conciliated liberty with power; and it is thus that your majesty has fixed upon this point, and, with your own words, the principle, the object, and the limits of your power.

"The honor and tranquillity of a family is the last objection to the abolition of the practice of lettres de cachet; but they do not reflect that this objection, the grand battery of the partisans for arbitrary power, owes all its pretended consequence to the lettres themselves, the practice of which, once admitted, destroys honor itself, and arms it against liberty.

"Your parliament, Sire, will agree, that the prejudice may exist; but they will never agree that a false prejudice of honor should, for the sake of a few individuals, be contrary to reason, and affect the public interest, our morals, and our laws. And, if it should please your majesty, after having permitted the law to act indiscriminately on the guilty, without any distinction of rank or birth, to send for their relations at your court, to employ them in your tribunals, in your councils, and in your armies, would any person dare to say that a prejudice, that is subsisted and nourished only by success, would resist so noble and so august an example?

"Many facts, pretty well known, can prove to your majesty that the nation, more sensible of their true interest, even in the most elevated spheres, are disposed to receive from you hands the greatest blessing a monarch can bestow on his subjects, the gift of liberty: it is a blessing that renders authority more firm, and the laws more endearing. It is this blessing which nobly rewards virtue, encourages the aspiring genius, and puts a bridle on turbulent licentiousness: this your parliament come to reclaim, Sire, in the name of a generous and faithful nation. They most respectfully entreat you to abolish, for ever, the use of lettres de cachet. They conjure you effectually to reject all ambitious counsels, and frivolous motives; and that per-fidious intelligence, which is as much disowned by reason, as it is refuted by facts. How cruel! that your majesty cannot enter into the minute details of such intelligence, generally made up by subaltern officers, on some pretence always kept secret, or on informations always clandestine. Oh! Sire, could you but interrogate those victims of arbitrary power, confined, abandoned, and forgotten, in those impenetrable dungeons, where silence and injustice ever dwell, how many of them would you find who never threatened to disturb the tranquillity of the state, nor ever meant to dishonor the respectable name of their family? Unhappy victims! soon would your majesty be convinced that intrigue, avidity, lust of power, thirst of revenge, the dread or hate of justice, humour, caprice, and the mere whim of a man of credit, preside by turns at the distribution of lettres de cachet. You would then know to what torments is condemned the wretch for whom the sun rises without any hopes, and the night returns without any repose. Terrible uncertainty! despondency worse than death! and all these horrors in the name of majesty! Yes, Sire, were you but to behold the dreadful mansions of sorrow, you would stand aghast at the cruel fate of your subjects; you would shudder at the condition of princes themselves; and you would hasten to destroy those invisible arrows that strike at justice, both when aiming at the innocent and guilty.

"Animated by this hope, and founded on these principles, your parliament, Sire, after having sued for the liberty of the nation, cannot help soliciting, once more, for that of the three citizens. We have authority to believe, that the Duke of Orleans and Messrs. Freteau and Sabatier are not guilty. Were they so, the right of judging them is reserved to your parliament, and the charming prerogative of pardoning, to your majesty.

"Liberty is by no means a privilege, but a right. It is the duty of all governments to respect that right. The same force that deprives a deliberating assembly of their members, affects the whole body. Some are arrested, others are threatened, none are free. A deliberating assembly, deprived of their freedom, threatened by force if they still continue to deliberate, and rising above fear, can be supported only by their fidelity.

"This virtue, Sire, has not forsaken your parliament. They will not cease to solicit, in a very respectful manner, the blessing of public liberty, by the abolition of lettres de cachet, and the personal liberty of that august prince, the first of the blood royal, and of the two exiled magistrates. But it is no longer a prince of your blood, nor two magistrates, that your parliament claims now in the name of the laws, and of reason: it is three French individuals—three men."

Monarchs, who implicitly confide in ministers, frequently become the dupes of their advisers, who seldom feel an interest in their happiness, or in the prosperity of the nation. The plan of coercion, which was so shamefully adopted on this occasion, must be ascribed to M. de Brienne; for, when the king was left to pursue his own inclinations, he never hesitated to adopt conciliatory measures. The courage of the prime minister totally failed him, and he now left the king to act as he pleased. Suddenly an order of council was published, August 8, fixing the convocation of the states to the 1st of May, 1789, and suspending, during the interval, the institution of the cour plénière. The Duke of Orleans was recalled, and the exiled members permitted to return to the capital. A second arrêt of council was promulgated, August 16, avowing the inability of the court to answer the ordinary demands upon the treasury, and directing the payments to be made in the proportion of three-fifths in money, and two-fifths in notes, due at the end of the year, and bearing an interest of 5 per cent. This apparent bankruptcy occasioned much consternation; and M. de Brienne, after an administration of little more than a year, was obliged to resign his office. M. Necker, the favorite of the people, was, for the second time, placed at the head of the finances, and the immediate embarrassments of government were removed by the adoption of wise measures. At the earnest entreaty of the minister, the king consented to the convocation of the states-general; and, on the 5th of October, a second convention of the notables was held, when a debate took place, relative to the mode of forming that assembly. It was the general wish that it should be constructed on the model of the last assembly, in 1614. The notables were dissolved December 12; and, by a decree of council, dated December 27, the final decision of the court was made known. It was determined, that the number of deputies to the ensuing states-general should not be under 1000; that it should be apportioned, with all possible accuracy, to the population and financial contributions of the different buildings; and that the representation of the tiers état, or commons, should be equal to the sum of the representations of the other two orders, the nobles and clergy. This arrangement was highly satisfactory to the people, but by no means agreeable to the nobles and clergy, who were extremely mortified at being rendered only equal to the tiers état. During the time of the elections, the spirit of discontent and tumult, which prevailed in France, was considerably augmented by a scarcity of provisions. To alleviate this public distress, the king ordered the profits of a lottery (amounting to twelve hundred thousand livres) to be distributed among the unhappy sufferers; and the benevolence of the Duke of Orleans was also extensive on the occasion.

The period at length arrived which the people fondly hoped would terminate all their disorders. The assembly of the states-general met at Versailles on the 5th of May, 1789, a day ever memorable in the annals of France and of the world. The ceremony commenced with an act of devotion; the representatives of the nation, preceded by the ministers of the altar, and followed by the king, repaired to the temple of the Deity, amidst an immense crowd, who were sincerely praying that their honest endeavours might reform and regenerate the state. The splendor and variety of the robes of two of the orders rendered the spectacle extremely brilliant: for the dignified clergy were adorned with scarfa, crosses, and crosiers; while the nobles were decorated, as in the days of chivalry, with flowing mantles, covered with lace: plumes of feathers waving in the air, stars and ribbons, added to the grandeur of the scene. The commons, on whom the people chiefly relied, seemed to affect simplicity, the members appearing in plain clothes, surmounted by short woollen cloaks. After a long and tedious ceremonial, the king, who was seated in a magnificent alcove, with the queen on his left hand, and the princes and princesses of the blood around him, opened the session with a speech, in which he remarked, "the public spirit is in a ferment, but an assembly of the representatives of the nation will certainly hearken to no other counsels than those founded on justice and wisdom. Whatever may be expected from the most tender solicitude for the public good, whatever can be asked from a sovereign, the sincerest friend of his people, you may, you ought to hope from me." How different in style is this speech from those which the king had lately delivered by the advice of his other minister! It was listened to with profound attention, and hailed with repeated bursts of applause. The keeper of the seals followed, and enlarged on the advantages of a limited government, equally remote from absolute monarchy on the one hand, and anarchy and republicanism on the other. M. Necker succeeded the keeper of the seals, in a speech of great length, in which he wished to direct the attention of the Assembly principally to the state of the finances, which he allowed to be deranged, but stated the actual deficit not to exceed fifty-six millions of French livres. Some disputes arose between the respective orders respecting the verification of their powers. The tiers état insisted, to the astonishment of the clergy and nobles, that this ceremony could only take place in a common assembly, voting not by orders but by poll. This was resisted in the strongest manner by the superior orders, as a flagrant usurpation. The Commons plainly perceived that the ancient mode of voting by orders would reduce them—the real representatives of the people—to mere cyphers. After six weeks' inaction, the Abbé Sieyès prevailed upon the Commons to put an end to the dispute by altering their style; and for this purpose he moved, "That they should declare themselves the representatives of the nation, and that the other two orders should be considered in no other light than as deputies of corporations, who could only have a deliberate voice when they assembled in a national character with the national representatives." This measure was adopted unanimously on the 17th of June, and the tiers état took the daring and decisive step of declaring itself the legislative body by the appellation of the NATIONAL ASSEMBLY. This was the dawn of the forthcoming revolution. All opposition to the decree of June 17 was looked upon as a sort of rebellion, and on the 19th, the Chamber of the Clergy passed a resolution imparting their acquiescence in the decision.

The king, persuaded by the nobles and part of the clergy, held a royal session on the 23d of June, and the three orders were summoned to attend as if no dispute had happened. They all met in the great hall as on the first day of the convention; the nobles and some of the clergy entered at the great gate, the same as his majesty, and were seated at their ease in the chief places assigned to them; while the representatives of the people were obliged to squeeze in at a back door, and were detained many hours in the rain till their superiors were seated! The speech which the king was advised to deliver on this occasion was not in the least calculated to give satisfaction to the nation. After lamenting the disputes that had taken place, his majesty insisted on maintaining the distinction of orders, and annulled the celebrated decree by which the commons had declared themselves the national assembly. He at the same time alluded to the benefits which he was preparing to confer on his people; but nothing positive was said relative to the liberty of the press, or the participation of the States-general in the enactment of laws; on the other hand, he hinted at the retention of the most unpopular of all the prerogatives claimed by the crown, that of lettres de cachet—subject however to certain restrictions; and the continuance of the tyrannical privileges arising out of the feudal incidents, the most cruel of all the restraints to which any nation can be subjected. When the king retired, he was followed by the superior orders, while the commons, who had, with silent indignation, listened to the royal command, that they should immediately break up and repair to their respective chambers, remained motionless on the benches. An awful silence ensued. The Marquis de Brezé, grand master of the ceremonies, then approached, and addressing the president, M. Bailly, said, "Sir, you know the orders of the king." M. Mirabeau, a member who had greatly distinguished himself by his talents and eloquence, started up and replied, "We know, for we have heard what they have suggested to the king; but how dare you, who have neither seat nor voice here, bring his discourse to our recollection? Go, tell your master that we are here by the power of the people, and that nothing shall expel us but the bayonet." Hereupon the hall resounded with acclamations, "Nothing but force shall drive us hence!" A resolution then passed, declaring the person of each deputy inviolable.

The king's conduct on this occasion may be ascribed to the Duke of Luxembourg, who alarmed his majesty by predicting, "that from the day the states should vote by numbers only, from that moment he was at their mercy." The national assembly still resumed their sittings, and were joined by a majority of the clergy and forty-nine members of the nobility, with the Duke of Orleans at their head. M. Necker still advising his majesty to adopt conciliatory measures, at length prevailed upon him to countenance a union; and, at the express instance of the king, all the remaining members of the superior orders joined the assembly on the 27th of June. The royal family were now hailed with acclamations of gratitude, and a general illumination terminated this happy day.

Louis was evidently bewildered by the different sentiments of his advisers, which rendered his decrees contradictory and inconsistent. Notwithstanding these appearances of cordiality, orders had been for some time issued by the court to collect a large body of troops. An army of 35,000 men were stationed, under the command of Marshal Broglie, in the vicinity of Versailles and Paris. Camps were marked out for a still greater force, and lines of fortification drawn. Neither party dealt with sincerity: some of the assembly intended to convert the monarchy into a republic; while the court was resolved never to grant all that liberty which had been promised. The capital, ever jealous of the latter, began to be alarmed at the formidable preparations which were made. A spirited remonstrance was presented to the king by the assembly, requesting, or rather insisting upon the removal of the troops. This his majesty peremptorily refused, but declared his willingness to indulge the assembly by a removal of their sittings to Noyon or Soissons. When this answer was reported, M. Mirabeau observed, "Certainly there is no need to deliberate on the removal proposed. We will go neither to Noyon nor to Soissons. We have not demanded this permission; nor will we, because we do not desire to place ourselves between the troops which invest Paris and those which might fall upon us from Flanders or Alsace. We have demanded the removal of the troops; we have not asked permission to flee before them."

Great numbers of the troops, however, in consequence of their long residence in, and connection with, the capital, became the friends of the people, and were for days and nights entertained in the Palais Royal, the residence of the Duke of Orleans, where the people frequently assembled in great multitudes. This prince of the blood and his adherents expended an amazing fortune in acquiring popularity, by the accomplishment of a revolution, which, in the end, proved their destruction. Among this cabal was Marquis de Valadi, an officer who had served in the French guards, and had imbibed in America the principles of republicanism. This gentleman was a warm admirer of the new cause of liberty, and never failed by his orations to spread the seeds of disaffection.

Necker, the only minister on whom either the nation or its representatives had any reliance, was suddenly dismissed on the 11th of July, and ordered to depart the kingdom in twenty-four hours, and with him his friend M. Montmorin, minister for foreign affairs. In the disgrace of M. Necker the assembly saw their own ruin determined; and they passed a resolution, that the late ministers carried with them the confidence and regret of the people. The new administration consisted of De Bretenil, Foulon, La Galesière, La Porte, and the Marshal de Broglio, all of whom were considered as the decided advocates of the ancient despotism, and who were no doubt the advisers of this unpopular change.

Such were the events which rendered monarchy disgusting to the French nation; yet it must be confessed, that Louis XVI. was not more arbitrary than many of his predecessors. In those reigns, however, the parliaments of France were submissive, and the ready tools of government; but in this reign they had imbibed a spirit of freedom, and were resolute; while the king, tenacious of his authoritative sway, was doomed to encounter their resentment. A revolution was advancing with rapid strides, chiefly promoted by the extreme embarrassments of the national finances, and the publications of the rival ministers, Necker and Calonne, which disclosed secrets that proved ruinous to monarchy, though it had been upheld for fourteen centuries, and brought at last the successor of sixty-eight kings to an untimely end.

CHAPTER II.

The Revolution of France and Downfall of Monarchy.

A most astonishing insurrection paved the way for the revolution of France. The Bastile and several subordinate prisons had always opened their massy gates in obedience to the commands of an absolute monarch. A circumstance at length occurred which occasioned the demolition of them. The national assembly in vain endeavored to set aside the lettres de cachet; but the citizens of Paris effected this purpose by the destruction of the Bastile. This castle was carried by storm on the 14th of July, the soldiery refusing to obey the orders of their officers, and many joining the assailants; the unhappy prisoners were released in triumph; instruments of torture were dragged from the dungeons, and publicly exposed; and the air resounded with acclamations of vengeance. Various reports were spread respecting the manner in which this fortress was destroyed; and, in order to justify this act of violence, alarming, but unfounded, rumours were circulated, of the intentions of the court.

Although these events occurred at seven in the afternoon, they were industriously concealed from the king, till the Duke de Liancourt repaired to his chamber at midnight, and made him acquainted with the dangerous state of the capital.

It is said, Marshal Broglio, immediately after the storming of the Bastile, proposed to escort the king to Metz, with the royal family. The Archbishop of Aix, at the same time, advised that military force should be employed against the insurgents; after which, the States-general might be dissolved: and the petitions and denunciation, which this sapient prelate supposed would be sent from every quarter against them, would render it unnecessary to assemble them again. The astonished and intimidated monarch, however, resolved to throw himself upon the national assembly for protection. The next day he accordingly appeared before them, and declared that he had issued orders for the immediate removal of the troops. This declaration occasioned universal joy, and it was now hoped that Louis, sensible of the evil counsels by which he had been deceived or misled, would be more circumspect for the future, and never again deviate from political rectitude.

The king was now hailed as the deliverer of his people. His whole manner, indeed, seemed to be changed. M. Necker and Count Montmorin were immediately reinstated in their offices. Marshal Broglio, the Prince of Condé, and other leaders of the court faction, were compelled to seek for safety in flight. Count d'Artois, one of the king's brothers, having been informed that a price was set upon his head, made his escape during the night, with his two sons. The same prudence that induced the king to visit the national assembly, prompted him to visit the capital, and he made his triumphal entry into Paris on the 17th of July. The conduct of Louis, on this occasion, displayed considerable prudence and benevolence; he seemed to indulge all the wishes of the people; and his conciliatory manners produced such an effect upon the multitude, that, when he appeared at one of the windows, a general acclamation of "Vive le Roi" resounded from all quarters, notwithstanding the petty efforts of some malignant beings, who mixed with the crowd for the purpose of exciting hatred against him.

The national assembly now pursued their labors without interruption, and in a short time several very important decrees, containing the first principles of the new constitution, importing the subordination of the executive, the supremacy of the legislative, and the independency of the judicial powers, were presented for the royal acceptance. The general principles on which the government of the kingdom was modelled, were comprehended in the following declaration of rights:—

"The representatives of the French people, formed into a national assembly, considering that ignorance, forgetfulness, or contempt of the rights of men, are the sole causes of public grievances, and of the corruption of government; have resolved to exhibit in a solemn declaration, the natural, unalienable, and sacred rights of man, in order that this declaration, ever present to all the members of the SOCIAL BODY, may incessantly remind them of their rights and of their duties; to the end, that the acts of the legislative power and those of the executive power, being able to be every moment compared with the end of all political institutions, may acquire the more respect; in order also, that the remonstrances of the citizens, founded henceforward on simple and incontestible principles, may ever tend to maintain the constitution, and to promote the general good.

"For this reason, the national assembly recognizes, and declares, in the presence, and under the auspices of, the Supreme Being, the following rights of men and of citizens:

1. Men were born, and always continue, free, and equal in respect to their rights; civil distinctions, therefore, can be only founded on public utility.

2. The end of all political associations is the preservation of the natural and imprescriptible rights of man: and these rights are liberty, property, security, and the resistance of oppression.

3. The nation is essentially the source of all sovereignty; nor can any individual, or any body of men, be entitled to any authority which is not expressly derived from it.

4. Political liberty consists in the power of doing whatever doth not injure another. The exercise of the natural rights of every man, has no other limits than those which are necessary to secure to every other man the free exercise of the same rights; and these limits are determinable alone by the law.

5. The law ought only to prohibit actions hurtful to society. What is not prohibited by the law should not be hindered; nor should any one be compelled to that which the law does not require.

6. The law is an expression of the will of the community. All citizens have a right to concur, either personally or by their representatives, in its formation. It should be the same to all, whether it protects or punishes; and all being equal in its sight, are equally eligible to honors, places, and employments, according to their different abilities, without any other distinction than that created by their virtues and talents.

7. No man should be accused, arrested, or held in confinement, except in cases determined by the law, and according to the forms which it has prescribed. All who promote, solicit, execute, or cause to be executed, arbitrary orders, ought to be punished: and every citizen called upon or apprehended by virtue of the law, ought immediately to obey, and he renders himself culpable by resistance.

8. The law ought to impose no other penalties than such as are absolutely and evidently necessary: and no one ought to be punished but in virtue of a law promulgated before the offence, and legally applied.

9. Every man being presumed innocent until he has been convicted, whenever his detention becomes indispensable, all rigor to him, more than is necessary to secure his person, ought to be provided against by the law.

10. No man ought to be molested on account of his opinions, not even on account of his religious opinions, provided his avowal of them does not disturb the public order established by the law.

11. The unrestrained communication of thoughts and opinions being one of the most precious rights of man, every citizen may speak, write, and publish freely, provided he is responsible for the abuse of his liberty, in cases determined by the law.

12. A public force being necessary to give security to the rights of men and citizens, that force is instituted for the benefit of the community, and BOOK I. not for the particular benefit of the persons to whom it is intrusted.

CHAP. II.
1790. 13. A common contribution being necessary for the support of the public force, and for defraying the other expences of government, it ought to be divided equally among the members of the community, according to their abilities.

14. Every citizen has a right, either by himself or his representative, to a free voice in determining the necessity of public contributions, the appropriation of them, and their amount, mode of assessment, and duration.

15. Every community has a right to command of all its agents an account of their conduct.

16. Every community, in which a separation of powers, and a security of rights is not provided for, lacks a constitution.

17. The right to property being inviolable and sacred, no one ought to be deprived of it, except in cases of evident public necessity, legally ascertained, and on condition of a previous just indemnity.

"The national assembly, desirous of establishing the French constitution on the principles which it has just now recognised and declared, abolishes irrevocably those institutions which are injurious to liberty, and equality of rights.

"There is no longer any nobility, nor peerage, nor hereditary distinctions, nor difference of orders, nor feudal governments, nor patrimonial jurisdiction, nor any of the titles, denominations, and prerogatives, which are derived from them; nor any of the orders of chivalry, corporations, or decorations, for which proofs of nobility were required: nor any kind of superiority but that of public functionaries, in the exercise of their functions.

"No public office is henceforth hereditary or purchaseable.

"No part of the nation, nor any individual, can henceforth possess any privilege or exception from the common rights of all Frenchmen.

"There are no more wardenships or corporations in professions, arts, or trades.

"The law recognizes no longer any religious vows, nor any other engagement which would be contrary to natural rights, or to the constitution."

After a delay of some weeks, the royal assent was given to the new constitution, with an express salvo for the ancient, essential, and constitutional prerogatives of the crown.

Another popular insurrection took place, no less extraordinary than the former. The friends of the court had been unfortunate enough to afford the factious leaders an opportunity of exciting a great degree of agitation amongst their followers, by a feast that was given at Versailles to the officers of a regiment lately arrived, at which, in the hours of merriment, they expressed a strong aversion to the conduct of the revolution. The king and queen were prevailed upon to present the dauphin to this party, and the visit was received with such raptures of enthusiastic loyalty, that some improper words and actions took place, which, no doubt, in the hours of sobriety, they would themselves have condemned. The members of the assembly reprobated these proceedings; they declared the national cockade had been trampled on; and Mirabeau accused the queen of encouraging these outrages. A sudden nocturnal attack was, on the 6th of October, made on the palace of Versailles, by a furious mob. The queen was attacked in her bed-chamber, which was only defended by a single centinel, who had scarcely time to call out "Save the queen!" before he was trampled under foot. The streaming heads of two of the life-guards were carried on pikes before the royal coach; and, with wanton cries of "Give us bread!" they assailed their majesties' ears. The king and queen, thus made captives, were conducted to Paris, where the palace of the Thuilleries, secured by a strong military guard, was assigned them for their future residence. The royal family looked upon themselves as splendid prisoners, and it was owing to this violence that the articles of the constitution were immediately and unconditionally accepted. The national assembly removed their sittings to Paris, and prosecuted their labors with unwearied diligence.

The first step ministers took was the abolition of a duty of nearly sixpence on a single pound of salt, a tax which was abhorred by the people, and which the king had been anxious to repeal.

A decree had passed the assembly, imposing an oath upon the whole body of the clergy "to maintain, to the utmost of their power, the new constitution of France, and particularly the decrees relative to the civic constitution of the clergy." The pope, by a bull, denounced the sentence of excommunication against those of the clergy who took the civic oath, which was not only obnoxious, but productive of the most pernicious consequences. The decree itself had been opposed in the assembly by the principal speakers of the côté droit with considerable ability and eloquence. The nonjuring clergy were not only deprived of their benefices, but subjected to heavy penalties for non-compliance, and numerous emigrations of this unfortunate class of men consequently took place.

M. Necker having applied in vain for the loan of thirty millions of livres, finding his measures thwarted and opposed by the more popular leaders of the assembly, and equally destitute of the confidence of the court, sent in his resignation, September, 1790, and, such was the inconstancy of popular regard, that he was suffered to depart without a single expression of regret.

On the 22d of Jan. 1791, the king commuicated to the assembly a letter from Leopold, King of Hungary, now advanced to the dignity of emperor, containing strong protestations of amity towards France; but intimating, that to consolidate that friendship, the revocation of the decree of August, 1790, which annihilated all feudal and seignorial rights, would be necessary. The assembly, on this occasion, voted a large augmentation of military force, regardless of the king's declaration, that the emperor had, in this instance, merely acted officially. At the latter end of this month the king notified to M. Boullé, that he hoped to accomplish his departure from Paris in the course of two or three months.

On the 18th of April, 1791, the king undertook to reside with his family at St. Cloud, a palace at a short distance, to spend the Easter holidays. The monarch was, perhaps, desirous of ascertaining whether he was a prisoner or not; and, if a prisoner, of seeing the length of his chain.—Scarcely was the journey begun, when the royal travellers were stopped by the mob, and forced to return. The king repaired to the assembly on the following day, to complain of this outrage. They heard him with apparent respect, and tacitly censured the proceeding, by passing a decree to authorize the prosecution of his journey.

On the night of June 20, the king, queen, dauphin, and Princess Elizabeth, sister to the king, also the Count and Countess de Provence, suddenly disappeared. Monsieur and madame took the road to Mons; the rest of the royal family that of Montmedî. Louis left behind him a paper, in which he revoked all his past oaths and declarations, as the effect of compulsion. This paper also prohibited the ministers from signing any order; and enjoined the keeper of the seals to send them to him, when required in his behalf. About nine o'clock in the morning of the next day the news was publicly known, and all Paris was in the greatest confusion. The national assembly met early, and the president delivered the intelligence; upon which M. Montmorin, the minister for foreign affairs, was ordered under arrest, upon suspicion of having assisted the escape of the family. Couriers were dispatched to all the departments, with orders to arrest every one who should attempt to quit the kingdom, and to seize property of every kind that might be found crossing the frontiers. Very severe decrees were passed against those who had assisted in rescuing the king; and an address was got ready, to assure the country at large that the assembly would maintain their posts with firmness and energy.

Two days having been spent in fruitless conjecture, a messenger arrived at the bar of the assembly, with news that the royal family had been arrested at Varennes, and were detained in custody there, till the orders of the representatives of the people should be known.

The assembly thought it necessary to have the chief instrument of the detention of the royal fugitives brought before them, by a deputation of the municipality of Paris. He began his recital by stating that his name was Drouet, that he was formerly a dragoon in the regiment of Condé, but was actually post-master of St. Menesbould. On the 21st of June, at half-past seven in the evening, two carriages and eleven horses stopped to bait at his house. He thought he recognized the queen; and, seeing a man at the back part of the carriage, his curiosity led him to examine him closely, when the resemblance of the countenance, with the effigy of the king on an assignat of fifty livres, was so apparent, that he no longer doubted. These carriages were escorted by a detachment of dragoons, which succeeded a detachment of hussars, under the idea of protecting treasure. The escort excited his suspicion; but, being alone, and fearful of causing a premature alarm, he suffered the carriages to depart; and then, by a cross road, arrived at the next stage before them, and had the national guard called out, to stop the carriages.

Three commissioners were appointed to escort the prisoners to Paris; and they took every proper means, upon this occasion, to prevent their majesties being exposed to the brutal attacks of the multitude.

When measures were taken for guarding the palace with greater strictness, a commission was appointed to examine the royal fugitives as to the motives of their flight; upon which Louis declared that he did not desire to conceal them. The king stated, that his reasons for undertaking the journey arose from the insults to which he and his family had been constantly exposed, not only on the 18th of April, but since that period, which led him to judge that he could not safely continue in Paris, where every branch of his house, and particularly the queen, was daily insulted. He chose to leave it at midnight, to avoid interruption, but he had no intention of passing the frontiers. He meant to reside for a short time at Montmedî; because, being a fortified place, he could have been visited by his family without molestation.

The queen's vindication was simple and natural; she declared, that as her husband had resolved to remove himself and family, she could not possibly admit the thought of separating from him and her children; and both added, that their attendants knew not of their intention till they had got their orders to depart.

When the constitution was completed, it was given to the king for his acceptance; and he not only accepted it as it stood, but entered into its merits, and pointed out deficiencies, anxious to see those parts which he approved accompanied by others that should be worthy of them. He stated a variety of reasons that had induced him to desire a reform of abuses, which he had discovered soon after the commencement of his reign; and concluded his address with the following manly and paternal observation, for the consideration of the assembly:—

“I accept then the constitution: I engage to maintain it at home, to defend it against attacks from abroad, and to cause it to be executed by all the means which it puts into my power.

“While I shall faithfully employ all the means that are entrusted to me, no reproach can be laid on me; and the nation, whose interest alone ought to be the supreme rule, will explain itself by those means which the constitution has reserved to it.

“But, gentlemen, for the security of liberty, for the individual happiness of all Frenchmen, there are interests in which an imperious duty prescribes to us to combine all our efforts; these interests are—respect for the laws, the re-establishment of order, and the re-union of all the citizens. Now that the constitution is definitively settled, Frenchmen living under the same laws ought to know no enemies but those who infringe them. Discord and anarchy are our common enemies: I will oppose them with all my power. It is necessary that you and your successors second me with energy, that the law may equally protect all those who submit their conduct to it; that all those, whom the fears of persecution and trouble have driven from their country, may be assured of finding, at their return, safety and tranquillity. I speak not of those who have been solely influenced by their attachment to me. Can you regard them as criminals? As to those who, by personal injuries, have brought upon themselves the prosecution of the laws, I shall prove, in my conduct to them, that I am the king of all the French. (Signed). “Louis.”

“P. S. I was of opinion, gentlemen, that I ought to pronounce my solemn acceptance of the constitution in the very place in which it was formed; in consequence I shall come in person to-morrow, at noon, to the national assembly.”

This address was received by the assembly with great satisfaction. The reading was followed by the most lively and enthusiastic plaudits, and the shouts of “Vive le roi!” were as general and as loud as in the most splendid times of the monarchy. The intoxication had hardly ceased, when the assembly decreed that all persons under arrest should be immediately released; that all prosecutions carried on against persons for acts committed in consequence of the revolution, should be immediately superseded; that passports should be no longer necessary to enable French citizens to enter or go out of the kingdom; and that a deputation of sixty members should wait upon the king with the decree, and express the satisfaction which his acceptance of the constitution had diffused.

An act had been passed by the first national assembly (no doubt with patriotic views, but which was certainly of a pernicious tendency, on account of its infancy), that no person should be eligible to two successive legislatures. Accordingly, the second national assembly, which met October 1, 1791, did not boast of the talents and experience which had been displayed in the first; the members being also chosen at a time when the national resentment was at the highest pitch, were, consequently, of a more anti-monarchical disposition. The opening speech of the king was received with great approbation; and the president, in his reply, most respectfully expressed the united wish of the assembly to comply with all the patriotic and benevolent views of his majesty; adding, “Such, sire, is our duty, such are our hopes, and the gratitude and blessings of the people will be our reward.”

Circumstances however occurred, which prevented the monarch from continuing in amity with the assembly. When the constitutional act had received the royal acceptance, a decree had passed, agreeable to the king's desire, respecting the emigrants, without any exception whatever, on condition of their returning within a limited time to their country. The agent, who had been deputed on this commission to the refugee princes at Coblenz, in the electorate of Treves, was not only contemptuously and insolently treated, but absolutely imprisoned on pretence of his want of a passport. This outrage, and the hostile preparations of the emigrants, occasioned a decree which the assembly passed early in November, declaring Prince Louis Stanislaus Xavier to have forfeited his eventual claim to the regency, if not in the kingdom before the expiration of two months. The assembly, by a subsequent decree, pronounced the French hostilely assembled on the frontier, guilty of a conspiracy against their country, in case they did not return before January 1, 1792, incurring thereby the forfeiture of their estates during their lives, but without prejudice to their children. A severe decree also passed the assembly, November 18, against the non-juring clergy, who were accused of seditious and inevitable practices. To these decrees the monarch opposed his royal veto, and this resistance was the occasion of much disorder and discontent. The assembly addressed the king, conjuring him to take effectual measures to prevent the dangers with which the country was menaced. Louis, in his reply, assured the assembly that the emperor had done all that could be expected, by dispersing the emigrants within his states, and refusing them an asylum. Moreover, that he had acquainted the Elector of Treves, that if he did not, before January 15, put an end to all hostile dispositions, he should be considered as the enemy of France.

Such was the situation of the King of France, that the emperor Leopold, the King of Prussia, and the Elector of Saxony, had entered into an agreement to employ the most efficacious means for his restoration to perfect liberty: The project of Leopold, as supposed, was to form a league between all the powers of Europe, to surround France on every side with their armies, and then to publish a manifesto, requiring the French government to restore the king and royal family to their liberty, to reinstate his majesty in his dignity, and to re-establish the monarchy on a solid basis, and upon reasonable principles. In case of a refusal, threats of an invasion; and an attack upon all points, were to be held out, and to be executed.

These powers, it is said, had been convoked to confederate by Louis; if so, the situation of the French monarch was a sufficient plea for the invitation. In consequence, however, of his acceptance of the constitutional act, he sent them a circular letter, requesting them to suspend the effects of the league. The people now became jealous of the monarch. Addresses were presented to the assembly, declaring a perfect confidence in their firmness and patriotism, and indicating their dissatisfaction with the court. M. de Montmorin, unable to withstand the torrent of national odium, resigned his office, and was succeeded by M. de Lessart.

On the 21st of December, official notice was given to the French ambassador at the court of Vienna, that the emperor Leopold, understanding the Elector of Treves to be under apprehensions from France, had been constrained to order Mareschal Bender to march to his relief and protection. The king, in communicating this intelligence to the assembly, expressed his surprise, and imagined his imperial majesty had been deceived as to the state of facts. M. Louvet, an impassioned republican, then exclaimed:

"Men, who assume the name of Frenchmen, are meditating the ruin of France. They harass us from within, they harass us from without; but soon, we trust, will the national vengeance, under your direction, display the banners of our armies on the banks of the Rhine. The constitution is guaranteed by the oaths of the nation, which can exist only in France. Deign, gentlemen, to announce this truth to the crusaders of Treves. Tell them that France will never regard, as an independent power, or as constituting any part of the French nation, the assemblage of rebels and vagabonds who have armed themselves against their country. Is it not known to the whole world, that, aided by a foreign force, they have attempted sacrilegiously to destroy the infant liberties of France! In return, we issue declarations of pardon—we invite them back to the bosom of their country. They have exerted every effort to reduce us to the condition of slaves; we decree to them the reverence and rank of princes. In fine, after insulting, in every possible mode, the majesty of the people, they are, this moment, bidding defiance to their power! We demand then the denunciation of war! Let France rise in arms. Let the myriads of our citizen-soldiers precipitate themselves upon the demesnes of feudality. Let them encircle palaces with their bayonets, and deposit in cottages the declaration of the rights of man; that, in every clime, man, instructed and delivered, may resume the sentiment of his original dignity. Then shall nations be blended into one, and the grand fraternity of mankind shall, upon the altar of equality, liberty, and philosophy, swear UNIVERSAL PEACE."

The effects of this bombastic speech were immediate preparations for war; but, suddenly, the Elector of Treves engaged, that within eight days the hostile assemblages within his dominions should be entirely dispersed.

The public discontents daily increased, while the republican party, forming themselves into a club, or society, and assembling at a convent of jacobine friars, recently dissolved, they acquired the appellation of Jacobins; whilst the friends of the king, who had likewise their meetings, obtained the name of Feuillants. In consequence of the violent clamors against the king, who was charged, almost openly, with treachery to the nation, Louis wrote a letter to the assembly, February 17, 1792, contradicting "these injurious reports, propagated by evil-minded people, to alarm the public, and calumniate his intentions." The signal for plunging France into a series of troubles, was a decree of outlawry against the king's brothers and the emigrants. His majesty had not given up the hope of inducing the princes to listen to reason, and refused to sanction the decree, in order to issue a proclamation, which he hoped would answer the purpose in a less offensive manner.

The correspondence between the courts of Paris and Vienna being laid before the assembly on the 2d of March, it appeared that the imperial troops in the Netherlands would shortly amount to 90,000 men. Moreover, the dispatch of Prince Kaunitz (February 17) avowed the concert formed with other powers for preserving unimpaired the monarchy of France. The assembly, influenced with this intelligence, impeached M. de Lessart of criminal concealment, and unconstitutional practices. He was, of course, succeeded by M. Dumouriez.

The emperor Leopold died suddenly, March 1, and his son, Francis II. under the title of King of Hungary, but afterwards elected Emperor of the Romans, became his successor. The new monarch immediately communicated to the court of Berlin his determination to adhere to the treaty of Pilnitz. M. Dumouriez endeavoured to reconcile the parties; but the negociation between the powers of France and Austria proceeded slowly and unfavourably. On the commencement of hostilities, M. Rochambeau was constituted commander-in-chief of the French armies, a separate command being conferred on M. de la Fayette. The war began with an unsuccessful attack upon the city of Tournay, and M. Rochambeau resigned his command to M. Luckner. On June 6, a decree passed the assembly, on the suggestion of the military committee, for forming a camp of 20,000 men in the vicinity of Paris, which the king refused to sanction. The decree against the refractory clergy had a second time passed the assembly with some variations, but this was also rendered ineffectual by the king's veto. On June 12, Louis announced in person to the assembly the dismissal of Roland, Servan, and Clavière, and M. Dumouriez soon after resigned his office. This dismissal of the republic ministry made room for the friends of limited monarchy, headed by La Fayette.

Some of the municipality informed the assembly, June 20, that the populace were assembling with the idea of proceeding to some violent breach of the public peace, and that nothing but the strong interference of the legislature could avert the danger. The friends of moderation moved for a decree to prevent the assembling of armed bodies of people, and to deter them from surrounding either the palace or the assembly; but this was scouted, as trenching upon the majesty of the people; and Santerré, who called himself commander of the citizens of St. Antoine, a suburb of France, then chiefly inhabited by vagrants, accompanied by Legendre, a butcher, led their gangs through the city, and, under pretence of going to petition the king, collected all the friends of crime and confusion in one mass, with an intention to bury the unfortunate monarch and his family in irrevocable ruin.

When the mob commenced the attack, it was long before they gained admittance; but they had four pieces of cannon, and as the soldiers were strictly commanded not to fire upon the people, resistance became as fatal as in every case in which the ill-fated Louis had been advised to attempt it. The assailants were furnished with hatchets, crows, &c. and they broke down the gates and doors of the Thuilleries, and pointed their artillery against the hall of the guards, when the king presented himself, attended by the Princess Elizabeth, his sister, who would not quit him. A few of the national guards surrounded his majesty, and resolved to defend him, or perish in the attempt. The room was crowded with a multitude of men, women, and children, uttering the usual cries of sedition.

They insisted that he should withdraw his veto from the decrees against his brothers and the clergy, and Legendre, in an insolent and brutal address, demanded the king's attention: "Hear us, sir," said he, "for it is your duty so to do,—you are perfidious.—You have always deceived us; you deceive us still; but, beware, for the people are tired of seeing themselves made your laughing-stock!" To which his majesty calmly replied, that he regulated his conduct by the constitution. The resolution of the king, and his few faithful guards, disarmed the multitude of their ferocity, and the greater part were satisfied with pouring out execrations and abuse upon the Princess Elizabeth, whom they took for the queen. Others insisted upon the king putting on a red cap, which was one of the emblems of liberty assumed by these madmen. The king not only put it on with much apparent good-humour, but the queen having since joined him with a resolution to die by his side, he put one also on the dauphin, whom her majesty presented to the rabble. The effect was what might have been expected from such an assemblage. The king and queen shewed no signs of tyranny, and as the leaders could not misconstrue what the people could judge of by the evidence of their senses, the volatile crew were ready to admit that the monarch and his family were very civil people: "C'est bien honnête," was echoed by the crowd, and, after ranging through the apartments, the curiosity of most was satisfied. A few strove to push through the guards, but did not succeed; and it ought not to be forgotten, that though this multitude was perhaps forty thousand, no instance of robbery occurred; and, except breaking a few mirrors and glasses, very little damage.

When the riot was almost over, Petion, and a deputation from the legislative body, arrived at the palace, just to save appearances; but the king was under no obligation to them, for the mayor had been twice sent for, before he thought it necessary to take the trouble of attending.

The king being advised to the adoption of more rigorous measures, replied as follows:—"Oh! if my wife and children were not with me, it would soon appear that I am not so weak as is imagined, but what would become of them, if the measures to which you allude should fail?" His chief comfort, under his sorrows, was, that if his blood were shed, it might probably appease the rebels, and redeem his family from destruction.

General La Fayette, who had sent a letter to his majesty, in which he pledged himself to defend him against the violence of the factions; upon learning the insults offered to the sovereign on the 20th, displayed the high honor of a free-man and a soldier, and flew to support, in person, the justice which he had asserted. He was received by the king with open arms, and the national guards conducted him in triumph to and from the assembly; but it was evident that the citizens of Paris were not willing to second his spirited endeavours. In the assembly he was listened to with cold respect, while he declared that he had settled such measures with Marshal Luckner, that his absence from the army could not be of any injury, and he presented himself before them in his own name, and that of his indignant troops, to demand justice against the guilty authors of the disgraceful scenes at the palace on the 20th. Resolution appeared in every word he spoke, and the jacobins knew they could not yet provoke him openly; they suffered him to withdraw, drily replying, by their president, that they had "sworn to maintain the laws, and knew how to defend them." Some very severe remarks were made on his conduct, and a republican member (Gaudet) moved that inquiry should be made of the minister of war, whether he had allowed M. La Fayette to quit the army. This was rejected, and the general's address was referred to a committee, and many persons were desirous of marking it with their decided approbation; addresses to that effect were received from different parts of the country, and one of them had even twenty thousand signatures.

At this trying period the friends of the king and the constitution appear to have acted with as little firmness as before, yet they were not inactive. A superior council was formed for some time in Paris, styled the directory of the police; the majority were moderate men, and had called upon the mayor, as well as upon the assembly, to prevent the disorders of the 20th, without effect; they therefore exerted their own authority, and suspended him as soon as order was in some measure restored. The king confirmed this dismissal, and the assembly immediately restored the mayor.

When General La Fayette arrived on the frontiers, he found the measures of the enemy in great forwardness, and a sense of the danger which threatened the country afflicted all its friends. Under this idea, a member arose in the assembly, on the 7th of July, and conjured them to sacrifice their private views, and to become friends for the sake of their country. "Let all," said he, "who discover faults in the constitution, display a spirit of accommodation to each other, and let us swear that we will unite to maintain it as it is." Scarcely were the last words uttered, when the two sides (republicans and constitutionalists) arose, threw up their hats, shouted applauses from every side, the two parties embraced, and swore immortal union, taking their seats indifferently, as a sign of endless harmony! The minutes of this event were ordered to be immediately sent to the king, and directions were given to communicate this glorious issue to all the citizens. Such, indeed, was the combination of events at this period, that M. Carnot, who has since been looked on as a complete republican, stood up in defence of the king's authority, and moved that the judicial power should be especially charged to redouble their vigilance and authority.

When the deputation returned, who had waited on the king, the Bishop of Lyons reported, that his majesty, after hearing the extracts of the minutes read, answered, "That it was impossible for him to hear news so dear to his heart without rapture, and that he yielded to his strong desire of coming to the assembly, to testify all the joy with which this had inspired him." Louis soon after entered the hall, amidst continued shouts of "Long live the king!—Long live liberty!"—and in the fulness of his heart, declared his anxious hope, that the end of this union would make France survive the dangers which threatened her. The assembly replied by an address, in which it said, that it "already saw, in the candor of his proceedings, the omens of success." The plaudits of the galleries were as loud as those of the members; and yet it would hardly be credited that only one sabbath had passed, when these very people assailed this very king with the heaviest accusations that violence and bitterness could invent. A new scene of riot was at hand, under the mask of a national fête, or grand confederation, to celebrate the 14th of July. Deputies from the departments were to give their assistance; care was to be taken that such of the visitors, as might not be sufficiently corrupted, should not return home without being in possession of all the fire-brands of strife that might yet be wanting to inflame the sober hamlets of the country, and make them as licentious as the metropolis. Brissot and his party threw off the mask which they had assumed for a few days, and after a torrent of declamation, in which he declared "that the danger lay in the palace," the assembly decreed concisely, "THE COUNTRY IS IN DANGER," and two addresses, filled with alarm, were drawn up, and sent to the armies and the departments. Dissipation and idleness were so long habitual, that the number of debtors and poor was greatly increased, and many thousands, not originally corrupt, became so, in the cruel hope of being able to ruin their landlords and creditors, by overthrowing royalty. The king's feelings were injured in every shape, and as the late triumph of the mayor gave a great opportunity, the mob used every means to insult the king and his friends with shouts of "Long live Petion!—Down with royalty," &c. Whilst the last remains of royalty were brought into contempt, they also succeeded in assuring the people that the court prevented the success of the French arms, by its intrigues with those united against France. In this they were, in some measure, sanctioned by the combined powers themselves, who, instead of marching, as they should have done, with a strong column into the heart of the country, while it was yet undefended, continued issuing their feeble threats upon the frontiers. "It is not in their arms," said the jacobins, "that the enemy places his hopes: it is in the intrigues of the Thuilleries. It is the army of couriers that pass between Coblentz (the head-quarters of the emigrant princes) and the court, whom alone we have to fear, and not the soldiers of Brunswick."

A manifesto was circulated through France, signed by the Duke of Brunswick, as generalissimo. This manifesto declared the intention of the emperor and King of Prussia to restore order to France; to restore the king to his power, and release the royal family; to protect all persons who submitted to the king; that all persons found in arms should be punished severely; all the members of the assembly, and others, responsible with their lives; it threatened the most exemplary punishment on every one who controlled the king, or, as it is said, held him in subjection; it promised, that the troops of the Duke of Brunswick should observe the strictest discipline, and treat all well-disposed subjects with mildness; and called on the people to suffer them to enter the kingdom, and give them every assistance. In an additional declaration, he resolved to punish the people of Paris if the king should be insulted; and stated, in case of the royal family being carried off, all places which did not oppose their passage should be subject to the severest penalties; and that no place of retreat was to be the choice of his most christian majesty, unless it was effected under the offered escort.

Nothing, during the whole course of the revolution, did so much mischief as publishing this wretched manifesto: for it made no difference whatever between the sober well-meaning friends of limited monarchy, and the jacobins, who threatened even life itself with unlimited destruction.

On the 3d of August, two days after this manifesto was read in the assembly, the king wrote to that body, and, rather injudiciously, mentioned the possibility of its not being genuine, disavowing all its sentiments, and promising every thing that they could expect of him. His declarations were now at an end, his promises useless. A motion was made to print his letter, and send it to the eighty-three departments; but the previous question was instantly passed, amidst the shouts of the galleries.

Thuriot said, that the king had written this letter because he knew that the municipality of Paris were going to demand his deposition. Petion appeared at the head of a gang, and pretended he came from the forty-eight sections of Paris, to demand the king's exclusion from the throne, and that responsible ministers should be appointed, until the election of a new king in a national convention. He supported this petition by a sketch of what he called the "King's conduct since the Revolution," which, he said, proved him to be an enemy to the people, to the laws, and to France. The petition created a most violent agitation in the assembly, so that the president was obliged to adjourn the sitting; and, in the evening, the assembly resolved to determine the question on that day se'nnight.

All business ceased in Paris from the 3d of August, and the leaders of the national assembly were busy in passing decrees that should favor the insurgents; patrols of the rabble were also placed, by Petion and Santerre, so as to prevent the possibility of the king's escape. Matters being arranged for carrying the decree into execution, on the day before the assembly had resolved to pass it, the palace was attacked on the 10th of August. As many of the leading members of the assembly were desirous of aiding in the assault, who, at the same time, wished to be concealed, it was resolved that the riot should not commence till after dark. It was not till eleven o'clock that Danton called "To arms! to arms!" and all the bells were rung, to proclaim the city in a state of insurrection.

The conquest of the palace was not effected so easily as it had been on the 20th of June; for, though the attack commenced at one in the morning, it was nine before the outer gates were forced. Some preparations had been made for resistance; but, like every effort of the unfortunate Louis, it was more an attempt at resolution than resolution itself. Beside a part of the Swiss guard, and a few of the national grenadiers, who were resolved to defend the constitution, there was a considerable body of royalists, who had determined to subdue the traitors, or perish in the attempt, the whole amounting to near 3000 armed men. A body of this kind, headed by a bold and intrepid chief, would have amply secured a victory, if they had attacked the insurgents, instead of remaining cooped up in the palace. When the outer gates were forced, the assailants were met by the king's guards, who, by a close fire, drove them back, and obliged them to leave four pieces of cannon behind them. The Swiss guarded the great court, whilst the cannon played upon the palace, and had already pierced the roof; the bodies of the slain were strewed on every side, and the folly of resistance became evident every moment, for, in the multitude of advisers, no one had the command. The defenders of the palace soon became a tumultuous crowd, with no advantage over their adversaries, and much inferior to them in number. They failed, and they fell, for want of a commander; they were overpowered by numbers; and the triumphant barbarians enjoyed the sport of cutting them to pieces, and dragging their mangled carcases in their horrible processions. All the Swiss found, were inhumanly put to death in cold blood, and their remains exhibited fixed at the end of pikes! About 3000 persons, on both sides, lost their lives in this attack; and more would have suffered, but that a part of the guards had escorted the royal family to the assembly.

Louis seems to have had such an aversion to the shedding of blood, that he exposed himself to the most unwarrantable treatment, simply because the offenders calculated upon his forbearance. The danger was greater and more pressing than ever: this every one of his friends and family knew; and it is surprising that, after the length the assembly had gone, he did not clearly see that he must either be driven from his throne, or fight in defence of it. Yet he does not appear to have had such a view of the subject; for, when he was followed by the queen, and the princess his sister, in the midst of their brave defenders—after he had heard the dreadful howlings of a thousand tongues bellow out the cries of “deposition!” and “death!”—after the nobles and guards had satisfied him of victory, and the queen had resolved to die by his side—he took the unaccountable resolution of throwing himself and family into the arms of the national assembly, lest he should be supposed to violate the constitution; and, previous to his leaving the palace, gave positive orders not to fire upon the people!

A series of singular events had placed him now in a most distressing situation. The members of the assembly, to which he had retreated, thought no business of so much consequence as passing the decree of deposition; but they could not proceed to business in the king's presence, because it was contrary to the constitution. This gave a pretence for forcing the royal family into a corner, where the secretaries kept their books, which deprived them even of the poor consolation of exchanging thoughts, and subjected them to the cruel state of a prison, while it was alleged that their persons were sacred. Fourteen hours of mortification being thus inflicted upon their helpless captives, they decreed that the executive power should be taken from the king, and that he and his family should be confined in the Temple. To increase the pain of the royal sufferers, orders were issued that Pétion should go in the same carriage, to take them to prison. This traitor not only insulted them by his advice on their journey, but occasionally stopped the carriage, that they might hear the speeches of the infamous orators who irritated the people against them by their foul calumnies. BOOK I.

The revolution took a turn which seemed to dispel the hopes of all good men. The assembly was about to dissolve, for a national convention was appointed to assemble on the 20th of September, to constitute a republic; and little hope remained that this assembly would not long have the power of doing mischief.

On the 21st of September, a new provisional executive council was appointed, consisting of Roland, Servan, and Clavière, the ministers lately dismissed by the king; to whom was added, M. le Brun, as minister of foreign affairs. M. Luckner, M. Dumouriez, now acting in the capacity of general in the army, and the other commanders, readily submitted to the authority of the assembly. M. Fayette, finding himself wholly unsupported in his loyal endeavours, was obliged to make a precipitate retreat, with seventeen companions. They were arrested by an Austrian patrol, and conducted to Luxemburg. He and his companions were afterwards committed close prisoners to the fortress of Magdeburg, where they remained during a whole year in a miserable dungeon, treated with uncommon severity. The great talents of M. Fayette had checked the whole Austrian and Prussian armies, although he had not more than 20,000 men under his command. He being no longer opposed to the enemy, the combined armies resolved to advance as far as possible into France. They bombarded Longwy with such violence, for fifteen hours, as threatened to bury it in ruins, and the town capitulated. The assembly ordered a court-martial to sit on the magistrates who surrendered it, and they were executed.

Verdun was next invested; it was in want of every thing; the enemy had a secret correspondence with the inhabitants; the town was considered untenable, and the municipal officers advised its surrender. Although the garrison had only two battalions, Beaurepaire, the commander, determined to hold out as long as possible; but finding all his efforts useless, and his colleagues wanting to capitulate, he drew a pistol from his belt, in the midst of a council of war, and discharged it against his temple.

Great was the consternation at Paris when it was known that Longwy and Verdun had surrendered. All were alarmed, lest the report should be true, that the Duke of Brunswick would be in the neighbourhood of Paris. Danton, however, the minister of justice, whilst despair was seated on every countenance, declared there were at least 80,000 stand of arms in Paris. He proposed that they should be delivered up, and a body of volunteers raised and equipped with them. This was decreed; and all who were capable were ordered to be ready to march.

Alarm guns were fired at two o'clock in the morning of the 2d of September, the tocsin was sounded, the country declared to be in danger, and the people invited to meet in the Champ de Mars, from whence, as was said, they were instantly to march against the common enemy. Myriads were collected; and, when the resolutions of the assembly, moved by Danton, came to be understood, the universal cry was, "To arms, citizens! to arms! the enemy is at hand." During this sort of frenzy, news was spread that 4000 French troops, sent to reinforce Verdun, had been treacherously led into ambuscade, and cruelly cut to pieces. The fury of the populace was raised to its utmost height, the prisons were forced open, and a most inhuman massacre took place. The Cardinal de Rochefoucault, and about 200 priests, were handed out of the prison, two by two, into the street Vaugerard, and there put to death in cold blood. They wreaked their vengeance on the unfortunate Swiss officers who were confined in the Abbey prison. Their commander-in-chief alone, M. d'Affry, had the good fortune to escape, owing to a mistake of the mob.

The force of the French commander-in-chief at this period, it is said, did not equal that under the authority of General Clairfait; but, in this moment of suspense, the military genius of Dumouriez burst forth with great splendor: his inventive mind immediately resolved to divide his strength. To Galbaud, who was stationed at a pass in the forest of Argonne, which Dumouriez looked on as of the first importance to the issue of the campaign, he sent Dillon (4th of September) with considerable reinforcements. Just at this time it was abandoned by Galbaud, as impossible to be retained; but when he saw the supplies which had been sent him, he returned to its defence with renewed vigor: and it proved, in a manner, to France, what Thermopylæ had been to Greece. Dumouriez, in the mean time, took the post at Grand Pré under his own protection. It was soon contested for by the enemy; and, as he could not retain it against the furious attack of such a force as he had to contend with, he retreated, without loss, to the strong camp of St. Menchould, a strong town, situated about twenty-six miles W. S. W. of Verdun. The Austrians lost a great number of men, together with Prince Charles de Ligne.

Bournonville joined Dumouriez, with 15,000 men, as well as Kellerman, with the army under his command. On the 20th of September Dumouriez found himself in a condition to put an end to the incursions of the enemy. Kellerman, at the head of 16,000 men, repulsed a greatly superior division of the enemy, and rendered all their stratagems abortive.

The Prussian army immediately after evacuated France, and their example was followed by the troops of Austria and Hesse Cassel. Soon after the French retook Verdun, and they followed up their conquest by the recapture of Longwy.

On the 21st of September, the national assembly resigned its functions, and gave up its power to the convention, by an address of renunciation, and an assurance that they would serve as an advanced guard of the new legislature. The convention chose Petion their president; and, having decreed that the laws should be continued in force, and the usual taxes demanded, Collet d'Herbois rose, and said, that the convention ought not to adjourn, till it had decreed the total abolition of royalty in France. Deputies rose to demand that the question might be instantly put. M. Bazire exclaimed against the ardor which seemed to have taken possession of their minds, and besought them to argue a question of so much magnitude with the dignity that became them. His advice was looked on as the dull prudence of a vulgar mind, unworthy the practice of philosophers of superior light, and the national convention briefly decreed, that "Royalty is abolished in France." Loud applauses, and exclamations of "Vive la nation!" following the decree, minutes of the sitting were ordered to be sent to the departments, and to the armies, as well as to be proclaimed throughout Paris.

At the next sitting M. Condorcet was elected vice-president, and the convention decreed:—

1. That all public acts should be dated the first year of the French republic.
2. That the seal of the country shall be changed, and have, for a legend, "French Republic."
3. That the national seal shall represent a woman, sitting on a bundle of arms, and holding a pike in her hand, with a cap of liberty upon it; and, upon the exergue, the words, "Archives of the French Republic."
4. That no petitioners shall be admitted to the bar till the evening sitting.

The French arms were triumphant in every quarter; and, on the 20th of October, a decree passed the national assembly, declaring the republic was saved, and the country no longer in danger. Before the end of the year they were masters of the whole of the Austrian Low Countries, Luxemburg only excepted, together with the city and territory of Liege.

Amidst this unexampled series of triumph, the following decree was passed, November 19:—

"The national convention declare, in the name of the French nation, they will grant fraternity and assistance to all those people who wish to procure liberty; and they charge the executive power to send orders to the generals to give assistance to such people, and to defend citizens who have suffered, and are now suffering in the cause of liberty." This magnificent and empty vaunt was productive of very strange and serious consequences. Another decree, passed November 27, created the duchy of Savoy into an 84th department of the French republic, contrary to a fundamental article of the constitution, by which she renounced all foreign conquests; and another decree passed on the capture of Antwerp, declaratory of the freedom of navigation on the river Scheldt.

As the king was no longer in the way, the parties began to display themselves in their violence and abuse. The Brisotines had the government; the Jacobins the passions of the mob; and the Orleanites the way of corrupting the partizans of both by money. Their power was so equal, that, in spite of their hatred of each other, their rancour boiled in their bosoms, and exerted its efforts to vent itself, until its vehemence became too strong for restraint; and then it effected an unworthy union betwixt them all to renew their projects against their feeble king, who was defenceless, and within their power. The cowards began their attack by judging him on the very ground on which they agreed to the motion for bringing him to trial, namely, that "a decree of accusation should pass against the principal traitor, Louis XVI." In fact, he was usually spoken of, in all debates, as Louis the traitor; and, in this spirit, they began a process of assassination, which they sought to evade, concealing it under the mock forms of a trial. The appearance of rectitude was endeavoured to be preserved by the speeches made about justice; yet, when Mannel moved, that whoever undertook the defence of Louis should be put under the protection of the law, they answered him by murmurs and hootings: and those who did defend him were sent to the scaffold. Mannel himself, and Kersaint, who looked on the proceeding as a conspiracy to commit murder, they guillotined also.

On the 11th of December, the king was brought to the bar, and was permitted to choose M. M. Deseze, Tronchet, and Malesherbes, his defenders. The trial lasted thirty-four days, and the convention pronounced him guilty.

The same cordiality did not prevail as to the sentence as with regard to the verdict. The Brisotines, less sanguinary than their antagonists, were so well satisfied with having obtained his power, that they did not wish to take his life; whilst Orleans and Robespierre were bent on being satisfied with nothing short of his blood. When the proces verbal was read, which had the answers of all the members to the question, "What punishment shall he suffer?" even the bloodhounds of the convention were struck with horror when they heard that Philip Egalité, Duke of Orleans, the king's own relation, and the only one whose word had the slightest influence with the people, had voted for death! On the roll there was a majority of five for death.

When the fatal decision was properly ascertained, the president, with a solemn tone of voice, and with his head uncovered, said,

"In consequence of this, I declare that the punishment decreed by the national convention against Louis Capet is DEATH."

The king's council were again admitted to the bar, and M. Deseze read the copy of a letter to the convention in the king's hand-writing:—

"I owe it to my honour, I owe it to my family, not to subscribe to a sentence which declares me guilty of a crime of which I cannot accuse myself. In consequence, I appeal to the nation from the sentence of its representatives; and I commit, by these presents, to the fidelity of my defenders, to make known to the national convention this appeal, by all the means in their power: and to demand that mention of it be made in the minutes of their sittings. (Signed) "LOUIS."

When he presented this letter, M. Deseze exclaimed, with his usual flow of eloquence, "Do not afflict France by a judgment that will appear dreadful, when five voices only were thought enough to carry it." He then besought the convention to refer their judgment to the tribunal of the people. "You have either forgotten or destroyed," said the fascinating M. Tronchet, "the lenity which the law allows to criminals, of requiring, at least, two-thirds of the voices to constitute a definitive judgment." The last effort that they could make in favor of the fallen monarch was, to ask a respite, and delay the execution of the sentence, but this was likewise refused. The members were merely to give a simple yes, or no; and, at midnight, the 19th of January, 1793, there appeared, for the respite 310, and against 380; majority 70, for immediate execution.

Louis entreated a respite for only three days, that he should not be hurried away without a proper preparation for this awful change; but, with a degree of savage barbarity, the convention refused his request. The sentence was not finally determined before two o'clock, and the decree was ordered to the executive council, who were directed to notify it to Louis, and to have it executed within twenty-four hours afterwards, and to take all means of safety and police that might appear to them requisite during the execution.

Roland, Claviere, Monge, Le Brun, Pache, and Garet, were the council who ordered the execrable Santerre to procure 1200 of the greatest ruffians of Paris, armed with sixteen rounds each, to form round the carriage of the helpless monarch, and by noon, on the 21st, to drag him to the scaffold.

Paris was illuminated on the 20th, and no person permitted to go at large in the streets.

Bodies of armed men patrolled in every district of that immense metropolis; the sound of coaches ceased, the streets were deserted, and the city buried in an awful silence. About two o'clock in the morning of the fatal 21st, voices were heard through the gloom of lamentation and distress; but whence they came, or what they were, no one has ever discovered.

The unhappy monarch passed all Sunday in preparing for his change. His coolness and patience evinced great eminence of soul; but the parting of his family was too painful to the feelings of humanity! The queen hung round his neck in delirious anguish; the princess royal grasped his hand; the dauphin caught his knees; and Madame Elizabeth bathed his feet with her tears. The queen was at last taken from him in a state of insensibility, which she did not recover from before two o'clock on Monday afternoon. The king, on this sad spectacle, shewed all the affection of a husband, a father, a brother; and, seeming to be more affected by the affliction of those so dear and so beloved than by his own misfortunes, consoled them in the most soothing manner. Having gone through this trying scene, he now prepared to meet his God. The conversation which he was allowed to hold with his confessor, it is said, was pious, sensible, and animated; and his hope was full of immortality. He protested his innocence, and forgave his enemies from his heart. On Monday morning, as the clock struck eight, he was summoned to his fate. He was conducted to a coach belonging to the mayor of Paris, in which were two soldiers of the gend'armerie. He was attended by his confessor, and aided to step into the carriage by one or two of the sentinels, who were at the gate of the temple.

The place of execution was filled with an immense crowd of people, and large bodies of horse and foot were there to awe the multitude. The most deadly silence prevailed, while the coach advanced slowly towards the scaffold. Louis mounted it with fortitude, a firm step, and unaltered countenance. He was attended on the scaffold by his confessor and two or three municipal officers. He looked around upon the people with a complacent countenance, and was preparing to address them, when the ruffian Santerre cried out, "No speeches! come, no speeches!" and suddenly the drums beat and trumpets sounded. He spoke, but the only expressions that could be distinctly heard, were these:

"I forgive my enemies: may God forgive them, and not lay my innocent blood to the charge of the nation! God bless my people."

The confessor went on his knees, and implored the king's blessing, who gave it with an affectionate embrace. The unfortunate monarch then placed his head upon the block with wonderful serenity, and ceased to live in this world! Before his execution, he wrote to the national convention, entreating to be buried near his father, in the cathedral of Sens, in the department of Yonne, 82 miles south-east of Paris, and 35 west-south-west of Troyes, capital of the department of Auby. They passed to the order of the day. He was buried in the cemetery ground of the new Magdelain, about 800 feet north of the place of execution, and his grave filled with quick-lime.

This unfortunate monarch had certainly many amiable, though not shining qualities. He was a good husband, a good father, and a lover of his people. He was wont to compare himself with Charles I. of England, but the similitude is by no means striking. They certainly shared a similar fate, although the death of Louis has been denominated an execution, and that of Charles a martyrdom. It is worthy of remark, that the latter was never religiously observed in London till the death of Louis; for before 1793 the theatres used to be open on the 31st of January. Louis had acquired a great fund of knowledge by reading, and he was possessed of a tenacious memory. He frequently displayed judgment, but was guided by that of others.

His queen, Marie Antoinette, was removed from the temple to the common prison of the Conciergerie, where she remained till she was brought before the revolutionary tribunal, October 15, 1793. After an hour's consultation, the jury pronounced her guilty of all the charges laid against her. The queen, on hearing the verdict returned, fixed her eyes stedfastly on the ground, from which she was never observed to raise them more. The fortitude and dignity with which she conducted herself on her trial, did not forsake her to the last. On the day following, she submitted to her fate with calm resignation on the public scaffold, and upon the same spot where her husband had previously suffered.

Such were the savage proceedings of the revolutionary tribunal, that shocking executions daily took place under the fatal axe of the guillotine. In the direful catalogue were found the names of Mannel, president of the commune of Paris; the brave and veteran General Luckner; the learned and philosophic Bailly; the excellent Malesherbes; the gallant Kersaint; the young and amiable Barnave; the virtuous Rabaut de St. Etienne; and the celebrated and accomplished Madame Roland, wife of the minister of that name.

CHAPTER III.

Conduct of the English Government in consequence of the Revolutionary Proceedings of France.

On the dawn of the French revolution, many became its advocates in England, who expressed great exultation at the event. The first public demonstration of this appeared on the occasion of an anniversary meeting of a Whig association in the metropolis, known by the name of the Revolution Society. On its progressive stages, party-spirit raged throughout England, in a more violent degree. The chief advocates for the revolution were Mr. Fox and Mr. Sheridan: Mr. Burke, however, in a work which will be handed down to the latest posterity, for its enlightened wisdom and political discernment, not only informed the French nation of the tremendous precipice on which that country stood, but minutely predicted the horrors which afterwards took place. He exhibited to the view of all Europe the intentions of a faction which directly designed the entire subversion of every established government, both from policy and principle.

Such was the general state of affairs, when the parliament of Great Britain met, January 21, 1790. His majesty's speech mentioned the internal situation of the different parts of Europe to have been productive of events which had engaged his majesty's most serious consideration. Lord Valletort, in moving the address, took occasion to contrast the tranquil and prosperous situation of England with the anarchy and licentiousness of France, and to stigmatise the revolution of that kingdom, as an event the most disastrous, and productive of consequences the most fatal that had ever taken place since the foundation of the monarchy. On the debate which afterwards took place, relative to the army estimate, Mr. Fox deprecated the measure as unnecessary, there being nothing in the situation of affairs which required an extraordinary force; and, having uttered some expressions in praise of the French revolution, Mr. Burke rose and took a brief survey of the recent transactions. "That nation," he said, "had gloried (and some in Britain had thought proper to share in the glory) in bringing about a revolution, as if revolutions were good in themselves. All the crimes and horrors which led to their revolution, which marked its progress, and might virtually attend its establishment, were nothing thought of by the lovers of revolutions. The French had made their way to a bad constitution through the destruction of their country, when they were in possession of a good one. Of this they were in possession on that very day when the States-general met in separate orders. Their business, had they possessed either virtue or wisdom, or been left to their own judgment, was to secure the independence of the states, according to those orders, under the monarch on the throne. Then was it their duty to redress grievances. Instead, however, of acting in this laudable manner, and improving the fabric of their state, to which the sovereign had called them, and to which they were sent by their country, they were made to take a course entirely different. They first destroyed all the balances that tended to fix the state, and give it a steady direction, and which furnished correctives to any spirit of violence which might prevail in any of the orders. In their oldest constitution, as well as in the constitution of this country, and perhaps in the constitution of every country in Europe, these balances or counterpoises existed. These they precipitately destroyed, and then melted down the whole into one incongruous mass. Having accomplished this, they next laid the axe to the root of all property, in a most atrocious and perfidious manner, and therefore, of all national prosperity, by the principles which they established, and the example set by them, in confiscating all the possessions belonging to the church. They framed and recorded a kind of digest of anarchy, denominated the rights of man, in such a pedantic prostitution of elementary principles, as would have brought disgrace on a school-boy. It was, however, much worse than trifling and pedantry in them; for they systematically destroyed every hold of authority by opinion, whether civil or religious, on the public mind. By means of this insane declaration, they subverted the state, and brought on such calamity as no country was ever known to suffer, without a long and desolating war." Mr. Burke asserted, that the most pernicious effect of all their proceedings was on their military. "Were it the question, whether soldiers were to forget that they were citizens, as an abstract proposition, he would not quarrel respecting it: although, when abstract principles are to be applied, much was to be considered respecting the union of citizen and soldier. But if applied to the events which had taken place in France, where the abstract principle was clothed with its circumstances, he hoped his friend Mr. Fox would coincide with him in opinion, that the things done in France were no ground for exultation, whether we considered the act or the example. It was not an army under the respectable patriotic citizens, embodied for the purpose of resisting tyranny, but the case of common soldiers abandoning their officers, in order to unite with a furious and licentious rabble. He was deeply concerned, that this strange thing denominated the French revolution, should be put in the balance with that glorious event, usually called the revolution in England, and the behaviour of the soldiery on that occasion compared with the conduct of some of the French troops in the present instance. At that time the Prince of Orange, one of the blood-royal in England, was called in by the flower of the aristocratical party, to defend the ancient constitution, but by no means to level all distinctions. To this prince, so invited, the aristocratic leaders who commanded the troops went over in bodies with their different corps, as the saviour of their country. The object of military obedience was changed; but the principle of military obedience was not interrupted for a single moment. If the conduct of the English armies was different, so also was that of the whole English nation at that memorable period. In fact, the circumstances of our revolution, and that of France, are exactly the reverse of each other, in almost every particular, as well as in the whole spirit of the transaction. What we did was in truth and substance, and in a constitutional point of view, a revolution not made, but prevented. We did not impair, but strengthen the monarchy, and we did not impair the church. We made no change in the fundamental parts of our constitution; and the nation kept the same ranks, privileges, franchises, and rules for property. The church and state were the same after as before the revolution; but we may venture to maintain, that in every part they were much better secured. The result of all this was, that the state flourished. Instead of lying as if dead, in a species of trance, or exposed, like some others, in an epileptic fit, to the pity or scorn of the world, for her wild convulsive movements, unfit for every purpose but that of dashing out her brains, Great Britain rose above the standard even of her former self. A period then commenced of a more improved domestic prosperity, and still continues, not only unimpaired, but even growing under the wasting hand of time."

This speech having been received with great applause, Mr. Fox thought it necessary to declare "his total dissent from opinions so hostile to the general principles of liberty; and which he was grieved to hear from the lips of a man whom he loved and revered—by whose precepts he had been taught—by whose example he had been animated to engage in their defence."

Mr. Sheridan reprobated the political sentiments of Mr. Burke. "The people of France," he said, "have committed acts of barbarity and bloodshed which have justly excited indignation and abhorrence; but that indignation and abhorrence are to be ascribed to the government of France prior to the revolution, the tyranny and oppression of which had deprived the people of the rights of men and of citizens."

The second celebration of the anniversary of the French revolution in England, was productive of serious riots, particularly in the great and opulent town of Birmingham. The measures of ministers were exceedingly wise and prudent, though severely censured by the pretended friends of liberty. A royal proclamation was issued against the public dispersion of all seditious writings, and against all illegal correspondences—exhorting the magistrates to vigilance, and the people to submission and obedience. When this proclamation was laid before parliament, May 25, 1792, it was opposed by Mr. Grey with much warmth, who intimated his belief, that the real object of the proclamation was to discredit an association which had been just formed under the name of the "Friends of the People," for the purpose of effecting a reform in parliament. This Mr. Pitt disclaimed in very explicit terms, and expressed his high respect for many of the members of the society in question, declaring that he differed from them only in regard to the time and mode which they had adopted for the attainment of their object. The proclamation, he confessed, was levelled against the daring and seditious principles which had been so assiduously propagated amongst the people under the delusive appellation of the rights of man.

The English government commenced prosecutions against a prodigious number of offenders, amongst whom Thomas Paine stood most conspicuous; but anticipating the verdict of the jury, he had, previous to his trial, fled to France. Debating societies, where juvenile orators used to harangue upon subjects they were little acquainted with, were put under proper restrictions. At length French cruelty opened the eyes of the English, and the nation was on a sudden struck with terror at the idea of any kind of a political innovation. An association was formed in the city of London, for the preservation of liberty and property against republicans and levellers, apparently under the sanction of government; and immense multitudes of pamphlets, in the form of dialogues, narratives, and letters, rushed through the country from the press, warmly recommending submission to government on the absolute principle of passive obedience and non-resistance. Resolutions were accordingly subscribed to in every county and town, expressive of the strongest attachment to the king and constitution; of the dread they entertained of innovation; and of their strong aversion to all doctrines properly republican.

Previous to this wonderful display of loyalty, certain inhabitants of Great Britain sent addresses of congratulation to the continent, declaring, in lofty terms, their admiration and applause. A memorable one, under the title of "An address from several patriotic societies in England," was presented at the bar of the convention on the 7th of November, containing the most unjustifiable reflections on the constitution and government of their own country. "Whilst foreign plunderers ravage your territories, an oppressed part of mankind, forgetting their own evils, are sensible only of yours, and address their fervent prayers to the God of the universe, that he may be favorable to your cause, with which theirs is so intimately connected. Degraded by an oppressive system of inquisition, the insensible but continual encroachments of which quickly deprived this nation of its boasted liberty, and reduced it almost to that abject state of slavery from which you have so gloriously emancipated yourselves, five thousand English citizens, fired with indignation, have the courage to step forward to rescue their country from that opprobrium which has been thrown on it by the base conduct of those who are invested with power. We see with concern that the Elector of Hanover unites his troops to those of traitors and robbers; but the King of England will do well to remember that England is not Hanover. Should he forget this, we will not forget it." In returning an answer to this insolent address, the president of the convention imprudently made use of expressions which were full of respect. "The sentiments of five thousand Britons devoted openly to the cause of mankind, exist, without doubt, in the hearts of all the free-men in England."

A deputation from the "Society for Constitutional Information," having presented an address at the bar of the convention, congratulated that assembly "on the glorious triumph of liberty on the 10th of August," and observed, "That, notwithstanding the hireling pens which may be employed by the power of government to contradict them, they speak the sentiments of a majority of the English nation." Expressions still more scandalously seditious are to be found in the introductory speech of the deputies, Citizens John Frost and Joel Barlow. They even presumed to predict, "That, after the example given by France, revolutions will become easy. Reason (say these wonderful seers) is about to make a rapid progress; and it would not be extraordinary, if, in a much less space of time than can be imagined, the French should send addresses of congratulation to a national convention of England." M. Gregoire, the president, paid many compliments to the English nation, as a country which has afforded many distinguished and illustrious examples to the whole world. "The shades of Hampden and of Sydney hover over your heads; and the moment, without doubt, approaches, in which the French will bring congratulations to the national convention of Great Britain. Generous republicans! your appearance among us prepares a subject of history." The speech, the address, and the answer returned by the president, were ordered to be printed, to be sent to the eighty-three departments, and translated into all languages.

On the same day a deputation appeared at the bar from the British and Irish resident at Paris, and declared their persuasion amidst the loudest applause, "That the disgraceful memory of those pretended governments, the offspring of the combined frauds of priests and tyrants, will in a short time alone remain. Our wishes, citizens legislators, render us impatient to behold the happy moment of this grand change, in the hope that, on its arrival, we shall see an intimate union formed between the French republic and the English, Irish, and Scottish nations. Nor are we alone animated by these sentiments;—we doubt not they would be equally conspicuous in the great majority of our fellow-countrymen, if the public opinion were to be consulted there, as it ought, in a national convention." To this the president made answer:—"Principles are waging war against tyranny, which will fall under the blows of philosophy. Royalty in Europe is either destroyed, or on the point of perishing on the ruins of feudality; and the declaration of rights, placed by the side of thrones, is a devouring fire which shall consume them: Worthy republicans! congratulate yourselves on thinking that the festival which you have made in honor of the French revolution is the prelude to the festival of nations."

The rash, impolitic, and insulting conduct of the convention was deemed the ne plus ultra of depravity and wickedness by the English government. A royal proclamation was therefore issued, December 1, 1792, purporting, "That notwithstanding the late proclamation of the 21st May, the utmost industry was still employed by evil-disposed persons within the kingdom, acting in concert with persons in foreign parts, with a view to subvert the laws and constitution; and that a spirit of tumult and disorder, thereby excited, had lately shewn itself in acts of riot and insurrection.—And that these causes moving him thereto, his majesty had resolved forthwith to embody part of the militia of the kingdom."

This proclamation was accompanied by another, for convening parliament on the 13th of December, which stood prorogued to January 3, 1793, the law requiring that if the militia be drawn out during the recess, parliament should be assembled in the course of fourteen days. By desire of the minister, troops were marched to the metropolis, the guard of the Bank was doubled, and the fortifications of the Tower repaired. This procedure rendered the public alarm inexpressible. On the meeting of parliament the expressions of the first proclamation were repeated in the speech of his majesty from the throne, at the termination of which the genuine designs of the court were fully developed. "I have," said his majesty, "carefully observed a strict neutrality in the present war on the continent, and have uniformly abstained from any interference with respect to the internal government of France; but it is impossible for me to see, without the most serious uneasiness, the strong and increasing indications which have appeared there of an intention to excite disturbances in other countries, to disregard the rights of neutral nations, and pursue views of conquest and aggrandizement, as well as to adopt towards my allies the States-general, measures which were neither conformable to the law of nations, nor to the positive stipulations of existing treaties. Under these circumstances, his majesty thought it right to have recourse to those means of prevention and internal defence with which he was intrusted by law, and to make some augmentation of his naval and military force."

A debate of considerable length ensued. An address was moved in answer to the speech, when Mr. Fox, after many judicious observations, moved this simple amendment: "That enquiry should be made into parts stated in his majesty's speech;" which was negatived by a majority of 290 to 50.

Though the determination of the English court became abundantly apparent, yet nothing was left unattempted by the French government to maintain a good understanding with Britain. M. Chauvelin presented a memorial to Lord Grenville, on the 27th of December, in which he acquainted his lordship, "that the executive council of the French republic, thinking it a duty which they owe to the French nation, not to leave it in the state of suspense into which it has been thrown by the late measures of the British government, have authorised him to demand with openness, whether France ought to consider England as a neutral or hostile power? at the same time being solicitous that not the smallest doubt should exist respecting the disposition of France towards England, and of its desire to remain in peace." M. Chauvelin said, in alluding to the decree of the 19th of November, "that the French nation absolutely reject the idea of that false interpretation by which it might be supposed that the French republic should favor insurrection, or excite disturbance, in any neutral or friendly country whatever. In particular, they declare in the most solemn manner, that France will not attack Holland, so long as that power adheres to the principles of her neutrality." M. Chauvelin affirmed, respecting the navigation of the Scheldt, that "it is a question of too little importance to be made the sole cause of a war, and that it could only be used as a pretext for a premeditated aggression. On this fatal supposition the French nation will accept war; but such a war would be the war, not of the British nation, but of the British ministry, against the French republic; and of this he conjures them well to consider the terrible responsibility."

The answer which Lord Grenville returned to this communication was far from being agreeable. He reminded him that his majesty had suspended all official communication with France since the unhappy events which took place on the 10th of August; and acquainted him, that he could not be treated with in the form stated in his note. "If France," said his lordship, "is really desirous of maintaining friendship and peace with England, she must show herself disposed to renounce her views of aggression and aggrandizement, and to confine herself within her own territory, without insulting other governments, without disturbing their tranquillity, without violating their rights." France being thus imperiously commanded to relinquish her late conquests as the sine qua non of peace, it was natural to conclude that negotiation was at an end. It must be acknowledged, that the French government, in her transactions at this time with Great Britain, endeavoured to appear exceedingly moderate and temperate. The condescending answer of M. le Brun, minister for foreign affairs, to the letter transmitted by Lord Grenville, bearing date the 4th of January, 1793, was directly opposite to the peremptory style exhibited by the communications of the British minister. The executive council "repeat the assurances of their sincere desire to maintain peace and harmony between France and England. It is with great reluctance that the republic would see itself forced to a rupture, much more contrary to its inclination than its interest."

In consequence of Lord Grenville's refusal to acknowledge M. Chauvelin in his diplomatic capacity, the executive council remarked, "That in the negotiations now carrying on at Madrid, the principal minister of his catholic majesty did not hesitate to address M. Bourgoign, the ambassador of the republic at that court, by the title of minister plenipotentiary of France. But, that a defect in point of form might not impede a negotiation, on the success of which depended the tranquillity of two great nations, they had sent credential letters to M. Chauvelin, to enable him to treat according to the severity of diplomatic forms." The council again declare, "that the decree of 19th November had been misunderstood; and that it was far from being intended to favor sedition, being merely applicable to the single case where the general will of a nation, clearly and unequivocally expressed, should call for the assistance and fraternity of the French nation. Sedition can never exist in the expression of the general will. The Dutch were certainly not seditious when they formed the generous resolution of throwing off the Spanish yoke; nor was it accounted as a crime to Henry IV. or to Queen Elizabeth, that they listened to their solicitations of assistance." The council maintain, respecting the right of navigation on the Scheldt, "that it is a question of absolute indifference to England, little interesting even to Holland, but of great importance to the Belgians, who were not parties to the treaty of Westphalia, by which they were divested of that right; but when that nation shall find itself in full possession of its liberty, and, from any motive whatever, shall consent to deprive themselves of the navigation of the Scheldt, France will not oppose it. With respect to the charge of aggrandizement, France has renounced, and still renounces, all conquest; and its occupying the Netherlands will continue no longer than the war. If these explanations appear insufficient, after having done every thing in our power to maintain peace, we will prepare for war. We shall combat with regret the English, whom we esteem, but we shall combat them without fear."

Lord Grenville, in his reply, complained that nothing more was offered than an illusory negotiation; and another letter from his lordship, dated January 24, 1793, terminated the conference, in which his lordship wrote, "I am charged to notify to you, sir, that the character with which you had been invested at this court, and the functions of which have been so long suspended, being now entirely terminated by the fatal death of his most christian majesty, you have no longer any public character here; and his majesty has thought fit to order that you should retire from this kingdom within the term of eight days."

On the departure of M. Chauvelin, a memorial was presented by Lord Auckland to the States-General, informing their high mightinesses, "That not four years ago some wretches, assuming the title of philosophers, had the presumption to think themselves capable of establishing a new system of civil society. In order to realize that dream of their vanity, they found it necessary to overthrow and destroy all received notions of subordination, manners, and religion, which have hitherto formed all the security, happiness, and consolation of the human race. Their destructive projects have too well succeeded; but the effects of the new system, which they endeavoured to introduce, served only to show the imbecility and villainy of its authors. The events which so rapidly followed each other, since that epoch, surpass in atrocity all that have ever polluted the pages of history. Property, liberty, security, even life itself, have been deemed playthings in the hands of infamous men, who are slaves to the most licentious passions—of rapine, enmity, and ambition."

Though his lordship's language was deemed indecorous by the enemies of the war, which was now threatened, yet the truth of it was indisputable; while, it is remarkable, that not one of the predictions which came from the lips of those great men, respecting the wars occasioned by the French revolution, was ever verified.

On the 1st of February, 1793, a decree passed the convention unanimously, declaring the republic of France at war with the King of Great Britain, and the Stadtholder of Holland. On this very day it was, that the British parliament was taken up with the consideration of a message from his majesty, in which it was said, "That his majesty had caused to be laid before them copies of several papers which had passed between M. Chauvelin and the minister for foreign affairs, and of the order of departure transmitted to M. Chauvelin." And his majesty moreover declared, that in the present situation of affairs he thought it indispensable to make a further augmentation of his forces by sea and land, for maintaining the rights of his own dominions, for supporting his allies, and for opposing views of aggrandizement and ambition on the part of France, at all times dangerous to the interests of Europe, but peculiarly so when connected with the propagation of principles subversive of the peace and order of all civil society.

On this occasion the chancellor of the exchequer, in a very animated speech, proved the unavoidable necessity of a war. The death of Louis XVI. was represented by him "as an event so full of grief and horror, that he wished it were possible to tear it from their memories, and expunge it from the page of history; but that event was unfortunately passed, and the present age must be for ever contaminated with the guilt and ignominy of having witnessed it." In this dreadful transaction they saw concentrated the effect of those principles, pushed to their utmost extent, which set out with dissolving all the bonds by which society was held together,—principles established in opposition to every law human and divine, and which, presumptuously relying on the authority of wild and delusive theories, rejected all the advantages of the wisdom and experience of former ages, and even the sacred instructions of revelation." After indulging himself much in this species of declamation, he added, "During the whole summer, while France had been engaged in the war with Austria and Prussia, his majesty had in no shape departed from the neutrality which he had engaged to observe. But what had been the conduct of the French? The first instance of their success in Savoy had been sufficient to demonstrate the insincerity of their assurances, and to unfold the plan of their ambition. They had immediately resolved to annex it for ever to their dominions. That they might not leave any doubt of their intentions, by a formal decree they had stated their plan of overturning every government; threatening destruction to all who refused their fraternization, which, by a horrid mockery, they pretended to offer. They had rendered the Netherlands a province, in substance as well as in name, to France; and they had shewn a disposition to add to its territory every country which should be so unfortunate as to experience the force of its arms; for the wild and destructive ambition of the present rulers in France was limited only by their power. Some pretended explanations had indeed been given of the decree of the 19th of November; but, as had been already stated by the noble secretary of state, they contained only an avowal and a repetition of the offence. The whole of their language, institutions, and conduct, had been directed to the subversion of every government. To monarchy particularly they had testified the most violent and decided enmity: the bloody sentence executed by the hand of the assassin against their late monarch, was passed against the sovereigns of all countries. No political association in this kingdom, however contemptible, had sent addresses containing sentiments of sedition and treason to their assembly, which had not been received with even a degree of theatrical extravagance, and cherished with all the enthusiasm of congenial feeling: In relation to the violated rights of his majesty and his allies, involved in the question relative to the Scheldt, he asserted the exclusive claim of the Dutch to the navigation of that river, guaranteed by the most solemn treaties; to which the French, who could have no pretence to interfere in this matter, but in the assumed character of sovereigns of the Low Countries, or arbiters of Europe, opposed certain visionary theoretic principles, such as destroyed the force of all positive obligations, though they had repeatedly pledged themselves to the observance of all the subsisting treaties. He granted that the Dutch had made no formal requisition of support in the actual circumstances, contenting themselves with protesting against the invasion of their rights; but, because they were timid, were we to leave them exposed to the certain ruin that awaited them? The French had stated that they would evacuate the Netherlands at the conclusion of the war. Upon a promise so illusory there could not be placed the smallest dependence; and they had made no apology for the manner in which they had received seditious addresses from this country. These addresses they received as expressive of the sentiments of the people of Great Britain, the great majority of whom, he was happy to say, detested the principles contained in them. Thus, in all those three assurances which they had given,—1st. Of their intention to resist any system of aggrandizement; 2dly, To abstain from all interference in the government of any neutral country; and, 3dly, To respect the rights of his majesty and his allies; they had entirely failed, and on every point completely reversed that plan of conduct which they had so solemnly pledged themselves to adopt. In the paper transmitted by the executive council, they had given their ultimatum; so that we must either accept the satisfaction they offer, or a war must be the consequence. As to the time, the precise moment, he should not pretend to fix it. A satisfactory explanation would not even now be refused; but he should deceive them if he should say that he thought any such explanation would be given, or that a war could be avoided."

The intelligence having arrived of the declaration of war by France against Great Britain and Holland, a royal message was delivered to both houses of parliament, February 11, declaring, "That the assembly now exercising the powers of government in France have, without previous notice, directed acts of hostility to be committed against the persons and property of his majesty's subjects, in breach of the law of nations, and of the most positive stipulations of treaty; and have since, on the most groundless pretences, actually declared war against his majesty and the United Provinces. Under the circumstances of this wanton and unprovoked aggression, his majesty has taken the necessary steps to maintain the honor of his crown, and to vindicate the rights of his people. And his majesty relies with confidence on the firm and effectual support of the House of Commons, and on the zealous exertions of a brave and loyal people, in prosecuting a JUST AND NECESSARY WAR; and in endeavoring, under the blessing of Providence, to oppose an effectual barrier to the progress of a system which strikes at the security and peace of all independent nations, and is pursued in open defiance of every principle of moderation, good faith, humanity, and justice. In a cause of such general concern, his majesty has every reason to hope for the cordial co-operation of those powers who are united with his majesty by the ties of alliance, or who feel an interest in preventing the extension of anarchy and confusion, and in contributing to the security and tranquillity of Europe."

Mr. Fox did not consider a declaration of war on the part of France unprovoked. The refusal to export corn to France, and the order issued for M. Chauvelin to quit the kingdom, was tantamount to the declaration of hostilities on the part of Britain. Mr. Burke defended the conduct of ministers. "No man," he declared, "had a more lively sense of the evils of war than himself. A war with France, in present circumstances, must be terrible; but peace much more so. A nation that had abandoned all its valuable distinctions, arts, sciences, religion, law, order—every thing but the sword, was most dreadful to all countries composed of citizens who only used soldiers as a defence. He had no hesitation to pronounce, as in the divine presence, that ministers had not precipitated the nation into a war, but were brought to it by an over-ruling necessity. He had been grieved to the soul, for four years past, that his utmost exertions were unable to produce upon the government of the country, or in the public mind, a sense of the danger that approached them. At length the infatuation was removed,—ministers awoke to the peril that menaced; and he pledged himself, therefore, to give them his clear, steady, uniform, unequivocal support. If any charge was to be laid to the share of ministers, it was that of too long delay; but in his early opposition to the views and proceedings of France, he was convinced that he was not accompanied by the feelings of the nation; nor was it till full-blown mischief had alarmed the people and roused the king, that the government could have had a proper support. From those men who could neither vindicate the principles, nor deny the power of France, but yet impeded the measures taken to secure us against that power, he differed fundamentally and essentially in every principle of morals, in every principle of manners, sentiment, disposition, and in taste. France, he said, had been for some time in a continual series of hostile acts against this country, both internal and external.—The putting the King of France to death was done, not as an example to France, not to extinguish the race, not to put an end to monarchy, but as a terror to monarchs, and particularly to the monarch of Great Britain. Mr. Fox, he added, had spoken with some asperity of an intention in ministers to restore the ancient government. He would not compare that government with the government of Great Britain; but certain he was, that it would be comfort and felicity compared with the tyranny at present exercised in France. Their enormities have already produced universal misery; their misery will drive them to despair; and out of that despair they will look for a remedy in the destruction of all other countries, and particularly that of Great Britain."

His Britannic majesty was pleased to order that general reprisals be made against the ships, goods, and subjects of France; and it was thought that France, already weakened by the struggle, would be crushed and overwhelmed by the additional weight of England.

CHAPTER IV.

Commencement of Hostilities.—Siege of Breda, Klundert, Gertruydenberg, and Williamstadt.—Defeat of the French.—Conduct of Dumouriez.—His Successor, General Dampierre, killed.

THE members of the executive council, aware of the strength of England, determined on carrying the French arms into the heart of Holland, for the purpose of expelling the Stadtholder and annihilating the influence of Great Britain. Preparations for this purpose were made by Dumouriez, with uncommon celerity; and, previous to the commencement of hostilities, the French general addressed a declaration to the inhabitants of Holland, with the view of separating the interests of the republic from those of the Stadtholder. In this declaration he said,

"I enter your country surrounded by the generous martyrs of the revolution of 1787; their perseverance and their sacrifices merit both your confidence and union. I enter your country at the head of sixty thousand free and victorious Frenchmen; sixty thousand more are prepared to defend Belgium, and they also will be ready to follow me should I meet with any resistance."

"We are not the aggressors; for a long time past, the Orange faction hath waged a perfidious and underhand war against us. It is in the Hague that those conspiracies in opposition to your liberties originated; and at the Hague will we look for the authors of your evils."

"People of Batavia! place confidence in a man whose name is not unknown to you; who never failed to perform that which he promised, and who leads to combat those very freemen before whom the Prussians, the satellites of your tyrant, have once before fled, and will again flee. The Belgians already consider us as their deliverers, and I hope you will soon call us yours also."

The French general's troops consisted of no more than 21 battalions, two of which were only in the line, and of these one had never been in action. As the regiments were incomplete, the whole amounted to but 13,700; no more than eight battalions possessed field-pieces, and several of the soldiers were only boys from thirteen to sixteen years of age. On their entrance into the Dutch territories, there being a party ready to declare in favor of the French, and success chiefly depending on the celerity of their movements, Dumouriez had no time either to discipline or organize his troops; but having candidly unfolded to them all the difficulties they were to encounter, he encouraged them by assurances of victory and glory. General Berneron was ordered to advance with the vanguard, and dispatch Lieutenant-colonel Daendels, a Dutch patriot in the service of France, to Mordyck, on purpose to detain all the boats in the neighbourhood, as well as to throw a bridge over the Merk, in order to keep up the communication. These instructions, however, not being executed in time, the Dutch embraced this opportunity of carrying all the small vessels to the other side, under the protection of three armed shallops stationed near Dort. Hereupon, Berneron and Daendels were ordered to advance, while General d'Arçon with the right formed the blockade of Breda, and Col. Le Clerc, with the left, invested Bergen-op-Zoom and Steenberg. The governors of the two last places immediately abandoned all their out-posts; and the foot of Blaw-Sluis near Steenberg being taken, the garrison of the latter was summoned to surrender, while that of Bergen-op-Zoom hazarded a few sallies, which was only productive of deserters, who immediately joined the enemy. Dumouriez now moved forward between the two wings with the rear division of the army to Sevenbergen, and gave orders to besiege Klundert and Williamstadt immediately; while Daendels, by advancing to Nordschantz, was to cut off all intercourse between them.

The siege of Breda was now determined. This place was always considered very strong; for, besides being provided with 200 pieces of cannon, it possessed an excellent pallisade, and was protected by means of an inundation. The garrison consisted of 2200 infantry, and a regiment of dragoons; but the governor, Count de Ryland, was totally destitute of military skill, and the inhabitants strongly attached to the republican party. While a flotilla was preparing to carry the troops across the Mordyck, d'Arçon received orders to attack Breda; and, as the commander-in-chief had determined not to attempt a regular siege, d'Arçon opened no trenches, as usual, but, after erecting two batteries, of four mortars and four howitzers, he immediately summoned the town to surrender. The bombardment continued three days, during which time the enemy kept up a brisk fire; but sixty bombs only remaining, it was found that the siege must be inevitably raised when these were expended.

In this dilemma, Philip Devaux, one of the aides-de-camp, entered the place with a flag of truce, and declared that General Dumouriez was expected every moment with the whole of his army, and that the garrison then should have no quarter. This menace had the desired effect, the governor was alarmed, and, without consulting his officers, immediately capitulated, and was allowed the honors of war. Thus, on the 2d of March, one of the strongest towns in Holland was taken, in the course of a few days, by a detachment of only 3800 men. Here they found 250 pieces of artillery, 5000 muskets, and five vessels, with the loss of but a few men, which was entirely owing to their own temerity.

Two days afterwards, March 4, Klundert surrendered to Berneron. This little fortress was built after a regular plan, and surrounded by fortifications. The governor, a German lieutenant-colonel, defended the place with great bravery, though he had not more than 150 soldiers. After keeping up a smart fire for several days, and perceiving all resistance fruitless, he determined to nail up his cannon, and retire with his few remaining men to Williamstadt. He was unfortunately intercepted by a detachment of Bavarians, under Lieutenant-colonel Hartmann, whom he killed with his own hand. He soon experienced the same fate; and, on searching his body, the keys of Klundert were found in the pocket of this brave commander. In this place the French found fifty-three pieces of cannon, a few mortars, a large quantity of bombs, bullets, and powder.

Gertruydenberg was immediately attacked by d'Arçon, by means of a few cannon, and some mortars, brought from Breda. After a few shot had been fired, Colonel de Vaux entered with a flag of truce, and the governor, Major-general Bedaux, who was eighty years of age, and greatly alarmed, was prevailed upon to capitulate. Here the French got 150 pieces of cannon, 200,000 pounds of gunpowder, 2500 new muskets; but, what was still a greater acquisition, they obtained a good harbour, and more than thirty vessels of different sizes, for the transport of the troops.

Agreeable to orders, Berneron laid siege to Williamstadt; but, though the French were hitherto victorious, they were not so successful in this siege as they expected. Williamstadt, rendered strong both by nature and art, could only be attacked in one part, exhibiting but a small front to the assailants, while supplies of both men and provisions might be thrown in at any time. The gallant governor, the Baron de Boetzelaer, who was made a lieutenant-general during the siege, and afterwards received a present of a valuable sword for himself, and a portion for each of his daughters, from the States of Holland, resolved upon an obstinate defence. The garrison had also the assistance of some British gun-boats, and the landing of a body of guards under the command of his royal highness the Duke of York. Dubois de Crancé and Marescot were sent by Dumouriez to trace out a battery within 100 yards of the walls; but the Dutch made a successful sally, and both these engineers were killed on the spot.

The French, notwithstanding, were able to attempt a passage from Mordyck, where Dumouriez had prepared a flotilla, and vigorous preparations were made for the invasion of Holland. This passage was to be attempted during the night, but in the mean time an event occurred which totally defeated the intentions of the French commander.

The army which had so lately chased the Austrians from the Low Countries became not only dispirited by the absence of its leader, but, through the altercations which arose among its generals, was rendered incapable of active operations. Agreeable to orders, Miranda had laid siege to Maestricht, and commenced a furious bombardment, by which various parts of the city were in flames. The defence, however, was far more vigorous than was expected; for a body of French emigrants, conscious that no mercy could be expected from their republican countrymen if victorious, had, under the command of M. d'Autichamp, displayed uncommon skill and bravery during the siege. General Champmorin's attempt to obtain possession of Venloo was also ineffectual; for, although he had taken the forts of Stevenswert and St. Michel, on the Meuse, the Prussians, anticipating his design, immediately occupied the place.

The Prince de Cobourg, an officer who had distinguished himself during the war against the Turks, arrived at Cologne, and assumed the command of the Austrian forces, while the generals Valence, Stengel, and Dampierre, remained in their cantonments, in the neighbourhood of Liege and Aix-la-Chapelle. As soon as the prince had learned that dissention prevailed among the leaders, and discontent among the troops, he immediately collected his army, and was resolved to commence his military career with some bold achievement. Accordingly General Clairfayt, in pursuance of orders, passed the Roer during night, and not only repulsed the French army on the side of Duren and Juliers, but compelled it to retreat beyond Aldenhoven with the loss of 2000 men. In the interim, the Prince de Cobourg entered Aldenhoven without experiencing any obstructions, and five days after (April 26) obtained a decisive victory. The French, who remained in cantonments, immediately fell back on Liege without fighting. General Leveneur, who presided over the attack of Maestricht on the side of Wyck, thought himself very fortunate in being able to carry away his cannon and cross the Meuse, while General Miranda was under the necessity of entirely relinquishing the siege. Lieutenant-general Lanoue was also obliged to retreat from Aix-la-Chapelle after being defeated at Aldenhoven; and General Valence, with some difficulty saved a column of twenty-seven battalions.

The imperialists crossed the Meuse and entered Liege, where they seized all the magazines belonging to the French; the Prussians, at the same time, obliged General Champmorin to evacuate Stevenswert and Fort St. Michel, and fall back on Diest. In short, the defeat of the republican troops in the Low Countries was so complete, that more than 10,000 men deserted.

Dumouriez, mortified at the ill success of his army, returned to Belgium, and in obedience to the orders of the council, he set out the next morning for Flanders, leaving the troops under the command of General de Flers, with directions to attempt the passage from Gertruydenberg, and in case of success to wait at Dort, in order to receive further instructions. The arrival of the English forces in Holland, the check received by the grand army, and the sudden departure of Dumouriez, discouraged the invaders; and De Flers, instead of effecting a descent, found it necessary, in consequence of the approach of the Prussians, to throw himself into Breda with six battalions of infantry and 200 horse, while Colonel Tilly garrisoned Gertruydenberg with three battalions and 500 cavalry. The rest of the army was conducted to Antwerp, under the command of Colonels de Vaux and Thouvenot, who evacuated the batteries of Mordyck without loss; destroyed the fortifications of Klundert, and prevented the troops from fleeing in disorder.

No brilliancy or prosperity attended the French arms in Germany. Custine had not been able to prevent the Hessians from rendezvousing at Coblenz, whither the King of Prussia also directed his march, and not only occupied the two banks of the Lahn, but seemed inclined to force the general to abandon Frankfort, and shut himself up within the walls of Mentz. Being apprised of their motions, and determined to act as long as possible on the offensive, he immediately marched against the enemy, and though previous information had been obtained of his design, his attack was so bold, that they were obliged to relinquish their positions. In consequence of his temporary success and critical situation, Biron received instructions to send a body of troops to his assistance; and though a senior officer, he determined to put himself and men under his command. Before a junction could be effected, Custine was obliged to withdraw to Mentz in the face of a superior army, collected from all quarters by the King of Prussia. The inhabitants of Frankfort BOOK I. opened one of their gates to the Prussians the very night preceding the succour, and part of the garrison having been put to the sword, it was retaken.

CHAP. IV.

The blockade of Mentz employed the Prussians during the winter; and early in spring the French again took the field. Custine made an irruption into the territories of the Duke of Deux Ponts, and suddenly took possession of the residence of Calsberg, their serene highnesses having escaped with great difficulty. Soon, however, Königstein, with its garrison of 440 men, surrendered to the Prussians; Worms was evacuated, and part of the magazines at Bingen, Kreutznach, and Nierstein seized. Moreover, the states of the empire had declared war against France, and in consequence of the menaces of Vienna and Berlin, had ordained "a junction of arms," and voted the necessary supplies.

On the return of Dumouriez to Antwerp, he issued orders to arrest the deserters from his army, and having reproached the fugitives, he made various changes in the organization of his army, which, even at this period, amounted to 40,000 infantry and 4,500 cavalry. General Valence had the command of the right, the Duke of Chartres of the centre, and General Miranda of the left.

Having retaken Tirlemont from the Austrians, General Dumouriez seized on Gotzenhoven, which he maintained during an engagement of eight hours, between the two advanced guards, supported by the main body of each of the hostile armies.

The French commander-in-chief, inflamed with this slight success, now resolved to be the assailant, and having spent the whole day of March 17 in reconnoitering the position of the imperialists, he posted his troops in order of battle, and prepared his plan of operations. The army, divided into eight columns, was put in motion between seven and eight o'clock in the morning, March 18, which crossed the river without any interruption. General Lamarche, with the first column, entered the plain of Landen, and not finding the enemy there, joined the second, which attacked the village of Oberwinden and the town of Middlewinden, about ten o'clock, with such vigor, that they were both carried. The latter was afterwards retaken by the Austrians, but on account of its importance, the possession of it was disputed during the whole of the day. About the same time, the third column, under the command of General Neuhilly, drove the imperialists from a village where they had taken post; but having abandoned it, the Austrians resumed their former position, and were driven from it again by the Duke of Chartres, who commanded the fourth and fifth columns; but General Desforêts having been wounded in the head with a musket-shot, the republican troops were thrown into confusion, and on the approach of the Austrians, now determined to carry it by assault, it was again relinquished.

The Austrians then descended into the plain between Nerwinden and Middlewinden, and made a furious attack on the French cavalry. General Valence was wounded, and obliged to retire to Tirlemont; the imperialists, notwithstanding, were forced to withdraw. About the same time, another body of the Austrian horse attacked the infantry of the fourth column on the left of Nerwinden with great gallantry; but General Thouvenot, on perceiving their approach, opened his ranks to allow them to pass, and made such a critical discharge of grape and case shot from his artillery, which was assisted by a close fire of musketry from the regiment of Deux Ponts, that nearly the whole of this detachment fell.

As these divisions of the French army met with some success, they passed the night in the field of battle, in order to renew the engagement and complete their victory the next morning. A different fate, however, was reserved for the rest of the republican troops. The sixth and seventh columns, though in possession of Orsmael, were routed with considerable loss, by General Clairfayt; Guiscard, a maréchal-de-camp, was killed, and Generals Rualt and Iller, with several aides-de-camp and others persons belonging to the staff, were among the wounded. General Miranda gave orders to retreat, and withdrew to a position behind Tirlemont. General Champmorin also retired from Leaw, crossed the river by the bridge of Bingen, which he cut down after him, and resumed his position at Oplinter. Dumouriez, alarmed at not hearing from his left flank, sought General Miranda at Tirlemont, and gave him orders to assemble his division during the night, on purpose to occupy the heights of Wommersem, as well as the great road, and the bridges of Orsmael and Nerhelpen, with a view of insuring the passage of the Gette, as well as the retreat of the right and centre. The French army was enabled to withdraw to the heights behind Tirlemont in good order.

The dissimulation of Dumouriez became at this time apparent. Under pretence of treating about the wounded and prisoners, he sent Colonel Montjoye, an officer belonging to his staff, to the headquarters of the Prince de Cobourg, where he had a conference with Colonel Mack, with whom a suspension of arms was agreed upon. Colonel Mack, on the evening of the succeeding day, repaired to Louvain. Some articles were verbally agreed to, viz.

1. "That the imperialists should make no more general attacks, and that the French commander-in-chief should not, on his side, endeavour to give battle.

2. "That in conformity to this tacit convention, the French should retire to Brussels by easy marches and in good order, without being harassed

3. "That the same parties should meet again after the evacuation of the said city, on purpose to agree as to future contingencies."

In conformity to this treaty, the scheming Dumouriez gave orders for abandoning the Netherlands; and after his army had marched through Brussels, an interview took place between him and the adjutant-general of the Austrian army, in the course of which, he announced his intentions of marching to Paris and dissolving the convention. Hereupon it was agreed that the imperialists should either remain passive or act the part of auxiliaries, as occasion might require; but it was expressly stipulated on the other hand that Condé should be delivered up to them until the conclusion of peace and the regulation of indemnities. During these deliberations, the Duke de Chartres, General Valence, Thuvénot, and Colonel Montjoye were present.

Some occurrences happened which tended not a little to defeat the new projects of Dumouriez. On his arrival at the camp of Tournay, he learned that the division under General Neuilly, on its reaching Mons, instead of assuming a position on the heights of Nimy, as he had commanded, had fled to Condé, in Valenciennes, and that the cavalry alone remained in its station. On that very day (March 29) he received a visit from Proly, Desjardins, and Pereira, three deputies from the jacobin society at Paris; who, perceiving his intentions, reported him as an enemy to his country. A dispatch immediately arrived from seven commissioners of the convention, who had assembled at Lisle, summoning his attendance at that city, to answer the accusations against him. His reply on this occasion was guarded. His presence being necessary, he said, for the preservation of an army which he was endeavouring to reform, it was impossible for him to leave it; but if the deputies would repair to his camp, all questions should be answered with candor.

Antwerp having surrendered to a body of 2,000 men under Colonel Mylius, Dumouriez not only abandoned his position at Tournay, but conducted the army of the north to the camp of Bruille, which he connected by means of three bridges of communication with that of Maulde. At the same time, he dispatched General Miaczinski with 4,000 men to occupy Orchies, while the artillery removed to St. Amand, where the head-quarters were established. Dumouriez now began to disclose his intentions to the army, and as the violent proceedings of the jacobins and the cruelty and injustice which had been practised by the convention had rendered them odious to the major part of the troops, he found no difficulty in winning their confidence. To increase the number of those devoted to his person, he transmitted orders to General de Flers and Colonel Tilly, by means of Colonel Mack, to surrender Breda and Gustruydenberg, and return with the 6,000 men intrusted to their command. Having complied with these injunctions, they were permitted to march to his camp with their arms and baggage. Some of the officers, however, particularly Dampierre, and the national battalions, which formed a majority of the soldiery, were determined to support the republican government in opposition to their leader's designs. Three commissioners from the convention, Lequinio, Cochon, and Bellegarde, stationed at Valenciennes, already treated Dumouriez as a rebel, and prohibited money and supplies being sent to his army. A manifesto was published against him, which was distributed among the troops under his command as well as in the neighbouring fortresses.

Six volunteers having desired their general to repair to the bar of the convention, in obedience to orders, else they and many of their companions had sworn to imitate Brutus, and stab him on the spot; different regiments were immediately assembled by Dumouriez's partisans; and during the same day, the commander-in-chief received various addresses from both officers and soldiers, expressing their abhorrence of assassination, and a desire to change the government; some wishing to re-establish the laws and constitution of 1789. Dumouriez, on receiving these petitions, openly endeavoured to obtain possession of the three neighbouring garrisons. Miaczinski was ordered to repair to Lisle, with a large body of troops, on purpose to seize the deputies from the convention, together with all the principal members of the jacobin club. Miaczinski, however, was taken prisoner in Lisle, and having been sent to Paris, was soon after beheaded. Ferrand, whom Dumouriez had raised to the rank of general, had the care of Valenciennes, but l'Ecuyer, the provost of his army, whom he had dispatched thither, immediately disclosed his projects. Condé now appeared to be his last resource; but the deputies on mission had already dispersed manifestoes and assignats among the garrison, and the governor Neuilly was rendered incapable of fulfilling his engagements with Dumouriez.

The commander-in-chief, notwithstanding the failure of these designs, arrested General Beurnonville and four commissioners from the convention, Camus, la Marque, Bancal, and Quinette; who had repaired to his camp to notify his suspension. These he sent under a guard to General Clairfayt, and immediately composed a manifesto in defence of his conduct. An attempt was made by some of the volunteers to shoot him, but owing to the swiftness of his horse, he escaped and got into the Austrian lines. He now drew up two manifestoes in concert with the Prince de Cobourg, in which the latter disclaimed the idea of conquest; and the next morning, at day-break, accompanied by a guard of fifty Austrian dragoons, Dumouriez ventured to his own camp, and endeavoured to regain the confidence of his army. This army he found considerably reduced, for the artillery had retreated to Valenciennes, and several regiments of the infantry were already on their march for the neighbouring fortresses. He attempted in vain to seize the military-chest, and being frustrated in his visionary projects, he escaped, with a few of his friends, to Tournay.

About the beginning of April, a congress had met at Antwerp, composed of the representatives of the combined powers, viz. his serene highness the Prince of Orange and his two sons, his royal highness the Duke of York, their excellencies Lord Auckland, as ambassador from England, Vanderspiegel from Holland, the Prussian, Spanish, and Neapolitan envoys, the Prince of Saxe-Cobourg, the Counts Metternich, Starenberg, Mercy d'Argenteau, and the Generals Knobeldorff and Keller. In consequence of the representations of this assembly, the Prince de Cobourg annulled the manifesto issued at the request of Dumouriez: in which he had disavowed the intention of making conquests, and it was resolved to commence active operations against France.

While French Flanders appeared to be an easy conquest on the one side, Alsace presented the most alluring bait on the other; and great hopes were entertained of its speedy annexation to the head of the German empire. Wurmser, (a native of that province, and now a general in the Austrian service,) accordingly endeavoured to obtain possession of Landau. His threats and allurements, however, could not prevail on the governor to surrender that important fortress.

In the mean time, the convention being informed that the camps of Maulde and Bruille still remained faithful to the republic, General Dampierre was elected commander-in-chief in the place of Dumouriez, who was declared a traitor: and two decrees at the same time passed; by one of which, the severest punishment was enacted against those commanders who entered into any secret negotiations with the enemy: and by the other, the obnoxious law of fraternity was rescinded.

The Prince de Cobourg finding his army greatly strengthened by the accession of a body of Prussians and the arrival of a considerable reinforcement of English and Hanoverian troops under his royal highness the Duke of York, declared, that the armistice was at an end, and on the 7th of April advanced against Maulde, now rendered defenceless in consequence of the disorders which had so recently prevailed among the republican troops. Having secured this strong camp, he prepared to invest Condé, another principal fortress in that neighbourhood.

Dampierre, knowing the dispirited state of his army, remained on the defensive at Famars. The Austrians suddenly attacked his outposts, (April 15,) advancing against ten different points at the same time, but were repulsed by the French commander. Soon after this, Dampierre determined in his turn to attack the allies incamped at Quievrain, in order to prevent the siege of Valenciennes and raise the blockade of Condé. With this view the French, on the 1st of May, marched against the advanced posts of the left wing, as well as those of the centre; but were repulsed in all directions with a prodigious loss of men and cannon.

Considerable bodies of troops from Lisle and the neighbouring garrisons, joined by the main body of the army from the camp of Famars, sallied forth for the purpose of making a more serious assault on the positions assumed by the combined forces. The action, which commenced about seven o'clock in the morning of May 8, was directed chiefly against the posts occupied by General Clairfayt, as well as those in the possession of the Prussians. It continued until 8 o'clock in the evening with unabated vigor, both at the abbey of Vicogne and in the village of Raismes. The French, though baffled and defeated in that quarter, assumed a position in the neighbouring woods, and cannonaded the Prussian camp at St. Amand. The Duke of York, who had arrived early in the morning at the camp of Maulde with the brigade of English guards and a battalion of Hanoverian infantry, marched to their assistance. The Coldstream came up at a critical moment, when the French were advancing towards the great road, and nearly commanded it by the fire of their cannon; but the battalion guns having succeeded in checking the battery opposed to this corps, it moved forward into the wood, and made a charge with fixed bayonets. Another battery, however, opened, which rendered a retreat to the former position necessary; notwithstanding which, the British troops, under the command of Major-general Lake, behaved so gallantly, that they contributed not a little to the success of the day. Dampierre received a mortal wound in the course of this action, his thigh having been carried away by a cannon-shot, and the command of the French troops devolved on Lamarche in right of seniority.

On the morning of May 9, the French began to erect batteries along the front of the Austrian and Prussian lines, commanded by the generals Clairfayt and Knobeldorff. The imperialists were now resolved to carry their works by assault; and, in order to enable as many of the combined forces as possible to take the field, the Duke of York, who was about to return to Tournay with his troops, once more occupied the positions at Maulde and St. Armand. Early the next morning, the two generals advanced at the head of their respective columns, and carried the batteries. The Prince de Cobourg then made preparations to attack the camp of Famars and the whole of the French line from Archies to Maubeuge. The Count Colloredo was stationed so as to keep Valenciennes in check, while General Otto covered Quesnoy; and the Prince of Wirtemberg, at the head of a body of Austrians, continued the blockade of Condé, and rendered a sally in that quarter ineffectual. Three bodies of troops, destined for the attack, were assembled early in the morning of May 13. The first column, under the command of the Duke of York, consisting of sixteen battalions of English, Hanoverian, and Austrian infantry, with a detachment of cavalry and a train of heavy artillery, was to cross the Ronelle, near Orties, in order to turn the right flank of the enemy; while the second, under the command of General Ferraris, after carrying the works thrown up on the right bank of that river, was to co-operate with the forces under his royal highness. A sanguinary engagement now commenced. After a cannonade on both sides, two divisions of hussars passed the Ronelle, without opposition, at the village of Mershe; and, on a body of infantry being ordered to advance, on purpose to take the batteries in flank, the French retreated to the heights behind the village of Famars. When General Ferraris had taken the intrenchments by assault, the Duke of York surveyed the new position assumed by the enemy; but deeming it imprudent to commence an attack on their front, preparations were made to turn their flanks during night. In the interim, General Clairfayt, at the head of a strong column of imperialists, attacked the heights of Anzain. An obstinate resistance was made by the enemy; but the Austrians proved victorious, and obtained a post, which not only overlooked the citadel of Valenciennes, but enabled the Prince de Cobourg to complete the investment of that fortress, the English and Hanoverians being now in possession of the camp of Famars; for the French had evacuated it at night, and, after throwing a body of troops into Valenciennes, effected their retreat across the Scheldt. The imperialists, Hanoverians, and English, behaved on this occasion with distinguished bravery: the killed and wounded, on the part of the British, did not exceed thirty-two, the loss of the allies altogether being no more than 700 men. They took nine pieces of cannon, eight baggage-waggons, upwards of 300 prisoners, and a great number of horses: the amount of the killed, on the part of the French, (which was carefully concealed,) was considerable.

In consequence of this success, the combined forces were able to undertake the siege of Valenciennes, and to invest Condé still closer. General Lamarche apprehensive, from his situation, of fresh defeats, made known his intention of resigning; and Custine, who was recalled from the army of the Moselle, was nominated his successor. This general, notwithstanding the military talents which he displayed in Germany, proved incapable of coping with the victorious foe; he therefore abandoned the neighbouring fortresses, which were immediately possessed by the enemy; and, after a blockade of three months by the imperial forces, the Prince of Wirtemberg became master of Condé, and the garrison were made prisoners of war.

His royal highness the Duke of York, to whom the conduct of the siege of Valenciennes had been intrusted, on the 10th of July summoned the governor to surrender. Different opinions arose respecting the mode of conducting this siege. Colonel Moncrieff, an English engineer, proposed, it is said, that the body of the place should be attacked all at once. The plan, however, suggested by Feld-Zeugmeister Ferraris was adopted; and the fortifications, erected according to the orders of the celebrated Vauban, were approached, as directed. Forty-one days had elapsed after opening the trenches before the attack proved successful. During the night, the covered way, the horn-work, and the advanced flèche, were carried and taken possession of. On this occasion, there were three separate attacks by 900 men each, commanded by Major-general Abercromby, under the superintendence of Lieutenant-general Erbach; and, after a lodgement had been effected, the necessary measures for battering the counter-guard between the horn-work and the body of the place were adopted. His royal highness summoned both the commandant and municipality the next day, declaring that the fate of the city rested entirely upon their answer, this being the last time that any capitulation would be granted. A truce of twenty-four hours was solicited and obtained; a negotiation took place, and the result was, Valenciennes surrendered to the enemy, and the garrison were allowed the honors of war.

Soon after, the French army was obliged to abandon the strong position behind the Scheldt, called Cæsar's camp, on which Cambray was summoned to surrender by the imperial General de Boros. About the same time Mentz was forced to capitulate. The King of Prussia, having possessed himself of Costheim, and frustrated the intentions of an army which had marched under General Houchard to the succour of the garrison, made such effectual sallies, that both this important city and Cassel were delivered up to him. The garrison was not only allowed to march out with all the honors of war, but to

In consequence of the loss of Mentz, the French commander was disgraced, and a combination of other powers now threatened the destruction of France.

CHAPTER V.

Conduct of Russia, Naples, Spain, Portugal, &c.—A new League formed against France.—Operations of the Channel Fleet.—Success of the English Arms in the East Indies.—Triumph of the Jacobins.—Violent Disputes.—A new Constitution accepted throughout France.—Insurrections.—Measures for the Renewal of Hostilities.

THE Empress Catherine of Russia, disgusted with a nation who had put their monarch to death, recalled her minister, and determined to suspend all correspondence with France, "until his most christian majesty should be re-established in those rights and prerogatives assigned to him by human and divine laws." This empress, having entered into a convention with Great Britain, transmitted a letter to the court of Sweden, expressing her wish that the navigation of France should be checked, and the coasts of the Baltic protected.

The various changes which had taken place in the French government were likewise obnoxious to the court of Naples; and though a neutrality was affected, yet, when an opportunity offered, a convention was entered into between their Britannic and Sicilian majesties; and the former not only consented to protect the dominions of the latter by means of a respectable fleet in the Mediterranean, but also to grant a subsidy, in order to stimulate his new ally to vigorous exertions.

Spain had hitherto adhered to a system of moderation; but when the Duke d'Alcudia, a major in the Walloon guards, became the successor of the President of Castile, the intentions of the court of Madrid produced a declaration of hostilities on the part of France. This contributed to render Portugal a party in the war; and D'Arnault, the minister of France, was informed by the police, that the court of Lisbon had given orders for his departure in the course of three days.

The first treaty which Britain entered into was with Prussia, when it was mutually agreed, that the high contracting powers should assist and succour each other during the war against France. It was also stipulated, that they should shut up their ports against the ships of that nation, and not lay down their arms but by common consent, without a restitution of all conquests made upon either of their said majesties, or such of their allies to whom it might be deemed proper to extend this guarantee.

The King of England also entered into a stipendiary treaty with the Landgrave of Hesse Cassel, who consequently agreed to keep a body of 8000 infantry and cavalry, which, by an additional article, was afterwards augmented to 12,000, at the disposal of his Britannic majesty, during the space of three successive years. On this occasion his serene highness exacted a subsidy of two hundred and twenty-five thousand crowns a-year; and demanded, with extreme precision, a remuneration for the loss of men, stores, artillery, &c. Similar engagements were afterwards made with the Margrave of Baden, the Landgrave of Hesse Darmstadt, the Duke of Brunswick, and the Elector of Hanover. A subsidiary treaty was also concluded with the court of Turin; by which it was agreed, on the part of his Sardinian majesty, that during the war he was to keep on foot an army of fifty thousand men, to be employed for the defence of his dominions, as well as to act against the common enemy: and, on the other hand, the King of England agreed to furnish, during the same period, the sum of two hundred thousand pounds sterling a-year, (three months to be always paid in advance,) to keep up a formidable force in the Mediterranean; and not to conclude a peace with the enemy without comprehending in it the entire restitution, to his Sardinian majesty, of all the parts of his dominions which belonged to him at the commencement of the war, and of which the enemy had obtained possession, or might, during the course of hostilities.

Spain had also agreed with Great Britain to shut up her ports against France; and, by means of subsidiary treaties and multiplied negotiations, new enemies were daily rising against France. In the course of one summer, three different armaments were fitted out; and the West Indies, the Mediterranean, and the narrow seas, witnessed the triumph of the British flag. A squadron, under the command of Admiral Laforey, took possession of the island of Tobago on the 14th of April. Having effected a landing in Great Courland Bay, and having marched against the fort Monteil, the governor was summoned to surrender. This he refused; and, in the course of that very night, the English general carried the place by assault. The troops, who were ordered to trust entirely to the bayonet, accordingly advanced to attack the north-west side, and, notwithstanding one of the guides ran away, and the column was separated in mounting the hill, yet the flank companies entered the works, upon which the troops forming the garrison yielded, and were admitted prisoners of war.

The islands of Miquelon and St. Pierre, in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, were surrendered at the first summons to Brigadier-general Ogilvie. An attack made by Major-general Bruce, on the island of Martinico, proved less successful. A detachment of British troops, to the amount of 11,000 men, was landed on the 16th of June; but an alarm having taken place, and their commanding officer being wounded, the expedition was relinquished, and the troops re-embarked.

The governor of Jamaica, having received instructions to attempt an invasion, and the necessary preparations having been made, Commodore Ford sailed from Port Royal, with the 13th regiment, two flank companies of the 49th, and a small detachment of artillery, commanded by Lieutenant-colonel Whitelocke. These having landed at Jeremie, the two forts immediately hoisted English colours. After remaining a few hours there, and leaving some troops, the squadron sailed for the Mole. On being summoned to surrender, Major O'Ferral, who commanded the garrison, consisting of 183 men of the regiment of Dillon, and M. Deneux, the governor of the place, immediately agreed to the terms proposed. Thus an important position of the island of St. Domingo was delivered up to 560 British troops.

An early intimation of the war having been transmitted to the East Indies, the British captured the settlements of Pondicherry, Mahé, and other French possessions on the coast of Coromandel and Malabar, experiencing little or no resistance. The troops which accomplished these objects properly belonged to the East India company, and were under the command of General Stewart.

An armament, under the command of Lord Hood, had been fitted out for the protection of England's allies in the south of Europe: and the chief arsenal in the Mediterranean having been seized, as hereafter mentioned, the situation of France became exceedingly critical.

The British ambassador at Genoa, Mr. Drake, having demanded an instant declaration of war against France, observed, "That neutrality among nations cannot take place but with respect to such wars as are carried on between lawful powers; that to talk of neutrality in the case of a contest between religion and atheism, laws and anarchy, loyalty and perjury, virtue and vice, humanity and murder, is to vilify its very name; and that of course, in the present war against the usurpers of the supreme power in France, no government can declare itself neuter without becoming their accomplice, and degrading itself in the eyes of all Europe." The government of Genoa having proved averse to hostilities, and arms having been made and distributed among the people, in consequence of an order from the senate, passports were demanded by the British and imperial ministers for their departure, and a British squadron blockaded the port of Genoa. Much about the same time, a memorial was presented by Lord Robert Fitzgerald to the Helvetic confederacy, framed on the model of those which Lord Auckland had addressed to the States-General, wherein it is said, that "the vile and ferocious men assembled at Paris under the name of a convention, had manifested their desire of strengthening their connections with Switzerland.—Objects of universal execration, they have had the audacity, magnificent and mighty lords, to make an injurious exception for you alone in Europe.—A lasting peace cannot exist between the wise council of the Helvetic States, and a banditti associated for the purposes of devastation.—In the present circumstances, even neutrality cannot authorize any correspondence with the factious, or their agents. When two legitimate powers are at war, the relations of any state with one or the other cannot be injurious to their respective rights. But the present war being directed against usurpers, all correspondence which a neutral state should carry on with them, would be an acknowledgment of their authority, and, consequently, an act prejudicial to the allied powers." The reply of the Helvetic government was couched in the following expressions: "That a rigid and exact neutrality was the sacred and invariable maxim of their ancestors, and that they trust his Britannic majesty, following the example of his illustrious predecessors, will respect the independence of the Helvetic confederacy." Lord Hervey, who was then ambassador at Florence, did not hesitate to demand the dismissal of M. de la Fotte, the French envoy, in twenty-four hours; and with this demand the grand duke was obliged to comply, from the connection subsisting between the King of Great Britain and his brother the emperor, as well as from his being threatened by Lord Hood, the British admiral; and of course he declared war against France on the 10th of October.

CHAP. V.

The court of London, about the same time, published the following declaration, stating to the world at large, and particularly to the people of France, the views of his Britannic majesty:

"His majesty by no means disputes the right of France to reform its laws. It never would have been his wish to employ the influence of external force with respect to the particular form of government to be established in an independent country. Neither has he now that wish, except in so far as such interference has become essential to the security and repose of other powers. Under these circumstances he demands from France, and he demands with justice, the termination of a system of anarchy which has no force but for the purposes of mischief. The king demands that some legitimate and stable government should be established, founded on the acknowledged principles of universal justice, and capable of maintaining, with other powers, the accustomed relations of union and peace. It is for these objects that he calls upon the people to join the standard of an hereditary monarchy; not for the purpose of deciding, in this moment of disorder, calamity, and public danger, on all the modifications of which this form of government may hereafter be susceptible, but in order to unite themselves once more under the empire of law, of morality, and religion."

No sooner had the French armies experienced a series of disasters, than the faction which had overturned the throne of France, and put the unfortunate king to death, began to assume a sanguinary appearance. A terrible contest took place, when Danton, Marat, Collot d'Herbois, and Robespierre, were destined to overcome Roland, Brissot, Vergniaud, and Gensonné. A new revolution was achieved on the 31st of May. At three o'clock in the morning, the alarm-bell was rung, the barriers were shut, and the capital appeared in confusion. Henriot, the commander of the national guard, instead of taking the proper measures for the protection of the convention, was a party in the plot against it, being entirely devoted to Robespierre, a man of infamous character. After the tumult had continued a considerable time, a deputation from the revolutionary committees appeared at the bar of the convention, and demanded the immediate suppression of the commission of twelve, which had been nominated for the purpose of restraining anarchy; a revolutionary army of sans culottes; a decree of accusation against twenty-two legislators, and a diminution of the price of bread. They likewise insisted that certain deputies should be dispatched to the south, in order to terminate a counter-revolution that prevailed there: at the same time they suggested the arrest of Claviere, the minister of public contributions, and le Brun, the minister for foreign affairs. Their enmity was particularly directed against the Girondists, who still endeavored to keep their ground. The convention refused to comply, but finding itself besieged and imprisoned in its own hall, the members were at length intimidated into compliance. They not only decreed the arrest of all the obnoxious deputies, but proscribed those who endeavored to escape by flight.

In order to overthrow the Girondists, these deputies were brought to trial before the revolutionary tribunal, October 24. The persons accused were twenty-two in number; the most distinguished of whom were Brissot, Vergniaud, Valazé, Sillery, Fauchet, Gensonné, Ducos, Lacaze, and fourteen others. The procuring a declaration of war against Austria, Britain, and Holland, was one of the crimes laid to their charge. These deputies were convicted for having conspired against the unity and indivisibility of the republic, and for provoking a rebellion in the departments of the south, and in that of Calvados. Valaze stabbed himself the moment the sentence was pronounced, but the remaining twenty-one were conveyed to the Place de la Revolution, October 30, and publicly executed. They met their fate with uncommon fortitude, and some exclaimed, "Vive la République," under the bloody axe of the guillotine.

At this time the members of the convention displayed the most shocking impiety. The churches were shut by order of the commune of Paris. The year was divided into twelve months of thirty days each, and the months into three decades; a respite from labor was allowed on the tenth day, the observance of a sabbath being entirely demolished. Cruelty was another characteristic; an insurrection having taken place in Lyons, which was consequently besieged, the deputy, Freron, entering this devoted town, ordered a number of guillotines to be erected, and announced, that "Terror was the order of the day." But he was surpassed in ferocity by Collot d'Herbois, whose proconsulship in the south was one continued series of bloodshed. A chosen band of Parisian jacobins and a column of the revolutionary army marched into Lyons, as the precursors of his barbarity. The guillotine was deemed too slow for his insatiable vengeance; therefore the bayonets of the infantry, the sabres of the cavalry, grape-shot and artillery were occasionally resorted to, in order to accelerate his sanguinary deeds.

The situation of France, at this time, was desperate. By a decree of August 8, all Frenchmen were declared to be at the service of their country until her enemies should be driven from the territories of the republic. "The young men shall march to the combat; the married ones shall forge arms and transport the provisions; the women shall fabricate tents and clothes, and attend the military hospitals; the children shall make lint to serve as dressings for the wounds of the patriots; while the old men shall cause themselves to be carried to the public squares to excite the courage of the warriors, to preach the unity of the republic, and inspire hatred against kings." New and extraordinary measures were adopted to supply the wants of the immense armies now about to be collected from all quarters. Assignats were not only circulated in large quantities, but their value maintained for some time, at a rate nearly equivalent to gold; and when this resource began to fail, revolutionary taxes were imposed. Equality being a doctrine which prevailed, the wealth of the opulent was seized upon in the name of the republic for the support of the poor; great cities were crowded with manufactures of salt-petre; the towns changed into founderies, and the houses into arsenals, in order to supply the troops with arms and gunpowder.

Eleven distinct armies, which seemed to form a chain around the frontiers of France, were provided at a time when all Europe ridiculed the idea of a nation rising in mass. Bachelors from eighteen to forty years of age were put in permanent requisition, and a draft of three hundred thousand made at once. By these means they were able to strengthen and new model the army of the north, extending from Dunkirk to Maubeuge; that of the Ardennes reaching from Maubeuge to Longwy; that of the Moselle, from Longwy to Bitche; that of the Rhine, from Bitche to Porentrui; that of the Alps, from the Aisne to the borders of the Var; that of Italy, from the Maritime Alps to the mouth of the Rhône; that of the Oriental Pyrenées, from the mouth of the Rhone to the Garonne; that of the Western Pyrenées, from the department of the Upper Pyrenées, to the mouth of the Gironde; that of the coast of Rochelle, from the mouth of the Gironde to that of the Loire; that of the coasts of Brest, from the mouth of the Loire to St. Maloes; and that of the coasts of Cherbourg, from St. Maloes to the northern department.

In the mean time, the allied courts agreed to divide their forces, and while the Austrians undertook the siege of Quesnoy, his royal highness the Duke of York, at the head of the English troops, and a body of Dutch and Hanoverians, advanced and occupied a camp in the neighbourhood of Menin. As soon as the French understood that the combined forces intended to separate, they determined once more to resume offensive operations, and overcome those warriors, now divided, whom they were unable to conquer when united. Advantage was taken of the inactivity of the Prussians after the conquest of Mentz, and drafts were immediately made from the armies of the Rhine and the Moselle, while the new levies were clothed and disciplined. Houchard, now celebrated by his achievements in Germany, and who had ascended through all the various military gradations, from the station of a trooper to the chief command, after possessing, in succession, the command of the forces stationed on the banks of the Rhine and Moselle, was placed at the head of the army of the north.

CHAPTER VI.

Renewal of Hostilities.—The French defeated at Lincelles, Oost Capelle, &c.—Siege of Dunkirk.—

Battles of Hondschoote and of Maubeuge.—The combined Fleets enter the Mediterranean.—Siege of Toulon.

THE French, as it had been determined, became the aggressors, and having attacked Lincelles, a post lately taken and occupied by command of the hereditary Prince of Orange, Major-general Lake, with three battalions, consisting of the first, the coldstream, and the third regiment of guards, was sent to the assistance of the Dutch forces, who had unfortunately retreated by a different road. Notwithstanding this discouraging event, and the evident superiority of the enemy, an immediate attack was resolved upon. The English, who were accordingly formed on the 18th of August, advanced under a heavy fire against a redoubt of uncommon size and strength, erected upon a height in front of Lincelles. Having fired three or four rounds, they charged with bayonets, stormed the works, drove out the enemy, dispersed them after they had rallied, and took about fifty prisoners and eleven pieces of cannon. From the concurring testimony of the prisoners, it appeared that the French had twelve battalions at the post, and must have been upwards of 5000 men. Lieutenant-colonel Boswell of the coldstream, and Lieutenant de Peyster of the royal artillery, were killed.

About the same time the French were defeated at Oost Capelle, Rexpede, and Hondschoote, by Field-marshal Freytag, at the head of the Hanoverians, who took 200 prisoners and 11 pieces of cannon, while the Duke of York advanced with the besieging army in three columns from Furnes, in order to attack the camp of Ghivelde. The enemy abandoned this position during the night, and a redoubt in the course of the following day. In the mean time, Field-marshal Freytag seized on the ports of Warmarthe and Eckelsbeck, and the bridge of Lefferink's Hock. The English, also, after repulsing a sally and experiencing some loss in approaching the place, obtained possession of the ground of Dunkirk, which was immediately summoned in the name of the King of Great Britain. The most effectual measures had been taken by the committee of public safety for the defence of that place. General Souham, who had risen from the ranks, was ordered to march, with a chosen body of troops, to the defence of the garrison; these soon after entered the town, under the command of Hoche, an adjutant-general, but formerly a private in the French guards, it being the boast of France, at this time, that merit, and not birth, should be the chief recommendation. O'Moran, a native of Ireland, who commanded at Cassel, being suspected of treachery by Hoche, was seized, conducted to Paris, and, having been brought to trial and condemned by the revolutionary tribunal, was guillotined. Houchard having arrived with a great body of troops on the 6th of September, the French, in order to relieve the place by general and frequent attacks, marched out from the camp of Cassel, as well as from the towns of Bergues and Dunkirk, for the purpose of assaulting the whole of Field-marshal Freytag's posts. The French, though they met with a gallant resistance, not only obtained possession of Bambecke, Rousebrughe, and Poperhinghe, but obliged part of the enemy to retreat to Hondschoote. On the 7th of September, the field-marshal was attacked again; and, on the succeeding morning, the centre of the line was forced, and General Walmoden driven behind a canal, with the loss of about 300 men and three pieces of cannon. In the course of this action, Field-marshal Freytag and Prince Adolphus were both wounded, and for some time prisoners. His royal highness, the commander-in-chief, was obliged to abandon his position, and leave behind him thirty-two heavy cannon, much baggage, and many of the military stores. Thus the siege of Dunkirk was relinquished; but the general, Sir William Erskine, conducted the retreat with equal ability and success.

Notwithstanding this victory, and the subsequent capture of Furnes and Menin, Houchard was immediately arrested. The four following charges, drawn up by Barrere, and preferred against him, afforded no proof of guilt, and were undoubtedly exaggerated accusations.

1. That after defeating the English, he did not drive them into the sea.

2. That when he had surrounded the Dutch, he did not cut them to pieces.

3. That he sent no succour to the troops butchered at Cambray.

4. That he abandoned Menin, and in his retreat exposed his army to considerable danger.

Houchard suffered by the guillotine at Paris, November 15, 1793.

Care was taken to reward such officers as had distinguished themselves. Jourdan, who had attacked the right and centre of the camp at Hondschoote; and Hoche, who had charged the left wing, were both promoted. A decree passed at the same time, declaring, "That the army of the North had deserved well of the country."

The Austrians had been more fortunate than the English: Quesnoy was taken, and the garrison made prisoners of war. The French were also defeated at Villers en Couchée; and the Prince de Cobourg, having passed the Sambre, drove all the detached bodies of the enemy into the entrenched camp of Maubeuge, and actually invested both it and the fortress; while Field-marshal Clairfayt threatened both Cambray and Bouchain.

A formidable train of heavy artillery having been brought into the field, and numerous bodies of troops assembled, the representatives of the people not only harangued the army, but placed themselves at the head of the columns, while another plebeian leader was found in the person of Jourdan. As soon as this general was invested with the chief command, he resolved to have recourse to the same system which had proved so fortunate at Hondschoote. An attack was immediately made on the troops posted near the village of Wattignes, which having proved ineffectual, was repeated the next morning with success. The communication with the army of observation being now cut off, and the Prince de Cobourg beaten in an action that lasted two successive days, it was deemed prudent to repass the Sambre. Jourdan was the only French general, since the commencement of the campaign, who had defeated Cobourg in a pitched battle.

The French soon afterwards seized on Werwick and Furnes; they also obtained possession of Menin, and were only prevented from occupying Nieuport by the gallant defence of Colonel de Wurmb; in consequence of which, time was given for the arrival of Generals Grey and Dundas, who secured the possession of that place by means of the same troops with which they afterwards achieved so many conquests in the West Indies. Major-general Kray, under the direction of the Duke of York, made a successful attack upon Marchiennes, which cost the enemy about 2000 troops, including killed and wounded, and twelve pieces of cannon.

While terror and insurrection alternately reigned in the south of France, the fleet of Great Britain, under the orders of Lord Hood, and that of Spain, commanded by Don Juan de Langara, had made their appearance in the Mediterranean. This event inspired the malcontents with new hopes, and confirmed the spirit of revolt which appeared to be every where present. The victories of the combined armies, the recent misfortunes of the republic, the scarcity of corn, the hostile conduct of the Italian States, and above all, the countenance and protection of England, seemed to indicate a successful resistance to the zealots of the revolution.

The English admiral, not failing to take advantage of the commotions which prevailed in the great cities of the southern departments, appeared off the island of Hieres, and received commissioners from Toulon and Marseilles on board the Victory, that carried his flag. In this conference it was determined, that the first constitution should be recognized; that the English should take possession of all the towns delivered up in the name of Louis XVII.; and that a supply of corn should be furnished for the use of the inhabitants. A preliminary declaration was issued on the following day by Lord Hood, wherein he stated, "That if a candid and explicit declaration in favor of monarchy was made at Toulon and Marseilles, and the standard of royalty hoisted, the ships in the harbour dismantled, and the port and forts provisionally placed at his disposal, the people of Provence should have the assistance of his Britannic Majesty's fleet, and not an atom of private property be touched." The British admiral likewise observed, "That having no other view than that of restoring peace to a great nation, upon just, liberal, and honorable terms, whenever this event shall take place, the port, with all the ships in the harbour, shall be restored to France, with all the stores of every kind, agreeable to the schedule that may be delivered."

A proclamation was also issued by Lord Hood, in which, after descanting on the misery and anarchy of France, he observed, "That he had come to offer them the assistance of the force with which he was furnished by his sovereign, in order to spare the further effusion of human blood, to crush with promptitude the factions, to re-establish a regular government in France, and thereby maintain peace and tranquillity in Europe."—"Therefore," added his lordship, "decide definitively and with precision; trust your hopes to the generosity of a loyal and free nation, in whose name I have just given a unequivocal testimony to the well-disposed inhabitants of Marseilles, by granting to the commissioners sent on board the fleet under my command a passport for procuring a quantity of grain, of which that city stands so much in need. Be explicit, and I fly to your succour, in order to break the chain which surrounds you, and to be the instrument of making many years of happiness succeed to four years of misery and anarchy, in which your deluded country has been involved." These declarations had the desired effect for a while, as they were communicated by the general committee, immediately on the receipt of them, to the sections of Toulon; who, in the name of the inhabitants, returned an answer expressive of "their unanimous wish to reject a constitution which does not promote their happiness, to adopt a monarchical government, such as was originally decreed by the constituting assembly of 1789; and that in consequence they have proclaimed Louis XVII. son of Louis XVI. king, sworn to acknowledge him, and no longer to suffer the despotism of the tyrants which at this time rule France. The white flag shall be hoisted the moment the English squadron anchors in the road of Toulon. The ships of war now there shall be disarmed, and the citadel and forts on the coast shall be provisionally at the disposal of the British admiral; to be restored to the French nation, in the same state, on the re-establishment of peace."

Though the chief inhabitants of Toulon had subscribed to the above resolutions, yet some of the people, and even the galley-slaves, were unwilling to surrender the port, arsenal, and forts, in trust to Lord Hood. The chief opposition to these measures originated with the sailors on board the fleet. St. Julien was a powerful adversary to the views of the British commander, though Rear-admiral Trogoff had expressed his consent. The former having been charged by two of the deputies on mission at Marseilles, to adopt proper measures for the safety of the navy, immediately assembled and made known this order to the crew of each man of war, by whom he was instantly elected admiral in chief. Trogoff perceiving this, retired to the city, and took possession of the forts on the left of the harbour. Various measures were now adopted, in order to gain over the captains, but in vain; it having been declared by the council of officers, "that they would rather demolish the city, and perish themselves, than consent to the entrance of the enemy's squadron into the port of Toulon." Some of the townsmen, however, anxious to prevent extremities, entered into a negotiation for the purpose of winning over the respective commanders. Trogoff having hoisted his flag on board a corvette, under protection of the ramparts, immediately sailed for, and anchored in the roads; then having fired a gun, he threw out a signal for the ships to join him. All the vessels, except seven, saluted their former commander, and placed themselves under his care. St. Julien, finding it impossible, with the assistance of the crews of the seven vessels that remained with him, to oppose the entrance of the combined fleets, made his Fifteen hundred men having been landed from the English fleet, took, by means of a detachment under Captain Elphinstone, immediate possession of fort Malgue, and of the batteries at the mouth of the harbour. On the 28th of August, the French ships were warped into the inner road, according to agreement; and the Spanish admiral having joined on the 29th, the combined squadrons anchored in the outer road, and 1000 Spaniards were sent on shore to augment the English garrison. Rear-admiral Goodall was appointed governor, and Rear-admiral Gravina commander of the troops. Trogoff, who had repaired to the combined fleet, remained on board the Commerce de Marseilles; and numbers of the French sailors having continued refractory, were sent to a French port.

In the interim, Marseilles was taken by General Carteaux; and the wreck of the departmental army, accompanied by numbers of both sexes, sought the protection of the English in Toulon. Barras and Freron, the two national commissioners at Marseilles, mortified at the success of the combined squadrons, made extraordinary exertions for the recovery of this valuable sea-port. They pressed the siege of Lyons, in order that the troops employed in the conquest of that city should give their assistance on this occasion; and forced a loan of four millions of livres from the merchants of Marseilles. Supplies, both in men and assignats, were also granted by the convention, for the accomplishment of this re-capture.

The English and Spanish had only taken possession of Toulon for a few hours, when General Carteaux approaching, took post at a small distance from it, while the army destined for his assistance were collecting. On the 31st of August, Captain Elphinstone marched out with a body of troops, consisting of 600 men, half English and half Spanish, and found the French force to consist of about 700 men, with ten pieces of cannon and a few cavalry. They were stationed in the village of Ollouilles, upon the side of a steep hill, having a deep ravine in front, with a stone bridge over it, defended with two pieces of artillery. The windows of the adjoining houses were filled with musquetry; and at a ruinous castle, about 200 yards further up the eminence, were posted a couple of cannon, the walls of the adjacent vineyards being lined with troops.

Captain Elphinstone determined on an immediate attack, though it was now near seven o'clock in the evening, and the French royalists and cannon expected from Toulon had not arrived. He accordingly kept up an incessant fire on the artillery stationed at the bridge, and advancing in column, rushed forward on the enemy; who instantly abandoned all their posts, and left the victors in possession of their horses, cannon, ammunition, and two stand of colours.

The French general, however, having collected a body of 5000 men, not only harrassed the garrison on the 8th of September, but obtained possession of the gorges of Ollouilles, and occupied one of the advanced posts. On this occasion the Spaniards, being 400, and the national guards, 150, who had been left there, suffered considerably; whereupon the combined powers deemed it prudent to concentrate their forces within the forts that protected the place.

The zeal and industry of the English, now commanded by Lord Mulgrave, in the capacity of brigadier-general, had rendered Toulon impregnable. As the forts Faron, Balaguier, La Malgue, and L'Equillete, were overlooked and commanded by the adjacent hills, these eminences were judiciously crowned with redoubts. A new fort was also constructed at Malbousquet; encampments were formed at St. Roch, Equillete, and Balaguier; the last of which was the grand camp of the English, and Little Gibraltar of the French. All the redoubts were defended by heavy artillery, taken from the lower decks of the French line of battle ships. Moreover, at this period, a body of infantry from the Spanish army in the Roussillon entered the place; 2000 of his Sicilian majesty's best soldiers, under the command of the brigadier-general Pignatelli, arrived on board a small squadron, and more were daily expected; and a considerable detachment from the army of the King of Sardinia, consisting entirely of grenadiers and chasseurs, was sent to the succour of the garrison.

In the mean time the besieging army was supplied with an immense quantity of artillery, and became indefatigable in making preparations for the attack, while the other side was equally vigorous in defending detached posts. The French having opened two masked batteries at La Petite Garenne, and a third at Les Gaux on the following day, (Sept. 18,) sunk one of the gun-boats employed against them. Lord Mulgrave, on the 21st of September, sent a detachment to occupy the heights of La Grasse, which commanded a full view of all the enemy's position to the eastward of Toulon; and this important post, which completely covered the outward roadstead, was put in a complete state of defence, heavy cannon having been dragged up a very steep ascent by the British seamen, with infinite labour and extraordinary expedition.

A plan, however, had been conceived and executed by the enemy, which rendered the possession of Toulon, even at this early period of the siege, precarious. Various bodies of men having been detached in different directions, in order to attract the attention of the garrison, a bold attack was made on the important post of Faron, on the night of September 30. A piquet of 60 men was in consequence of this driven in from the Pas de la Malue about break of day: and on returning to the redoubt of Faron, it was found that it had been abandoned by the Spanish garrison; which, as well as the summit of an adjoining mountain, hitherto deemed almost inaccessible, was taken possession of by the French.

When news of this unfortunate event reached Toulon, a council of officers was assembled, and it was determined to make an attack upon the west, while Governor Elphinstone effected a diversion on the side of the redoubt of Faron. Lord Mulgrave, with a column consisting of British and Piedmontese troops, led the way on the 1st of October; while Admiral Gravina, with another consisting of Spaniards and Neapolitans, followed; the care of Toulon and fort La Malue having been, in the mean time, undertaken by Lord Hood. The enemy defended their position, and an obstinate engagement ensued. At length the French were obliged to abandon the redoubt, and retire in confusion. The action was short, but hot; and the French had upon the heights from 1000 to 2000 men, the flower of the eastern army; but not a fourth part of which, as supposed, ever returned to head-quarters, for those who fell not by bullet or bayonet, broke their necks in tumbling headlong over the precipices in their flight.

On the 8th of October, a successful sally was also made against the new-erected batteries, which the enemy had constructed at La Hauteur des Moulins and La Hauteur de Reinier. The vice-admiral being apprehensive lest the fleet might suffer from the latter, it was determined to destroy them. A detachment of British infantry, marines, Piedmontese, and French royalists, was accordingly ordered under arms at eight o'clock at night, Oct. 16, for that purpose. Their march to the top of the height was performed with all possible expedition, the troops observing the greatest order and silence; by which, with the assistance of an intelligent French deserter, who answered the sentinels of the enemy as they passed, the advanced party arrived at the entrance into their first battery perfectly undiscovered. The first sentinel having been put to death, the grenadiers and light infantry of the British line, under the command of Capt. Stewart of the 25th regiment, very gallantly rushed in, and put every man to the bayonet that opposed them.

The French army, notwithstanding, increased daily, and skirmishes continually took place. At length a large detachment of the enemy, under General Lapoype, stormed and took possession of Cape Brun; which, by means of their superior numbers, they carried, after an obstinate resistance. When news of this unfortunate event reached Lord Mulgrave, he marched out against them, but no engagement took place; and the fate of the garrison became every day more critical. BOOK I.

On the 27th of October, a reinforcement, consisting of the 1st battalion of the royals, the 18th regiment, and a battalion of the royal artillery, arrived from Gibraltar, along with Lieutenant-general O'Hara, who had been appointed governor of Toulon and its dependencies. Fort Mulgrave, on the heights of Balaguier, one of the most essential belonging to the place, was repeatedly attacked in November by the French, but gallantly defended by the British troops, though with considerable loss.

Admiral Lord Hood, Sir Gilbert Elliot, and General O'Hara, being now appointed Commissioners plenipotentiary under the great seal of England, and being all present, proceeded to act in the name of the King of Great Britain. They accordingly communicated his majesty's declaration, stating, "that when monarchy shall be restored in France, and a treaty of peace concluded, the town, forts, and harbour of Toulon, together with the ships and stores therein, should be restored according to the engagement entered into by the vice-admiral." The inhabitants, however, were anxious for the presence of Monsieur, brother to Louis XVI. whom they wished to receive in the character of Regent of France, but this favor was denied.

In the mean time the enemy became more strong, and a powerful army invaded Toulon. Dugommier was now appointed commander-in-chief of the French army; and as the surrender of this great naval arsenal greatly depended on the management of the immense artillery employed against it, an engineer capable of this great enterprise was most assiduously sought. Napoleon Bonaparte, an obscure Corsican, was at length deemed worthy of the trust. This extraordinary character, who lately set all Europe at defiance, shall be the subject of a brief memoir in our next book, in which he will appear a more conspicuous actor. Having now offered his services, and being strongly recommended for his resolution and perseverance, he was readily employed on the present occasion by the deputy Barras.

Bonaparte, convinced that the possession of Malbousquet, one of the principal out-posts of Toulon, would enable him to bombard the town and arsenal, immediately opened a strong battery of heavy cannon and mortars on the height of Arenes; which, by means of an incessant fire of shot and shells, annoyed the position as intended. Governor O'Hara, in order to secure this important post, determined to destroy the new works, termed the convention battery, and bring off the artillery.

BOOK I. Having obtained a reinforcement of seamen from the fleet to defend some redoubts from which he intended to withdraw the troops, he sent out at five o'clock in the morning of November 30, under the command of Major-general David Dundas, a detachment, consisting of 400 British, 300 Sardinians, 600 Neapolitans, 600 Spaniards, and 400 French. These different bodies were fortunate enough to surprise the redoubt, though obliged to cross a river on a single bridge, to divide afterwards into four columns, to march across olive-grounds, and to ascend a very considerable height cut into vine-terrasses. These arduous objects having been effected, the troops, flushed with success, rushed forward and pursued the enemy down the hill. The French general, taking advantage of this rashness, immediately advanced with a considerable body of troops, attacked the disordered assailants, and obliged them, in their turn, to make a precipitate retreat. On this occasion, the brave Lieutenant-general O'Hara received a wound in the arm, and was taken prisoner, while sitting down under a wall, faint with the loss of blood. Several other officers fell also into the hands of the enemy, who now began to make nearer approaches to the place, and, by means of their batteries, not only attacked the posts of Malbousquet, Le Brun, and fort Mulgrave, on the heights of Belaguiet, but also threatened a general assault. At this time the republican army amounted to nearly 40,000 men, while the allied troops, composed of different nations, never exceeded 12,000 rank and file.

The enemy being determined to push on the siege with increased ardor, by means of fresh supplies, who continually relieved the fatigued troops, opened two new batteries on Fort Mulgrave, at two o'clock in the morning of December 16, and from these and three former ones continued a very heavy cannonade and bombardment, which killed several of the allied troops, and destroyed the works. The next day having proved rainy, they afterwards continued to assemble, secretly, a large body of forces; and by these means, they stormed the fortifications, and entered with screwed bayonets by that side defended by the Spaniards. The allied troops were consequently obliged to retire towards the shore of Belaguiet.

Another attack took place at day-break on all the posts occupied by the garrison on the mountain of Faron. These were repulsed, however, on the east side, by about 700 men, under the command of Col. Le Jermagnan, a Piedmontese officer, who fell in this engagement; notwithstanding, the French found means to penetrate by the back of the mountain, though 1800 feet high, so as to occupy that side which overlooked Toulon.

In consequence of the enemy's success, a coun-

oil of flag and general officers assembled; and, as it was deemed impracticable to regain the posts that had been taken, on account of the superior number of the republican forces, it was determined to evacuate Toulon. The troops were accordingly withdrawn; and, in the course of that evening, the combined fleet occupied a new station in the outer road. The sick, wounded, and British field-artillery, were sent off early on the 18th of December; the Neapolitans, after abandoning the port of Misissey without orders, embarked at noon; and during the night measures were taken to withdraw the British, Piedmontese, and Spaniards, now not exceeding 7000 men. The town, as well as some of the ships, being now under the command of the enemy by their shot and shells, Lord Hood gave orders for the boats of the fleet to assemble near Fort Malgue, in order that the retreat should take place as speedily as possible. His lordship had devised a plan for the destruction of all the French men of war and the arsenal, but the absolute necessity of a sudden evacuation prevented the complete execution of this design, which had been intrusted to Sir Sidney Smith. This gentleman, on entering the dock-yard, perceived that the artificers had already substituted the three-colored cockade in the place of the white one: about 600 galley-slaves, who had broken their fetters, grew enraged at his operations, and exhibited a determined resistance, when Sir Sidney Smith pointed the guns of two vessels in order to keep them in subjection. He then set fire to ten ships of the line and the arsenal, as well as to the mast-house, the great storehouse, and other buildings; but the success expected from the conflagration was prevented by the calmness of the evening. Add to which, the Spaniards, instead of scuttling and sinking, set fire to the powder-ships; but they, as well as the English, were prevented from cutting the boom, and destroying the men of war in the bason, by the repeated volleys of musquetry from the flag-ship and the wall of the royal battery. However, the Hero and Themistocles were set on fire, and the party left for this purpose effected their retreat after a most desperate service: by day-light, December 19, all the British, Spanish, and Sicilian ships, crowded with the unfortunate inhabitants, were out of the reach of the enemy's vengeance. Rear-admiral Trogoff, on board the Commerce de Marseilles, with the Puissant and Pompée, two other ships of the line, and the Pearl, Arethusa, and Topaze frigates, with several Corvettes, formed part of the English fleet, with which Lord Hood proceeded to Hieres Bay, and soon after landed the men, women, and children, with which his decks had been loaded.

The besieging army, which had provided 4,000 ladders for an assault, entered Toulon at seven o'clock in the morning of December 19, being the day after it had been evacuated by the combined army. Here, as well as at Marseilles and Lyons, the most cruel punishments were inflicted on the royalists. The sanguinary conquerors disgraced themselves by a dreadful and indiscriminate slaughter. Workmen were absolutely invited from all the neighbouring departiments to destroy the principal houses; and the population of Toulon, which now received the name of Port de la Montagne, became visibly decreased by the daily butchery that took place; for all suspected of being inimical to the republican party, were shot or guillotined.

CHAPTER VII.

Action at Pirmasens.—Landau invested—The Lines of Wissembourg carried.—Various Actions, —Fort Louis surrendered.—War in La Vendée.—War with Spain and Sardinia.

WE shall now narrate the various successes of the campaign on the banks of the Rhine. When the army of the Moselle had been compelled to withdraw behind the Sarre, the Duke of Brunswick again took the field, and the republicans, who had marched out against him at Pirmasens, were defeated, on the 15th of September; for, by turning the flanks of the assailants, the duke took 3,000 of them prisoners, and obtained twenty-seven pieces of cannon and two howitzers. Hitherto the Austrians had contended on unequal terms with the army of the Rhine, but the Duke of Brunswick, in order to support them, surprised a corps of French encamped near Bitche, and destroyed all the camp equipage belonging to it; while Kalkreuth defeated another body of assailants, and cut to pieces the sans culottes regiment.

Landau was invested by General Wurmser, who soon after advanced against the lines of Lauter and Wissembourg. These he attacked with his troops divided into six columns, carried by assault the various redoubts constructed in front of the French camps, took all the tents, nine standards, and twenty-six pieces of artillery; and, had not the retreat of the enemy been favored by a fog, the greater part must have perished. On this occasion the French declared that they were betrayed, and Lambert, a general of brigade, was condemned to death at Strasbourg, for having abandoned one of the principal redoubts at the attack of the lines of Wissembourg. To add to the misfortunes of the French army, Haguenau surrendered to General Mezáros; and, on the 17th of October, the enemy were beaten at Brumpt, and the important position at Wauzenau was, with all the camp-equipage, taken by the Austrians, while Fort Louis, nearly at the same time, after a siege of four days, surrendered with a garrison of 4,000 men.

The army of the Rhine having been reinforced with that of the Moselle, and considerably increased by means of new levies, Pichegru, lately a serjeant of artillery, and Hoche, were the generals employed on this occasion. The tide of victory now began to flow in another direction. The Prussians were attacked and defeated at Sarbruck, on the 17th of November. Early on the 18th their camp at Bliescastel was stormed. On the 21st, Deux Ponts was captured; but, on the 29th, and 30th, the Duke of Brunswick, in two attacks near Lautern, repulsed the enemy with great loss.

The victories of Pichegru now commenced. On the 8th of December, he took all the redoubts which defended Haguenau, at the point of the bayonet. The allies were driven from the town with great slaughter, and the heights of Reifhoffen, Jaudershoffen, and Wrotte, were successively stormed. The heights of Wrotte were strongly fortified, and deemed almost impregnable. Pichegru attacked them with his artillery, but, finding that this proved ineffectual, he marched up to the intrenchments, which he completely carried, after a strong resistance of three hours, and got possession of all the posts which the allied army had abandoned. On the 26th of December he triumphantly entered Wissembourg. The siege of Landau was raised when it was reduced to the greatest distress. Fort Louis was evacuated, and Kaiserslautern, Gernersheim, and Spire, submitted to the French. General Wurmser retreated to the Rhine, and the Duke of Brunswick fell back to protect Mentz.

In La Vendée, however, the republicans were not so successful. The towns of Saumur and Machicoul had, in the course of the summer, been seized by the royalists; who, though afterwards defeated before Nantz, and frequently beaten by the garrison of Mentz, still kept possession of these places. Barrere having obtained a decree for terminating this war in the course of a single month, the following ridiculous proclamation was issued to the army of the west:

"Soldiers of liberty! The rebels of La Vendée ought to be exterminated before the end of the month of October; the safety of the country requires, the impatience of the French commands, your courage ought to accomplish it. The national gratitude awaits all those who fight to secure liberty and equality."

Such was the presumption of the impatient Barrere, that, in consequence of the successes obtained at Mortagne, Chollet, Chatillon, and Beaupreaux, he soon after announced the total extinction of the rebellion; while Merlin of Thionville, on his arrival from the western army, declared, with savage ecstasy, "that the insurgent territories were reduced to a heap of ashes, and soaking in blood." On the contrary, the royalists in these departments had not only fought several actions, but had actual possession of some of the neighbouring towns. Their leaders, not depending on their own strength, had entered into a correspondence with foreign powers; and at the close of the year a body of English troops, under the command of Lord Moira, had sailed to their assistance. Thus succoured, they made an attack on Granville, in order to keep open a communication, and facilitate the reception of supplies. La Roche Jaquelin, the chief of their leaders, was killed on this occasion, and the attempt failed. This put an end to the expedition, and Lord Moira consequently returned to England.

The royalists, notwithstanding, increased in La Vendée; and though fresh victories were daily announced in the convention, yet this enemy seemed bitterly to annoy the republican party. In short, the rebellion, which was to terminate in a month, continued for nearly three years, and therefore, for the sake of chronological order, which we wish to preserve, as much as possible, the battles with the Vendéan chiefs, and the various successes attending them shall be the subjects of succeeding chapters.

Victories were also obtained against the French on the frontiers of Spain and Italy, notwithstanding the languid manner hostilities were carried on at the beginning. They were driven from the fort of Andaya, early in the spring, by Don Ventura Caro, who destroyed the encampments of Biritau. About the same time, Don Ricardos, at the head of the army of Catalonia, defeated the republicans at Givet; and, after a bombardment of thirty-three days, Bellegarde was taken. General Dagobert attacked and carried a camp, belonging to the Spanish, at the bottom of Mount Libre; but the French were again defeated, near Perpignan, by Don Ricardos.

A formidable fleet, consisting of 19 sail, many of which were line-of-battle ships, had been fitted out by the French under Truguet, for the purpose of obtaining possession of the island of Sardinia. The isles of St. Peter and Antioch having been seized, this fleet appeared in the gulph of Cagliari, where the French admiral had retired with his garrison, containing 800 men. A deputation of 21 men was immediately sent on shore, with a flag and an officer, to demand the surrender of the capital. Seventeen of these having been put to death by the Sardinians, the remainder retreated to their boat. At length the fleet entered the harbour, and a desperate attack upon Cagliari commenced. The bombardment continued for three days, during which time the assailants were much annoyed by the red-hot balls that came from the shore. The shells which were thrown from the bomb vessels produced little or no effect, while those received did considerable injury; one ship being set on fire, and several others damaged in their masts and rigging. In short, this expedition proved abortive; for nearly all the troops, landed at various periods and in various places, were cut off by the brave inhabitants.

The chief part of the republican troops having been recalled on account of the civil war in Toulon and Marseilles, the remainder were by no means a match for the Sardinians, who completely defeated them in the county of Nice; and it appeared that the whole of Savoy would have been recovered by its ancient masters. However, the exertions of the King of Sardinia, though supported by the English fleet in the Mediterranean, were not sufficiently strenuous; and his army met with a severe defeat about the latter end of October, which gave a different appearance to the approaching campaign.

CHAPTER VIII.

Conduct of the contending Parties.—Campaign in Flanders.—Actions at Landrecies, Tournay, and Turcoing.—Capture of Ypres and Charleroi.—Battle of Fleurus.—Proceedings of the British Army.—Action at Mons.—The French enter Brussels.—Recapture of the Fortresses on the northern Frontier.—Defeat of Clairfayt.—The Austrians driven beyond the Rhine.—Conquest of Holland.

GREAT preparations were made by all the contending parties for the campaign of 1794; the defeated wishing to redeem the reputation of their arms, and the conquerors being desirous of adding to their laurels. The courts of London and Vienna adopted the most efficacious measures for raising a powerful body of men; and Colonel Mack, an officer in the confidence of the emperor, was sent to England, in order to concert a plan of operations with the British ministry.

Early in this year, an intercourse took place between commissioners from the French republic and General Kalkreuth, at Frankfort, which rendered the conduct of the cabinet of Berlin doubtful. About the same time too, the King of Prussia informed the diet of Ratisbon, that, unless his troops received subsistence at the public expence, he should be obliged to withdraw the army on the Rhine, and contribute no more than his simple contingent. Such was the deep policy of the court of Berlin at this time, that England and Holland immediately entered into a subsidiary treaty for the maintenance of 62,400 men. The Austrian troops in the Low Countries having been increased, they amounted to nearly 150,000 men; and it was determined that his imperial majesty should command the allies in person, in order to prevent any jealousies similar to those which had occurred in the course of the preceding autumn. On the arrival of the emperor at Brussels, he was complimented by the States with the title of the Duke of Brabant. The solemnity of his inauguration was very flattering. The keys of the gates of Louvain were presented to his imperial majesty, bearing this inscription—"Cæsar adest, fremet Galli." On his arrival at Valenciennes, he was joyfully received by the combined armies, consisting of Austrians, British, Dutch, Hanoverians, and Hessians, amounting to 187,000 men, whom the emperor reviewed on the 16th of April. On the following day they advanced in eight columns towards the small but strong town of Landrecies. The first, composed of Austrian and Dutch troops, under the command of Prince Christian of Hesse Darmstadt, seized on the village of Catillon, April 17, where they got four pieces of cannon. They then crossed the Sambre, and occupied a position between that river and the little Helpe. The second, under the command of Lieutenant-general Alvintzy, took post in the forest of Nouvion. The third, led by the emperor and the Prince de Cobourg, having forced the enemy's intrenchments, advanced to the heights called the Grand and Petit Blocus. The fourth and fifth columns were formed from the army under the Duke of York. One was commanded by his royal highness, which was intended to attack the village of Vaux; and the other by Sir William Erskine.

Major General Abercromby commenced the assault with the van, supported by the two grenadier companies of the first regiment of guards, commanded by Colonel Stanhope. The fire of the republicans was very brisk; but, on seeing they could not retain their position, they retreated. The Star redoubt was stormed and taken, while three battalions of Austrian grenadiers, under the command of Major Petrash, attacked the wood, and made themselves masters of the works which the French had constructed for its defence. Part of the fugitive enemy was cut off in the wood, and the remainder retired towards the main army by the village of Bouchain.

The forces under Sir William Erskine were no less successful; for, finding the enemy posted at Premont, the brigade of British infantry, with four squadrons of light dragoons, was detached under Lieutenant-general Harcourt, to turn their position; while he himself made a bold attack in front, with three battalions of the regiment of Count Kaunitz, supported by a well-directed fire of British and Austrian artillery, under the orders of Lieutenant-colonel Congreve; and not only obtained possession of the redoubts, but of a pair of colours and two pieces of cannon. Their cannon were also taken in the course of the day, by the column under the immediate command of his royal highness the Duke of York. In consequence of this extensive attack, the French lost 30 pieces of artillery. The three columns, commanded by the hereditary Prince of Orange, did not come to action with the enemy, as they were only meant to watch the French on the side of Cambray.

These successes of the allies determined them to lay siege to Landrecies, and this important affair was entrusted to the direction of the Prince of Orange; while his imperial majesty with the

At the same time, a body of Hessians and Austrians, to the number of 12,000, under General Worms, were stationed near Douay and Bouchain; a body of 15,000, under Count Kaunitz, defended the passage of the Sambre; and 40,000 men, under General Clairfayt, protected Flanders, from Tournay to the sea.

On the 21st of April, the hereditary Prince of Orange made a general attack upon, and carried all the posts which the enemy retained in front of Landrecies: their intrenched camp he also took by storm, and became master of a strong redoubt within 600 yards of the body of the place. The French, in the mean time, were collecting troops from Cæsar's Camp, near Cambray. Thither the Duke of York sent General Otto, with some cavalry, to ascertain their strength; but finding their force was far superior to his own, he declined an engagement till the morning of the 23d, when he received reinforcements. The French were driven from Cæsar's Camp in great confusion, and with considerable loss. Soon after they were repulsed in an attack on the heights of Cateau, where the Duke of York was posted; and, after an obstinate resistance, they were obliged to yield to the English, who took possession of 35 pieces of cannon, while Lieutenant-general Chapuy and 300 officers and privates were taken prisoners. The killed and wounded on both sides were very great.

The attack now became general, as it extended along the frontiers from Treves to the sea, a distance of about 180 miles. The column under the command of the emperor was attacked by the republicans without effect. The Austrian general, Clairfayt, having joined at Moucron with the Hanoverian troops, resolved to act upon the offensive, when his expected reinforcement of six battalions of Austrian infantry arrived. General Pichegru conjecturing this design, thought proper to attack, without delay, the post at Moucron; and having, after a warm resistance, defeated General Clairfayt, and taken from him 32 pieces of cannon, he soon after obtained possession of Werwick, Courtray, and Menin, the last of which held out for four days; but, finding no probability of succour, the garrison, consisting of five battalions of Hanoverians, and four companies of emigrants, forced their way through the enemy, and retreated with little loss.

The surrender of Landrecies, on the 30th of April, to the combined forces, made some compensation for their losses. With such fury had the place been attacked, that only two houses escaped the vengeance of the cannon at the end of the siege. Two hundred of the inhabitants lost their lives, and 12,000 of the garrison; the remainder of the soldiers were made prisoners of war, to the number of 4,400 men.

The republican army suffered another defeat on the 10th of May, a body of 30,000 troops having attacked the army of the Duke of York at Tournay, which was productive of a severe engagement. The right flank of the combined army was meant to be turned by the French; but they were unsuccessful, having been repulsed with great loss by the regiment under Count Kaunitz, then posted in a wood. Failing in this attempt, they endeavoured to force the centre of the duke's army, and attacked it with great intrepidity in the face of the powerful artillery by which it was defended. The French, however, were obliged to retreat; above 400 men were taken prisoners, and they lost thirteen pieces of cannon. On this occasion, Lieutenant-general Harcourt, Major-general Dundas, and Sir Robert Laurie, distinguished themselves.

In another attack by the republicans, General Clairfayt obliged them to take shelter in Courtray; but soon after he was less fortunate, for Pichegru coming on him with irresistible impetuosity, he was forced to retreat in confusion across the Heule. With some difficulty his flying troops were prevailed upon to halt, and he immediately occupied a position which enabled him to protect Ghent, Bruges, and Ostend.

While Pichegru was thus engaged, Jourdan entered West Flanders, and, after crossing the Sambre, obliged General Kaunitz to retreat, and station himself between that place and Rouvroy, in order to protect Mons. On the 18th of May, the French endeavoured to dislodge him; but the Austrians rallied, and compelled the enemy to give way, with the loss of near 5,000 men, and three pieces of cannon.

This success induced his imperial majesty to make a general attack with his scattered forces, with the hope of forcing the enemy to evacuate the Low-Countries. The forces of the emperor, the Duke of York, and General Clairfayt, were to join, and act against the line of the republicans. The attempt, however, proved unsuccessful; for two of the five columns employed on this occasion were so exhausted with fatigue, as to be incapable of executing the plan; and a third found the enemy in such force at Moucron, that it retreated to Turcoing. In the mean time, seven battalions of British, five of Austrians, and two of Prussians, with six squadrons of light dragoons and four of hussars, led by the Duke of York, forced the French to evacuate Lannoy and Roubaix, and advanced, in consequence of orders from head-quarters, to Mouveaux. The brave General Abercromby, with four battalions of guards, seconded by the 7th and 15th light dragoons, under Lieutenant-colonel Churchill, attacked the French, and compelled them to retire, with the loss of three pieces of cannon.

Early the next morning, May 19, the French attacked Turcoing, which was commanded by Colonel Devay. The Duke of York sent two battalions of Austrians in order to make a diversion in that quarter; and they were strictly ordered to join the army, if pushed; but, through some mistake, they joined the Colonel at Turcoing, so that a chasm was made in the right of the duke's forces, of which, it was to be expected, the French general would take advantage. A body of 15,000 French were seen advancing from Lisle, and another, having made General Otto abandon his position near Waterloo, attacked the British forces in the rear. The troops under the command of the duke, unable to stand against the enemy, gave way, and the duke was forced to fly to join General Otto, with whom he remained, on account of the distressed situation of his own army. Major-general Fox fortunately succeeded in gaining the village of Leers. The loss of the allies on this occasion was immense. The French boasted that they took 40 pieces of cannon and 2,000 prisoners.

On the 22d, Pichegru became the assailant, and attacked the lines of the allies, as soon as they had been collected, with a heavy fire of artillery. A succession of attacks, or rather battles, ensued, which lasted from the break of day until late in the evening. The republican force consisted of nearly 200,000 men, and they designed, if possible, to turn the right wing against the outposts; at first they succeeded; but a support being sent under General Fox, that officer distinguished himself in such a gallant manner, that the allies maintained their position, and the French, about nine o'clock at night, retired without being able to make any effectual impression, notwithstanding their immense numbers, and the boasted bravery of their commander.

Though great was the loss of the French on this occasion, they actually crossed the Sambre on the 24th of May, and occupied a position between Rouveroy and Fontaine-l'Eveque. They were, however, successfully attacked by General Kaunitz, who, coming on them by surprise, obliged them to make a precipitate retreat, leaving behind them 50 pieces of cannon and 5,000 men, 3,000 of whom were made prisoners.

General Beaulieu marched into the duchy of Bouillon, attacked and took the town of that name, conquered a large body of the French stationed there, and gave up the town to plunder. The republicans lost about 1,200 men killed, 300 prisoners, and six pieces of cannon. Jourdan, however, having invaded the duchy of Luxembourg with an army of 40,000 men, directly got possession of Arlon, which obliged Beaulieu to give up his late conquest, and retreat with speed to defend Namur.

The enemy soon after crossed the Sambre again, and assumed a position near Josselies, on purpose to cover the siege of Charleroi, before which they had already begun to open trenches. The Prince of Orange, however, arrived again, and obliged them to retreat, with the loss of near 6,000 men, twenty-two pieces of cannon, thirty-five ammunition waggons, and a considerable number of horses and baggage. General Jourdan, having received great reinforcements from the army of the Moselle, crossed the Sambre a third time, stormed the Austrian camp at Betignies, and persevered in the attempt of besieging Charleroi.

As the French generals had strict orders at this time not to suffer the slaves of King George to return to the traitorous territory of England, but to put every Englishman and Hanoverian to the sword, the conduct of the Duke of York on this occasion was truly dignified and humane. He gave those savages a christian lesson; for, instead of issuing orders for immediate retaliation, he addressed the troops, and requested them to suspend their indignation, assuring them "that mercy to the vanquished is the brightest gem in a soldier's character."

A French army of 30,000 men commenced the siege of Ypres, (which contained a garrison of 7,000 men) and their operations were defended by another army of 24,000 men. This place was considered as the key to West Flanders, and the allies were assiduous in guarding it from the enemy. General Clairfayt, therefore, marched to its relief; but, wanting to make the enemy raise the siege, he was three times defeated within five days, and was obliged at last to make a precipitate retreat to Ghent, about forty-four miles distant, when he learned that there was no further intercourse between that place and Oudenarde. After a gallant resistance, Ypres surrendered to General Moreau, on the 17th of June, on honorable terms. This General Moreau had been, in early life, a private soldier, and afterwards a lawyer.

Charleroi being also considered a place of great importance, the Prince de Cobourg, assisted by the Prince of Orange and General Beaulieu, marched with the combined army divided into five columns, and made preparations to relieve the place. The chief part of Jourdan's army was in Fleurus, in the direction of Lambisart, Espinies, and Gosselies. The allied army attacked the enemy's entrenchments on the 27th of June; but, the day before, (June 26,) Jourdan had pressed the siege of Charleroi so closely, that the garrison, consisting of 3,000 men, surrendered at discretion. This event was unknown to the Prince de Cobourg and his assistants during the battle of Fleurus, and it was evening before the left wing had arrived at the principal heights, which were fortified by an extensive range of field-works, lined with an immense number of heavy artillery. In consequence of many unforeseen obstacles, an attempt was made to force this strong position with the bayonet. Jourdan having, through the fall of Charleroi, obtained the assistance of the army which besieged it, resolved, in a pitched battle, to decide the fate of Flanders. Notwithstanding the impetuous valor of the allied forces, who repeatedly penetrated the French lines, and formed several times under the fire of their cannon, the superiority of Jourdan's numbers gave him advantage. Having drawn the troops out of their intrenchments, the French general made three distinct charges upon the enemy, and gained the victory, after an action which commenced at dawn of day, and did not terminate till sun-set. The combined army taking advantage of the night, immediately retreated, first to Marbois, and then to Nivelles, for the purpose of protecting Namur.

The ill success of the combined army, in an action on which so much depended, may be partly ascribed to the ignorance of the imperial general relative to the surrender of Charleroi, and partly to the impetuosity of the republican troops, apprehensive of being again driven across the Sambre, for, during the action, the exclamation of "No retreat to-day!" sounded from one end of the line to another. A company of aerostats had been sent to the head-quarters of the enemy by the committee of public safety, boasting of having enlisted science under the banners of liberty. A balloon, called L'Entreprenant, had been constructed for the occasion, and frequently elevated during the action with Etienne, adjutant-general of the army, who was the person pitched upon to reconnoitre, and who, in his report, observed, "I was attacked with hisses as well as grenades, but none of them reached me; I corresponded with the generals during the action, and informed them of every new position assumed by the enemy." The intelligence was conveyed in a note fastened to an arrow, while the balloon itself was attached to a cord. The loss of the combined army was stated, by the Prince de Cobourg, at 1,500, though exaggerated by the French to 10,000. No cannon was lost; a howitzer and one colour were taken by the enemy. His royal highness the Duke of York attempted in vain to form a junction with General Clairfayt, and was obliged to retreat from Tournay to Renaix; while General Walmoden, having been compelled to abandon Bruges at the same time, all communication with Ostend was cut off.

An expedition, under Lieutenant-general Earl of Moira, was now undertaken; and after landing a body of troops in maritime Flanders, his lordship proposed a junction with the generals Clairfayt and Walmoden, so as to enable them to act from Bruges to Thielt upon the left wing of the French, with a view of covering Ostend, and also of producing a diversion in favor of the Duke of York. The situation of the Prince de Saxe Cobourg rendered the execution of this plan impracticable. The Duke of York being then in an embarrassed position, his lordship effected a junction with his royal highness; and on the 29th of June, the French were repulsed at Alost. The enemy still persevering in their attacks on all his royal highness's out-posts, in front of the canal leading from Brussels to Antwerp, they were repulsed again at Malines, July 6, and forced to retire. The Duke of York, however, found it necessary to retreat across the Meuse, and withdraw into Holland.

The Prince de Cobourg having collected the remains of his army at Halle, advanced and assumed a formidable position; but, having been attacked by a superior army, July 2, was obliged to evacuate Mons, on which occasion, his rear-guard left that town by one gate, at the same moment when the French entered at the other. Having retreated to Soignies, where he stood between the republicans and the capital of Brabant, he threw up intrenchments, and strongly fortified this post. The desperate assailants rushed in with screwed bayonets, and the Austrians retreated through Brussels.

The republicans having been determined to regain those fortresses which fell into the hands of the combined forces, General Scherer appeared before Landrecies, and immediately summoned that place. The fatal period of twenty-four hours was suffered to elapse, after which the foreign troops were put to the sword, according to a decree which the malevolent Robespierre had obtained from the too-compliant convention. At first the governor declined to capitulate; but no sooner had the French broken ground, and erected batteries, than he proposed terms which were refused. The garrison, consisting of near 2000 men, surrendered at discretion, July 15.

After a similar ceremony, Quesnoy surrendered, August 15, and the intelligence was transmitted to Paris within the space of one hour, by means of thirteen distinct motions of the Telegraph, the invention of Chappe, and first used on this occasion. Valenciennes, which had been taken with such difficulty, surrendered to the French August 29, and the next day Condé, the name of which was now changed to Nord Libre; under the walls of the latter were found 190 waggons loaded with stores and ammunition; and in Valenciennes a rich booty of three millions of florins. The emigrants taken in these garrisons were delivered up to the military tribunals, and the majority of them executed. A report, read by Carnot in the French convention on this occasion, contained the following irony and bombast:

"Thus fade away for ever the chimerical hopes of all our enemies! Thus have the ephemeral successes of Europe produced only shame to her, and glory to us!

"What, cannot all Europe conquer France—that country which has been said to be only a chasm in the map of Europe!—Wait, legislators; the combined powers have only deferred their formidable designs, and next year they are determined to march to Paris."—(Laughter.)

The Prince de Cobourg used all his efforts to rouse the circles of Germany to make a desperate effort in vindication of Germanic liberty. He allowed that the resources of the French were inexhaustible, and their forces innumerable. He declared, that, if they did not assist in repelling the invaders, he would pass the Rhine, and leave them and their property to be plundered by the republicans. And though this was no time for issuing manifestoes, in consequence of the repeated successes of the French, yet the emperor thought proper to try the experiment. He admitted that his resources were totally inadequate to combat such an enemy with any chance of success. He felt indignant at his Prussian majesty for accepting a subsidy from Great Britain, and omitting to fulfil his compact. He stated, that so strong were the French armies, and so inconceivably rapid their march, that he was under the necessity of withdrawing his forces, and employing them to defend his own dominions.

The Prince de Cobourg was dismissed from his command, and bade farewell to his army in a most pathetic address. Clairfayt succeeded as commander-in-chief, and was the only general who now kept the field; as the Duke of York, after a long and ineffectual struggle, had withdrawn into Dutch Brabant, and the hereditary Prince of Orange was obliged to cross the Dyle, to prevent his army from being surrounded.

General Pichegru, who was at that time at the head of 80,000 men, resumed the operations of the campaign, after a suspension of about two months. This general prepared with one body of troops to attack Holland; while another, assembled in the neighbourhood of Brussels, under Jourdan, proceeded in pursuit of the field-marshal Clairfayt, now at the head of the Austrian troops, and who, having been obliged by General Kleber to evacuate Louvain and abandon Namur and Antwerp, (in each of which a great booty had been found,) assumed a new position. For three successive days he was attacked by Jourdan, and by means of a fog effected a retreat. Still harassed, but never overcome, he moved first to Hervé, and then to Aix-la-Chapelle. The French army, having been reinforced, attacked all the Austrian posts from Ruremonde to Juliers. By this time Clairfayt had occupied a strong position upon the Roer; and though he made a gallant resistance, October 1, yet the French army, being now immense, obliged him to retire into Germany, with the loss of near 10,000 men in the course of three days.

The republicans were now in possession of Hervé, Malmedy, and Spa; and preparations were made for investing Maestricht and Venloo. The city of Cologne having been taken by the French, October 6, a detachment of their army, under General Moreau, was sent to Coblenz, a place odious to the republicans, as being earliest in sheltering the emigrants. The allies were busied for two months in throwing up very formidable redoubts before it. General Moreau fell in with the hussars of the allies on the 22d, when he boldly engaged them, killed vast numbers, and took fifty prisoners. On the following day he took the redoubts with his infantry, by assault, and the Austrians repassed the Rhine in confusion.

Pichegru remained 17 days in the neighbourhood of Antwerp, for the purpose of establishing magazines, and insuring a supply of provisions. These preparations having been made for the invasion of Holland, his troops commenced their march, and assumed a position at Turnhout, near Hoogstraten. The Duke of York, knowing the superior force of the enemy, immediately retired towards Bois-le-duc, and left the defence of Breda to its garrison.

Moreau, having undertaken the siege of Sluys, found it necessary, in order to complete its investment, to post a body of troops in the isle of Cad-sand. Many difficulties at first attended this operation, as the passage was defended by a battery of fourteen cannon, and the troops were entirely destitute of either pontoons or vessels to convey them over; however some of them swam to the place, and others crossed the arm of the sea in small boats, by which means the capture of Sluys was effected on the 25th of August.

In order to oblige the English to cross the Maese, Pichegru marched up to the Duke of York's advanced guards, strongly posted upon the banks of the Dommel, all the bridges over which and over a neighbouring stream having been broken down. The French, however, effected a passage, partly by rafts and partly by swimming; and an action commenced at three o'clock, on September 15, which continued until six in the morning. The troops of Hesse Darmstadt, who occupied an advanced position, suffered considerably.

Lieutenant-general Abercromby, at the head of the reserve, was sent on the following day to retake Bostel, if possible; as the loss of it would oblige the Duke of York to abandon the whole BOOK I. of his line of defence. The enemy, however, proved too strong, and Lieutenant-general Abercromby returned. By this time the commander-in-chief was informed, that numerous columns, to the amount of 80,000 men, were advancing against him; and as it appeared that the attack was meditated against his left, which was the point most vulnerable, it was deemed prudent to withdraw. Accordingly this portion of the allied army retreated in good order across the Maese, having lost, as the French accounts stated, 2000 men, who were made prisoners, seven cannon, and numerous horses. Bois-le-duc, Bergen-op-Zoom, and Breda, being now no longer protected, were obliged to depend upon their own internal strength.

Bois-le-duc was invested by the republican troops, Sept. 23, who deemed it prudent to obtain possession of some strong place, in order to be provided with necessaries. In consequence of the inundations, which were increased by incessant rains, this task was exceedingly difficult. However, the fort of Orten having been abandoned, and that of Crevecoeur bombarded and taken, the governor of Bois-le-duc agreed to a capitulation; and, to the great astonishment of the French, resigned the place on the 10th of October. Hereupon General Pichegru made the passage of the Maese in pursuit of the allied army. The two first divisions of the French troops, under the generals Bonneau and Soutram, did not cross the Maese until October 19, being delayed for the want of pontoons, nineteen only of which could be procured.

The retreat of the Duke of York, in the face of a superior army, having been conducted with great ability, (as was even acknowledged by the enemy,) his royal highness waited for the assailants in a strong position in the neighbourhood of Pufflech, his two wings being supported by two rivers. Notwithstanding this, the republican army moved forward in four columns, and attacked the whole of the advanced posts on his right, particularly those of Drutin and Appelthorn; the former of which was defended by the 37th regiment, and the latter by the Prince of Rohan's light battalion. These troops conducted themselves with great gallantry; but a post on the left having been forced, Major Hope, after having displayed considerable valor, was obliged to retreat along the dyke of the Waal, where his regiment was furiously charged by the enemy's horse. Major-general Fox, while encouraging his troops to a strenuous opposition, was nearly being taken prisoner; having been detained a few minutes, it is said, by a French hussar. Of the 37th regiment only the major and 50 men escaped. The French general stated, that he made 600 prisoners. The unfortunate emigrants suffered considerably, 800 of the legion of Rohan having been cut to pieces, and 62 made prisoners. Immediately after this engagement the Duke of York retired behind the Waal.

Notwithstanding the advanced season of the year, the republican army marched to besiege the neighbouring garrisons. Venloo was accordingly invested by General Laurent, but a capitulation having been assented to, the troops were allowed to march out with the honors of war and ten pieces of cannon. This general is said to have had only 4,000 men on the occasion, and to have been destitute of heavy artillery; consequently, his weakness must have been concealed, and the capture of Venloo effected more by manoeuvre than by gallantry.

Pichegru, who at this time was with the main body of the forces before Nimeguen, was obliged to resign the command to Moreau, and repair to Brussels, in consequence of an inveterate cutaneous disease which he had contracted. During his absence, General Kleber made preparations for the reduction of Maestricht, which surrendered to him, November 5.

The capture of Nimeguen, however, was not effected with such facility. This city was not only defended by a numerous garrison, but covered by the Duke of York, who, from his camp at Arnheim, was enabled to throw in supplies whenever needed. After forcing the British outposts in front of the place, the French immediately attacked Fort St. André, and, in the skirmish that ensued, Lieutenant-general Abercromby and Lieutenant-colonel Clarke were slightly wounded, as was also Captain Picton, in a sally from the place. The French, however, broke ground, under the direction of General Souham, and began to erect batteries. Hereupon General Walmoden marched out suddenly with a detachment of British infantry and cavalry, consisting of the 8th, 27th, 28th, 55th, 63d, and 78th regiments of infantry, and the 7th and 15th of light-horse, accompanied by two battalions of Dutch, the legion of Damas, and some Hanoverian horse under the command of General de Burgh, amounting in all to about 8,000 men. The infantry advanced under a severe fire, and, jumping into the trenches without returning a shot, charged with the bayonet, and thus retarded the operations of the enemy. On this occasion, Major-general de Burgh, while leading on his men with great gallantry, was wounded. The loss of the republican army was about 500 men; and that of the allies, independent of the Dutch, was 210.

In order to cut off all intercourse with the English army, the French immediately erected two strong batteries on the right and left of the lines of the defence, by means of which one of the boats, which supported the bridge of communication, was destroyed. The damage sustained upon this occasion was soon repaired by Lieutenant Popham, of the navy. The Duke of York, however, aware of the superiority of the enemy, resolved to withdraw every thing from the town, except what was absolutely necessary for its defence. The town was accordingly to be deserted on the evening of November 7. All the artillery of the reserve, with the British, Hanoverian, and Hessian battalions, immediately returned; but piquets, to the amount of 2,500 men, were left under the command of Major-general de Burgh.

The Hanoverian and British troops effected a retreat in a tolerable manner; but their hurry in destroying the bridge before the Dutch troops could reach it, produced the most fatal effects to the allies. Finding it on fire, they sought to pass the river over the great flying bridge; but no sooner had they got upon it, than it swung round, either owing to the republican artillery having cut the ropes, by which it was kept in one position, or from a mistake of the troops, who, thinking that the enemy had possession of the bridge, fired upon it for a length of time. The issue was, that some perished by shot, others were drowned, and about 400 were taken prisoners. The gates of Nimeguen were then opened to the besiegers.

The Duke of York, convinced that an engagement might be attended with the most fatal consequences to Holland, retired immediately. The French, continuing their military operations, were determined to cross the Waal, and General Daendels (who has been mentioned in our fourth chapter) was entrusted with this enterprise. Having collected a number of boats, he filled them with troops, and effected a landing near the post of Ghent, during a thick fog; in consequence of which, he was also enabled to surprise a battery. This attack, which extended to several posts belonging to the allies, was ultimately unsuccessful, several of the assailants having been killed by the fire of the batteries, and a great number drowned. This project was altogether relinquished, and the generals Bonneau and Lemaire received orders to invest Breda by means of winter cantonments. Grave also was surrounded in a similar manner.

The Duke of York left the British army, and returned to London, which announced that the court of St. James's thought the conquest of Holland by the French unavoidable. While the Duke of York held the chief command, the army was in a wretched condition, and it could not be thought that its situation would be bettered, when under a foreigner (General Walmoden). Patriotic subscriptions were raised in England, to supply the army with flannel vests, and other necessities essential in that country.

General Pichegru, on the return of his health, left Brussels, and proceeded to head-quarters, with the determination of invading Holland.

The states of Friesland agreed to acknowledge the republic of France, to end their connection with Great Britain, and sign a treaty of peace and alliance with the convention. In other provinces, also, resolutions were passed, clearly inimical to the Stadtholder's government. Republican sentiments shewed themselves so plainly in Amsterdam, that the government of Holland positively forbade all popular discussions on political subjects, and the presenting of petitions or memorials on any account whatever. Soon after this, the Stadtholder went to Amsterdam in disguise, to ascertain the true state of the public mind. His situation was very distressing. He had published many spirited addresses to the people, but was unable to instil into them a spirit of resistance. The opposite party would subject the country to a foreign power rather than join in any way to secure its independence.

Many respectable citizens of Amsterdam drew up a petition, and presented it to the magistrates early in November. It stated the sudden appearance of the hereditary Prince of Orange, and the Duke of York in that city, which, they affirmed, had no other object in view than to check the deliberations of their high mightinesses, to induce them to receive British troops, and to consent to a general inundation. The petition condemned such measures, and if they did not desire to receive the French, they were not inclined to stop the subjugation of Holland by the only methods that could be properly adopted with that view. The petition was successful; the magistrates would not attempt the inundation, and many of the petitioners, who were arrested, were taken from prison in triumph.

Though the republican troops did not advance with their usual rapidity, the combined army found it very difficult to act upon the defensive. Numbers were cut off by disease, while the hospitals were in want of assistance and suitable medicines. The military were without clothing and shoes, and the sudden changes of the weather at this eventful period caused a putrid fever, which made the most dreadful destruction.

Nothing less than an intense and rigorous frost could assist the French general's design. Towards the latter end of the year, an unexpected degree of congelation took place, and General Pichegru, finding that both the Maese and the Waal were already able to bear troops, determined to take advantage of this opportunity to complete his projects. Two brigades, under the generals Daendels and Osten, received orders to march across the ice to the isle of Bommel. Another detachment was sent, at the same time, against Fort St. André, and the reduction

BOOK I. of those places were achieved in the month of December. A successful attack was made at the same time on the lines of Breda, Oudebosch, and Sevenbergen.

CHAP. VIII.

The town of Grave, which was considered a master-piece of fortification, and which had already suffered a blockade of two months, was now obliged to surrender, being destitute of provisions and ammunition. Its garrison was consequently made prisoners of war.

The weather still continuing favourable to his enterprise, General Pichegru ventured to cross the Waal with 70,000 men, without the assistance of either bridges or boats. The whole of the troops had not, however, reached the place of destination, when a sudden thaw seemed to hazard the success of this bold expedition. The frost, however, returning, the French were enabled to form a junction.

The French general attacked the position occupied by General Walmoden, between Nimeguen and Arnheim. Major-general Dundas had succeeded in carrying Tayl, and driving a body of the enemy across the ice, with a loss of a number of men and four pieces of cannon; notwithstanding which, it was deemed necessary to remove the head-quarters from Arnheim to Amerongen. The allies, through the obstinacy of the frost, were obliged to fall back during the night, first upon Buern, and soon after behind the Leck. At times, however, they attacked the enemy, and with success, in an affair of posts, at Gelder Malsel; on which occasion, notwithstanding the difficulties resulting from an inclement season, Major-general Lord Cathcart, with three English regiments, behaved with extraordinary gallantry. The enemy at length crossed the frozen Waal in five different columns, and, having attacked the line of the allies, forced the Austrians to abandon Huesden, and the Hanoverians to retreat across the Lingen: but they were repulsed for a time at Rhenen, by the spirited conduct of the British guards and Salm's infantry. The English, however, withdrew in the course of that very night to Voorthuisen, having been so fortunate as to remove all the wounded officers, and all the sick, except 300. During these several engagements, the allies suffered much. Unprepared for resistance or for flight, they were obliged to take shelter in uncovered sheds, or in the open air, at this inclement season, and, in their retreat, vast numbers of men, women, and children, were frozen to death. The French took Utrecht without opposition, for the troops in the pay of Great Britain had retired by the way of Amersfort to Zutphen. Its capital was entered on the very day (Jan. 18, 1795,) that General Vandamme took possession of Arnheim.

The Princess of Orange and the younger female branches of the family escaped on the 15th, with the plate, jewels, and whatever else of value they could carry off. The Stadtholder and the hereditary Prince of Orange did not leave Holland till the 19th, the day on which Dort surrendered to General Pichegru. His serene highness got into an open boat at Scheveling, having only three men with him who were acquainted with rowing; but he arrived at Harwich on the 21st in safety. The Stadtholder did not leave the Hague without much opposition; for the French party insisted he should be responsible for all the troubles of the country. He was indebted to the fidelity of his horse body-guards, and a regiment of Swiss, for his escape; they fired upon the people, and his flight was secured at the expense of the lives of some of the most forward patriots.

Dudrecht, Rotterdam, the Hague, and Helvoetsluys, were all occupied by the French troops in succession; and the States-General, yielding to imperious necessity, now negotiated with the invaders, by whom the abolition of the stadtholdership was decreed. The English army having experienced much distress from the severity of the season and the pursuit of the enemy, retired into Westphalia, being considerably diminished.

CHAPTER IX.

Campaign on the Rhine.—Defeat of the French at Kaiserslautern.—Battle of Edikhoffen.—The French seize on Theves and the Palatinate.—Campaign, in Spain and Italy.—War of La Vendée.

THE reduction of the strong fort of Kaiserslautern, in the Palatinate, was the commencement of the campaign in this quarter. The French afterwards obtained possession of Spire, Gummorsheim, and Limersheim. The Austrians abandoned Fort Louis, afterwards called Fort Vauban, and destroyed the works as soon as they heard of the enemy's approach.

On the resignation of the Duke of Brunswick, Field-Marshal Mollendorff, who had succeeded to the command of the Prussian army, took the field. At this period, May 27, the French, to the number of 12,000 men, were forced behind the defiles of Otterback, Hogglesback, and the Lauter. These positions were defended by means of redoubts and entrenchments; the bridges were all destroyed, and three strong posts had been occupied to facilitate their retreat in case of danger. The Prussian commander-in-chief, by a sudden movement, contrived to surround and surprise their camp. Impressed with the idea of perfect security, the French were inattentive to the approach of the enemy; and their loss on this occasion was considerable. One thousand were killed on the spot, and more than 2000 made prisoners, while eighteen pieces of cannon and two howitzers fell into the hands of the conquerors. The marshal after this established his head-quarters at Winnweiler, while his advanced posts extended as far as Deux Ponts and Carlesberg; Nieustadt was at the same time taken possession of by the prince of Hohenlohe-Ingelsingen.

The French having procured a large reinforcement, renewed hostilities day after day, until they obtained their object. Notwithstanding the marshal's troops were posted in an advantageous situation, yet in the course of incessant attacks the Prussians gave way, though seven had been bravely withstood for two whole days before they were subdued. Another body, strongly posted at Tripstadt, gallantly resisted. The French, however, prevailed, and a great number of cannon and prisoners were taken, on the 14th of July. A fresh attack was commenced the succeeding morning, along the whole of the line occupied by the Imperial and Prussian troops. The allies, notwithstanding the superiority of the French artillery was particularly conspicuous, maintained their ground until night, when they happily effected a retreat.

The army of the Moselle having commenced its march under the command of General Michaud, entered the electorate of Treves, and seized its capital, on the 3d of August. The Palatinate, too, was taken by the French on the 8th; by which means they obtained the corn destined for the supply of Germany.

The Prussians, in consequence of the retreat of the unfortunate but gallant Clairfayt across the Rhine, thought proper to abandon offensive operations, and withdraw to the neighbourhood of Mentz. Various altercations now took place between two of the allied courts, which threatened the dissolution of the confederacy. The King of Prussia intimated his intentions, notwithstanding the subsidy received from England, to employ his troops solely in the defence of Germany; and the diet of the empire began at this period to listen to propositions for peace. This appeared to be the present disposition of the whole Germanic body, nor was it opposed by his imperial majesty. The British cabinet, justly alarmed at the idea of a separate peace, dispatched an embassy to the emperor, to prevail on his imperial majesty to adhere to his engagements; and a subsidy, under the name of a loan, was also promised for the purpose.

The success of the French in the eastern and western Pyrenées began to alarm the court of Madrid. However, the progress of the French armies in Piedmont had been retarded by the unexpected possession of Toulon by the English, and the gallant resistance displayed by the inhabitants of Lyons. Oneglia, which contained a couple of frigates and a few galleys belonging to the King of Sardinia, and had been partly destroyed by the vice-admiral Truguet during the preceding year, and in the present campaign had been repeatedly menaced both by the English and French, was, on the 6th of April, captured by the latter.

A body of republican troops penetrated into Piedmont on one side, while another, after traversing valleys and ascending mountains covered with snow, at last scaled Mount Cenis. An attempt was made to oppose their progress, by means of batteries, redoubts, and fortifications; but General Dumas having seized all the posts in succession, obtained possession of a numerous train of artillery, and took 900 prisoners.

About the same time, in the month of May, General Dumvillon seized on the forts of Saorgio, Belvidere, Rocabilier, and St. Martin; by means of which he obtained 60 pieces of cannon, a vast quantity of ammunition, and 2000 prisoners.

A new system had been adopted by the Austro-Sardinians, for preventing the further progress of the French, by means of partial attacks upon their advanced posts, and, by defensive operations. Their endeavours, however, were unsuccessful; having been completely routed towards the end of autumn, and obliged to make the walls of Alexandria their refuge.

Notwithstanding the inflated accounts of the generals who had fought, and of the deputies on mission, who had been witnesses, and were frequently encouragers of the dreadful havoc which was made, the war of La Vendée still appeared to be interminable. It had been stated at the bar of the convention, by General Westermann, "That of the rebel army, which once amounted to 90,000 in the district of Mons alone, not a single combatant had escaped; chiefs, officers, soldiers, bishops, countesses, and marchionesses, had all perished by the sword, the flames, or the waves." It was also asserted by Carrier, on his return from the insurgent departments, "That the number of the banditti, and the nature of the war, had been alike unknown." He declared that the whole population, of a space of more than 400 square leagues had appeared in arms, and that the rebels "amounted to 150,000 men; but the victories of Montagne and Cholet had proved fatal to them, as their leader had acknowledged that the former battle cost them 20,000 combatants." He trusted that it would not be supposed the war had terminated; for the country abounded in forests, and was covered with brush-wood, which afforded a secure retreat to the disaffected; as a proof of which he observed, that the republicans at one time had passed through 40,000, who had been concealed in this manner.

CHAPTER X.

Naval History.—Important Victory obtained by Lord Howe.—Lord Hood's Expedition, and Invasion of Corsica.—Campaign in the West Indies.—Various Captures.—Expedition under Victor Hughes.—The French re-conquer Guadaloupe.—Campaign in St. Domingo.

LORD HOWE having sailed directly in quest of the enemy, who were expected to put to sea for the protection of a fleet, chiefly laden with provisions, from America, Rear-admiral Montague was ordered to cruize in such a latitude as to be enabled either to rejoin the channel squadron, or to intercept the French store-ships.

The commander-in-chief having, on the 19th of May, received sudden information from two of his frigates, the Phaeton and Latona, detached for that purpose, that the Brest fleet was at sea, thought proper to effect, as soon as possible, a junction with the squadron under Rear-admiral Montague; but having been told, two days after, by some of the Lisbon convoy which he recaptured, that the enemy had been seen a few leagues further to the seaward, he immediately altered his course, and steered in that direction. On the 28th of May, the rival fleets descried each other exactly at the same time: the wind blew strong from the south-west, accompanied by a very rough sea, and the French possessed the weather-gage. Lord Howe having received intimation of this event from the advanced frigates, continued his course, while Admiral Villaret-Joyeuse, to whom orders had been transmitted to protect the supplies from America, at the risk of an engagement, endeavoured, as much as possible, to assume a regular order of battle upon the starboard tack, by which means the approach of the English was considerably facilitated.

The British commander perceiving by the conduct of the enemy, who had hauled their wind, an intention to avoid a close fight, gave the signal for a general chase; and, to prevent their escape, Admiral Pasley, who commanded a flying squadron, consisting of the Bellerophon, Russel, Marlborough, and Thunderer, was instantly detached to make an impression on their rear. That officer, about two o'clock, came up with and attacked the Révolutionnaire, a three-decked ship of 110 guns, which happened to be the sternmost in the line; but his top-mast being disabled during the action, Lord Hugh Seymour Conway, in the Leviathan, gallantly advanced and received her fire, which was exceedingly fierce; and by the time it was dark, Captain Parker, of the Audacious, having arrived close to the rear ship, (supposed to have been the Révolutionnaire, which had been previously engaged with the Rear-admiral and Lord Hugh Seymour,) fought her within the distance of half a cable's length. Captain Parker finding the mizen-mast gone by the board, and the lower yards and main-topsail yard shot away, first attempted to board his antagonist; but having failed, made sail before the wind, when it was imagined that the Audacious struck her colours. The situation of her antagonist was equally bad, having her rigging destroyed, her fore-topmast wounded, and the bowsprit crippled; and thus, with nine sail of the enemy to windward, followed by two of their ships, and occasionally fired at by a large frigate, and two corvettes, the captain, after a chase of 24 leagues directly to leeward, thought proper to return to Plymouth Sound.

During the whole night the rival fleets, consisting of twenty-six sail of the line on one side, and twenty-five on the other, remained within sight of each other on the starboard tack, and in a parallel direction, with the French still to windward. Between seven and eight o'clock the next morning, (May 29,) the English tacked by signal, and with some degree of irregularity, with a view of making an impression on the enemy's rear. Admiral Villaret-Joyeuse imagining, by the retreat of the Audacious, which gave him the superiority of one line-of-battle ship, that the victory must be his, immediately wore from van to rear, and edged down in a line a-head, to engage the rear of the British fleet, displaying a fixed resolution to come to action.

This favourable opportunity was immediately seized by Lord Howe, who renewed the signal for passing the enemy's line; but on finding that the Cæsar, (Captain Molloy,) which was the leading ship, had not kept the wind, he himself gave the Queen Charlotte orders to attack; and being seconded by the Bellerophon and the Leviathan, gallantly broke through the fifth and sixth ships in the rear, and then resumed the larboard tack; by which means, in consequence of having obtained the wind, he was better enabled to renew the action. While his lordship remained in this critical situation, and the rest of the British fleet was passing to leeward, the French were again to the eastward, on purpose to succour their disabled ships in the rear, and which the English admiral, from the crippled state of his two consorts, was unable to prevent: the enemy, however, were repulsed by the Barfleur and two other three-deckers, in an attempt to cut off the Queen and Royal George. The French admiral tacked again by signal, and after a distant cannonade, stood away in order of battle on the larboard tack, followed by the whole of the British fleet, which still retained the weather-gage. Thus terminated the second day's action; and a thick fog that intervened during the night and the greater part of the succeeding day, prevented the renewal of the engagement.

In the mean time, Rear-admiral Neilly joined the commander-in-chief with a reinforcement of three sail of the line, which enabled him to detach his crippled ships; and the dawn of the memorable 1st of June exhibited the French line to leeward, drawn up in complete order of battle, and prepared for a renewal of hostilities.

As there was time sufficient for the various ships' companies to take refreshment, the British admiral made a signal for breakfast; an event which induced the French to believe, that he wished to decline the engagement. In about half an hour, however, Lord Howe, to their great disappointment, gave orders for steering the Royal Charlotte, on board of which was flying the signal for close action, alongside the French admiral. This was effected at nine o'clock in the morning; and by an extraordinary display of seamanship on the part of Mr. Bowen, he was enabled to assume an excellent position, by which means he contended with advantage against a vessel far superior in point of size; and while some of the English commanders penetrated the line of battle, and engaged to leeward, others occupied such stations as allowed them to contend with their antagonists to windward. The contest was close and severe, and the muzzles of the guns of many ships belonging to the two hostile fleets, almost touched each other; and while the shot of the enemy made but little havoc on decks where there were no useless men, such was the superiority of the English seamen, that every broadside spread death and desolation through the crowded vessels of the French. So tremendous was the fire, and so decisive the advantage on the part of the British, that about ten o'clock the French admiral determined to relinquish the contest. Several of his ships were dismantled, and one of 74 guns about to sink; six also were captured, and a great slaughter had taken place on board his own vessel, in which his captain, Basile, and a multitude of the crew were killed, while the national commissioner and most of his officers were wounded. Hereupon Admiral Villaret-Joyeuse crowded off with all the canvas he could spread, and was immediately followed by most of the ships in his van that were not completely crippled; two or three also of these, although dismantled, got away soon after, under a temporary sail hoisted on the occasion; for the victors were rendered incapable of pursuing the enemy, who had, as usual, aimed at the rigging. Had it not been for an unlucky broadside from Le Jacobin, the Queen Charlotte, which at that time was rendered nearly unmanageable, having lost her fore-top mast in action, would have captured La Montagne. This misfortune was soon after followed by the loss of the main-top-mast, which fell over the side, while the Brunswick, which had lost her mizen-mast, and the Queen, drifted to leeward, and were exposed to considerable danger from the retreating fleet. Lord Howe had still possession of two eighty-gun ships, Le Juste and Le Sanspareil, and five seventy-four gun ships, L'Amérique, L'Achille, Le Northumberland, L'Impétueux, and Le Vengeur; the last sunk between five and six o'clock at night, soon after she was taken. The slaughter on the part of the English was not very great. Captain Montagu, of the Montagu, was the only commander who fell during the engagement. Several officers of distinction, particularly Vice-admiral Graves, the Hon. G. Berkley, and Captain J. Harvey, were wounded; and the rear-admirals Pasley and Bowyer, and Captain Hutt of the Queen, lost a leg each. Captain J. Harvey died a few days after his return to Portsmouth of a fever accompanied by a delirium; and Captain Hutt also perished in a similar manner.

Admiral Montagu, who had repaired to England with an account of this brilliant victory, whence he was immediately dispatched to join Earl Howe, sailed for Brest; partly with a view to fall in with the commander-in-chief, and partly to pick up any crippled ships, which in case of an action might take shelter in that port. He accordingly encountered some of the retreating squadron, June 7, and chased them into the outer road. On the following day he espied the main body under Admiral Villaret-Joyeuse, who, notwithstanding his late fatal contest, formed an admirable line of battle, and gave chase; while the fleet from America, consisting of 160 sail of merchantmen, supposed to be worth several millions sterling, and particularly valuable on account of BOOK I. the then distressed state of France, arrived in safety three days after the French squadron had been obliged to abandon its protection.

CHAP. X.

The six ships captured from the French were conducted into port, and being unable to keep the sea, on account of the disabled state of the squadron, Lord Howe sailed for England, and arrived safe off Dunmore, in the Isle of Wight, June 13.

The French fleet had received positive orders to fight, provided the English should cross their cruising ground; and to the measures adopted on this occasion, Jean Bon St. André attributed the safety of the American fleet. Barrère having asserted that one of their line-of-battle ships went down with the republican colours flying; that the crew refused quarter; and that their last prayers were offered up for liberty and their country; concluded with proposing—

1. That a model of Le Vengeur should be suspended from the roof, and the names of the brave republicans on board inscribed on the columns of the Pantheon.

2. That the three-decked ship then building in the covered bason of Brest, should be named Le Vengeur.

3. That recompences should be decreed at a national festival, to the poets, painters, and sculptors, who undertook to transmit to posterity the sublime trait of republican heroism displayed on the occasion.

The grand fleet of England having been refitted, and increased by five sail of line-of-battle ships and a Portuguese squadron of five vessels, (the latter of which added to its number rather than to its strength,) again put to sea; and notwithstanding Lord Howe was so ill with the gout that he was obliged to be hoisted on board in a chair, he still continued to superintend its movements. The Brest fleet never ventured out until the English commander returned to port, the enemy had been so completely humbled; and even then their commanders and crews reaped but little glory and advantage, for as they consisted chiefly of landsmen, unable to contend with so boisterous a season, instead of capturing any ships, they actually lost five sail of the line, and were incapable of performing any exploit whatever.

In the course of this year, the success of the British navy was nearly uniform, both in respect to squadrons and single ships. Captain Sir John Borlase Warren having been ordered to cruise on the coast of France with four ships, the Arethusa, Melampus, La Nymphe, and Concorde, while proceeding to his station fell in, on the 23d of April, with four sail of the enemy, under a commodore, fresh from port, having left Cancele Bay on the preceding evening. The two squadrons crossed each other on opposite tacks, and the action was begun by the enemy, as usual, at a considerable distance. The English commander, by the wind having luckily changed two points in his favor, perceived that it was possible to weather the French, and therefore made a signal for the ships to engage as they came up, so as to insure a close action, and prevent them from gaining their own shore. After an engagement of two hours, in which Captain Sir Edward Pellew, of the Arethusa, who was the second astern, and the other commanders, behaved with great skill and gallantry, two of the ships struck, viz. La Pomone, forty-four 24-pounders and 400 men; and La Rabet, twenty-two 9-pounders and 200 men. As the Flora, which led the line into action, was rendered incapable of continuing the pursuit, a signal was made for the other English frigates to pursue the enemy. Sir R. Strachan, in the mean time, got up with and engaged two of the retreating squadron; one of which, Le Résolue, bore down, and laying herself across La Concorde's bows, obliged her to drop astern. Sir Richard Strachan, however, made sail and attacked the other vessel, which proved to be L'Engageant, of thirty-four 18 pounders, 41 caronades, and 300 men. During two hours and a quarter, the crew defended themselves with great bravery; but her guns being silenced, and her sails unmanageable, she was at length taken.

About the latter end of the summer, the same commander was again successful on this station. Understanding that some of the enemy's frigates were cruising near Scilly, he sailed in pursuit with a small squadron, consisting of the Pomona, Artois, Santa Margaritta, Diana, and Arethusa; and having discovered a French ship of war, which proved to be La Felicité, of forty guns, he made a signal for a general chase; in consequence of which, some of his consorts engaged with and ran her ashore near Penmark rocks. At the same time the commander, in company with the Arethusa, pursued two corvettes; and having obliged them to take refuge under the cover of three batteries near the Gomelle rocks, fought them in that position until their masts fell overboard, by means of which the greater part of the crews escaped. Having manned and armed his boats, it was the commander's intention to burn these two vessels, which were called L'Alerte and L'Espion; but, as the wounded must have inevitably perished, humanity forbade the execution of this design. During the action the Flora ran aground on this shore.

The Hon. Captain Paget, in the Romney, of fifty guns, brought La Sybille, of forty-four, to action in Miconi road; and after an engagement of one hour and ten minutes, captured her on the 17th of June. What rendered this attack remarkable was its being made on an enemy's ship in a neutral harbour.

On the 21st of October, Captain Nagle, of the Artois, belonging to and in sight of Sir Edward Pellew's squadron, took the national frigate called Révolutionnaire, when the breakers of the Saints were discovered right a-head.

The English, however, lost a line-of-battle ship, which became to the enemy a subject of great exaltation. The Alexander and Canada, vessels of equal force, happened to be seen and chased at break of day, Nov. 11, by a squadron consisting of five seventy-fours, three large frigates, and an armed brig, under the command of Rear-admiral Neilly. The two English men of war at first separated, but Rear-admiral Bligh having made his consort a signal to form a-head for their mutual support, an attempt was made to obey. Hereupon two ships of the line and two frigates, which were in pursuit, hauled to starboard, and obliged her to pursue the former course. In the mean time the Alexander continued firing her own stern and receiving the bow chasers of the enemy; when three ships of the line advanced, and commenced a close action, which was gallantly sustained upwards of two hours, until she became a complete wreck, the main yard, spanker-boom, and three top-gallant-masts being shot away, and the sails and rigging cut to pieces, while all the lower masts were expected every moment to go over the side. The ships which had chased the Canada, not being able to overtake her, made sail at this critical period for the British admiral; and the officers, who had been assembled on the quarter-deck, deeming all resistance fruitless, the commander reluctantly surrendered, and was carried into Brest.

The progress of the British arms in the Mediterranean, after the evacuation of Toulon, was exceedingly flattering. In the month of February, Lord Hood sailed for Corsica, at that time in a state of rebellion against the French convention, acting under Paschal Paoli; who, some years prior to this, had been honorably restored to his country by the constituent assembly. The popular society of Toulon had accused General Paoli to the convention as a supporter of despotism. They stated that the general, along with the administrators of the department, had inflicted every hardship upon the patriots, and favored the emigrants and refractory priests. They demanded that he should fall under the avenging sword of the law. The convention decreed, that General Paoli and the attorney-general of Corsica should be ordered to the bar to give an account of their conduct. Soon after the convention received a letter from the commissioners sent to Corsica to arrest General Paoli, that they thought it not prudent to attempt it for the present, and in the same month a letter was read from the general, regretting that his extreme old age and bodily infirmities made it impossible for him to cross the sea, and travel 200 leagues by land, to appear at the bar of the Convention, but offering to retire from his country, if it were thought necessary to the safety and peace of Corsica. Paoli, however, sent to Lord Hood for a few ships, to co-operate with him against the French in the island. At length Commodore Linzee anchored in the bay, to the westward of Mortella Point; and the troops having landed the same evening, under Lieutenant-general Dundas, possession was taken of a height that overlooked the tower of Mortella. It being the opinion of both the commodore and general, that immediate possession should be taken of this important post, in order to secure the anchorage, the Fortitude and Juno were accordingly placed in their proper stations, and a combined attack took place both by sea and land. The garrison having made an obstinate defence, the ships were obliged to withdraw, after a severe and well-directed fire of two hours and a half, during which several hot shot were lodged in the side of the Fortitude. The walls of the tower were of prodigious thickness; and the parapet, where there were two 18-pounders, was lined with bass junk five feet from the walls, and filled up with sand; and although it was cannonaded from the height for two days, within 150 yards, and appeared in a very shattered condition, the enemy still held out; but a few shot setting fire to the bass, made them call for quarter. The besieged, consisting of only one officer and thirty-two men, at length surrendered; only two were wounded, and those mortally. Thus what could not be effected by the navy, was achieved by the land-forces, who occupied an eminence that commanded the place and established a battery, consisting of one eighteen, two nine-pounders, and a carronade.

In order to take possession of the town of Fornelli, Lieutenant-colonel Moore had been detached with two regiments, a small howitzer, and a six-pounder, which were dragged about eight miles through a desert and mountainous country. The information which had been received respecting this place having been false, it was found that no attack on it could be successful without heavy cannon could be carried thither; which arduous task was cheerfully undertaken, and after four days incessant labor, accomplished by the officers of the navy. One battery, consisting of three pieces of artillery, was then constructed so as to enfilade the redoubt of the convention, mounted with twenty-one pieces of heavy ordnance, and considered as the key to the whole; while a second took it in reverse. Another 18-pounder was brought up next day, Feb. 17, to prevent two French frigates in the bay from obstructing the attack. At the same time, 1200 Corsicans, assembled by General Paoli, occupied the advanced posts, and covered the flanks. At 8 o'clock at night, Lieutenant-colonel Moore led one column

BOOK I. against the advanced point of the redoubt: Lieutenant-colonel Wauchope marched with another towards the centre, while Captain Stewart, with a third, entered on the left, and, carrying the works with the bayonet, drew the enemy down a steep hill in their rear; of whom ten officers and sixty men were made prisoners, and 100 killed and wounded, out of 550 who occupied the work. The success of this day was chiefly owing to the gallantry of the troops and men who gave the assault, and to the judicious fire of the batteries.

CHAP. X.

The neighbouring town having been evacuated, the English were masters of the gulf, fortress, and town of St. Fiorenzo; and it was the opinion of the admiral, that Bastia, whither the French had retreated, should be immediately attacked: Lord Hood, therefore, made the necessary dispositions, though Major-general Dundas declined to join in the undertaking. Accordingly, Lieutenant-colonel Villettes having landed with a body of men who had hitherto acted in the capacity of marines, and Captain Nelson, (the late celebrated Lord Nelson,) with a detachment of seamen, batteries were opened, and the place summoned; while the mouth to the harbour was so guarded, the ships being moored in form of a crescent, and the intervals occupied by gun-boats and armed launches; that the arrival of supplies to the besieged was intercepted. The assailants did not exceed 1,300 English and 800 Corsicans, and the garrison amounted to near 3,000 men. The commander, General Gentili, a Corsican, made a very gallant defence; but, after a siege of thirty-three days, during which the English distinguished themselves greatly, the town and citadel surrendered to a detachment of British troops, and the French were sent to Toulon.

While the British admiral was cruising to intercept a squadron of six sail of the line from Toulon, supposed to be destined for the relief of Calvi, the only town now in possession of the enemy, and which was soon after obliged to seek protection under the batteries of St. Honora, St. Margaretta, and Cape Garoupe, Captain Nelson proceeded, with the troops from Bastia, and effected a landing at port Agra, on the 19th of June. In the course of the same day, the army, now considerably reinforced, and commanded by the Honorable Lieutenant-general Stuart, encamped in a strong position upon the Serra del Cappuccine, three miles distant from Calvi, the reduction of which had been determined upon. As the works were very strong, and the approaches difficult, rapid and forward movements were adopted instead of regular ones; the seamen and soldiers were therefore employed in making roads, dragging cannon to the top of precipices, and collecting military stores, in order to erect two mortar and four gun batteries against Mollino-chesco, situated on a steep rock, and the stone star-fort Mozello; the walls of the latter it was determined should be suddenly attacked by batteries erected within 750 yards distance.

Admiral Hotham having been left to blockade the French in the road of Gourjean, returned to Corsica, in order to assist in the reduction of Calvi; and not only kept close off that port to relieve the occasional wants of the besiegers, but, in order to make an impression on the enemy's works, landed several of the lower-deck guns of the Victory. On the 18th of July, the French were obliged to evacuate Mollinochesco, and withdraw the shipping under the protection of the town; and a breach appearing practicable at this time on the west side of Mozello, Lieutenant-colonel Moore and Major Brereton advanced with unloaded arms, and, regardless of the firing of musketry and the bursting of shells, stormed the place; while Lieutenant-colonel Wemys, with the royal Irish regiment, and two pieces of cannon under the direction of Lieutenant Lemoine, of the royal artillery, without a shot carried the enemy's battery on the left, and forced the trenches.

A truce of twenty-five days was now proposed by Casa-Bianca, a general of division in the French service and a native of Corsica. This having been deemed inadmissible, the navy and army united their exertions, and, in the course of nine days more, additional batteries of thirteen heavy guns, four mortars, and three howitzers, were opened within 600 yards of the town; and after a cannonade and bombardment of eighteen hours, and a siege of fifty-one days, the enemy's fire being nearly silenced, the garrison surrendered, August 10; by which means the French were expelled from the island, and the English were complete masters of Corsica.

Soon after this, a general consulta was assembled at Corte, and General Paoli being elected president, the representatives of the nation voted the union of Corsica with the British crown. This act was accepted on the part of Sir Gilbert Elliot, the king's representative, who instantly assumed the title of viceroy. "Our minds," said he, "have been prepared by Providence for the fate which awaited us. The event of this happy day is only the completion of wishes we had previously formed. To-day our hands are joined, but our hearts have long been united, and our motto should be—Amici, e non di ventura." The constitution presented to the Corsicans contained the establishment of universal suffrage; the dissolution of the legislative body at the expiration of two years; municipalities chosen by the people in every district; and the unbounded right of toleration unfettered by any tests or penal laws.

We shall now briefly state the naval transactions in the West Indies; where, in consequence of a burning sun, disease rendered war doubly terrific.

The attack upon Martinica was made by a powerful armament under Sir Charles Grey and Sir John Jervis, who sailed, on the 6th of February, from Carlisle Bay to Barbadoes. A joint manifesto was published on the part of the commanders-in-chief by sea and land, inviting all the "friends of peace, government, religion, and order, in the island to throw off tyrannical oppression, and set themselves free from the horrors of anarchy, by having recourse to the protection of a just and beneficent sovereign." Personal security, and full and immediate enjoyment of their possessions, conformably to the ancient laws and customs, were also promised.

Three separate landings having been effected on the island of Martinica, the enemy abandoned the port of Trinité, while General Bellegarde, a Mulatto chief, evacuated the fort which bore his own name. Hereupon Major-general Dundas immediately seized Morne Bruneau, about two leagues from Fort Bourbon, and the strong position of Le Maître. Another detachment, under Brigadier-general Whyte, forced the batteries of Cape Solomon and Bruges, in order to facilitate the possession of Pigeon Island, and enable the shipping to enter the harbour of Port Royal. Mount Catherine, which commanded the enemy's works at the distance of 400 yards, having been crowned with a battery so as to take Pigeon Island in reverse, in little more than two hours the garrison struck their colours, and surrendered at discretion, on the 10th of February, through the gallantry of Colonel Symes, with a detachment of the 15th regiment, and 200 seamen under the command of Lieutenants Rogers and Rutherford.

Sir Charles Gordon, assisted by Colonel Myers, and Captain Rogers of the navy, having landed to leeward with the third column, seized on five batteries, between Casise de Navire and Port Royal, and then occupied the posts of Gentilly, La Coste, and L'Archer. The entrance into the bay, and harbour of Port Royal being thus completely opened for the British fleet, Admiral Sir John Jervis immediately sailed from Ance L'Arlet, and anchored there, for the purpose of assisting in the reduction of the fortresses. The commander-in-chief also moved forward, with the troops from Riviere Salée, to the post of Bruneau, on the 14th of March, where he joined Lieutenant-general Prescott. As an attack upon the town of St. Pierre had been determined upon, Major-general Dundas proceeded towards the heights of Cassot and Calabasse, which the enemy had evacuated, but who had nevertheless attacked Colonel Campbell at Port-au-Pin. When this was perceived, the advanced guard, though no more than sixty-three men, was sent forward under the command of Captain Ramsay, of the Queen; and, on gaining the summit, obliged them to desist. The gallant commander, however, lost his life while charging at the head of the 40th light company. The other two columns of the land-forces proceeded against St. Pierre, a considerable town, defended by batteries on the flanks, and protected by redoubts on the hills which overhang it: this place, however, had previously surrendered to a detachment under Colonel Symes and Major Maitland. The English, who had entered St. Pierre with the greatest regularity and decorum, were received by the inhabitants, not as foes, but as friends.

Two strong fortresses still remained to be captured, viz. Fort Louis, situated on a neck of land which forms one side of the harbour called the Carenage; and Fort Bourbon, built upon a hill, and in point of strength greatly superior. As the latter could not be closely invested without the previous possession of the heights of Saurriere, which were occupied by General Bellegarde, Sir Charles Grey resolved, at one o'clock of the succeeding morning, to force his position with the bayonet; but the Mulatto chief, anticipating his design, attacked his left flank with great impetuosity. Lieutenant-general Prescott, however, at the head of a reinforcement, gallantly checked the enemy; and the commander-in-chief embraced this opportunity to seize the position of the assailant. Accordingly, the third battalion of grenadiers, commanded by Lieutenant-colonel Buckeridge, and supported by the first and second battalions of light infantry, under Lieutenant-colonels Coote and Blundell, stormed the works on the left in such a gallant manner, that possession of the camp and artillery was immediately obtained with little loss. Fort Bourbon was then invested, but the siege of that place was attended with great difficulty; a new road, nearly five miles in extent, having been cut through a thick wood, for the conveyance of heavy artillery and mortars, while the cannon were dragged to the heights with infinite labor.

The Mulatto chief had, in the mean time, with his second, Pelocque, and 300 of their followers, yielded to the English. Bellegarde, on retiring to the heights of Sourriere, and finding his camp in possession of Sir C. Grey, immediately strove to re-enter Fort Bourbon, in order to assist in its defence; but General Rochambeau, who was at enmity with him, notwithstanding the small number of the garrison, repulsed and obliged him to surrender: he and his companions were immediately sent to America, while his batteries were confined on board the fleet.

For the purpose of reducing these two fortresses, a combined attack by the naval and land-forces was meditated. The artillery on the Morne, Tortenson, and Carrier, kept up a con-

While the battery on Point Carrier, which forms the east side of the entrance of the Carenage, kept up an incessant fire on Fort St. Louis, the Bien Venue, a French frigate, was boarded by Lieutenant Boven, of the Boyne, and the captain, lieutenant, and about twenty men, brought off, under a severe fire of grape-shot and musketry from the fort. For the purpose of assaulting this place, as well as Fort Royal, scaling-ladders were provided, and such was the gallantry of Captain Faulknor, in the Zebra, that Fort Louis was actually assailed and carried by escalade, March 20, before the boats under Captain Rogers could arrive to his assistance.

Fort Bourbon surrendered on March 23: agreeable to conditions, the garrison, consisting of 900 men, marched out with colours flying, thirty rounds a-man, and two field-pieces with twelve rounds; they then laid down their arms, and, after stipulating not to serve against his Britannic majesty or his allies during the war, were allowed to embark for France.

Six regiments having been left as a garrison, under Brigadier-general Whyte and Colonel Myers, the fleet sailed for St. Lucia, the reduction of which was attended with little or no difficulty, having been effected, April 3, without the loss of a man.

The British squadron immediately returned to Fort Royal Bay, in Martinico; where, having taken on board two regiments and the heavy ordnance, the admiral detached Captain Rogers, of the Quebec; with the Ceres, Captain Inledon; the Blanche, Captain Faulknor; and the Rose, Captain Scott; to take possession of the little islands called the Saints, which they effected without any loss, on the 10th of April. General Grey effected a landing, with a body of infantry and 500 seamen and marines, in the bay, notwithstanding the incessant fire of Forts Gozier and Fleur d'Epée, under cover of the Winchelsea, Lord Garlies, who placed his ship so close to the batteries, that the enemy could not stand to their guns, and happened to be the only person who was on this occasion wounded. On April 12, at break of day, the troops, in three divisions, attacked the fort of La Fleur d'Epée with the bayonet, which was carried; the first division, under the command of Prince Edward, stormed the post on Morne Mascot; the second, under Major-general Dundas, marched in such a direction as to take Fleur d'Epée in the rear, and cut off its communication with Fort Louis and Pointe-à-Petre; and the third, under Colonel Symes, proceeded by the road on the sea-side, in order to co-operate with the former. During this bold and successful attack, the heat of the contest was so great, that the chief part of the garrison was unavoidably put to the sword; and immediate possession of that part of the island called Grand Terre was obtained by the English; the enemy having evacuated Fort Louis, the town of Pointe-à-Petre, and the new battery on the islet called Cochon.

A garrison having been placed in Fleur d'Epée, now called Fort Prince of Wales, part of the squadron, with two divisions of the army, under the command of Prince Edward and Colonel Symes, anchored under Islet Haut de Fregatte, and the troops were landed that night and the following morning (April 14) at Petit Bourg; another detachment, under Major-general Dundas, disembarked, about the same time, within a short distance of the town of Basse Terre, and carried the strong post of Morne Magdaline; while the two former columns, having seized on the redoubt of d'Arbond, evacuated by the enemy, and having carried Arset by storm, obtained possession of the important post of Paliniste, with all its batteries, early on April 20.

Guadaloupe, with all its dependencies, was surrendered to the English, April 20, on the same terms which had been allowed General Rochambeau for Fort Bourbon: the British colours were immediately hoisted, and the place received the name of Fort Matilda.

These objects having been accomplished, to the honor and glory of all concerned, Sir Charles Grey left General Dundas to command at Guadaloupe, and returned to Martinico. The general unfortunately fell a victim to the yellow fever; and Colonel Clos, the second in command, was seized at the same time with a fatal disease. In the interim, an armament for the West Indies had been fitted out by the French government. The command of this squadron was given to Victor Hughes, an officer fitted by nature for a desperate undertaking; and, having escaped all the English cruizers in a most extraordinary manner, he arrived at Pointe-à-Petre on the 3d of June, after a passage of forty-one days from Rochefort, and landed a body of troops near the village of Gozier in the course of that night.

A body of royalists, to the amount of 180, ignorant of the force as well as of the ultimate intentions of the enemy, proposed to march out and surprise them. This party accordingly sallied forth at eight o'clock in the evening, under the command of Captain McDowall of the 49d; but, at sight of the enemy, whose numbers far exceeded their expectations, they fled, notwithstanding the repeated efforts of the English officer to rally them. They knew that if they escaped from the fire of the republicans, they would be exposed to the guillotine; and that very thought, which should have inspired them with courage, unfortunately rendered them cowards, Victor Hughes, thus encouraged, began his march about midnight, for the purpose of attacking Pointe-à-Petre; and at one o'clock in the morning, the English commenced their operations by a discharge of grape-shot from one 24-pounder and two field-pieces, which slackened the career of the assailants. But, notwithstanding this was accompanied and followed by a heavy fire of musketry, the French again pressed forward, when the remainder of the unhappy royalists immediately abandoned the place. Lieutenant-colonel Drummond, with his garrison, consisting of only 300 men, partly British merchants and seamen, gallantly resisted two successive attacks; but no longer able to oppose a superior enemy, he retreated with loss to Fort Louis, whence he proceeded to Petit Carral, and shortly after embarked with the remainder of his followers to take shelter in Basse-Terre. The enemy consequently obtained possession of Fort Gouvernement, the town of Pointe-à-Petre, and the whole of that part of the island called Grand Terre.

As soon as this unexpected and unwelcome intelligence had reached the British commanders by sea and land, who had in the mean time actually embarked, and were about to sail from St. Kitt's for England, Sir John Jervis, after dispatching a vessel to Martinico for reinforcements, and collecting some ships of war, immediately proceeded to Guadaloupe, and arrived on the day after the evacuation. Perceiving the real state of affairs, he anchored off Point-à-Petre, and blockaded the French squadron; while Sir C. Grey proceeded to Basse-Terre, and sent to the different colonies to collect all the force that could be spared. A considerable body of volunteers, to assist in the expedition, was raised by the islands of St. Christopher and Antigua.

A successful night attack had, in the mean time, been made, June 13, under Brigadier-general Dundas, on the post of St. Jean or Gabarie, in which Brevet-major Ross, of the 31st regiment, behaved with the greatest gallantry, and a landing was afterwards effected, under cover of two frigates, at Ance Canot; Lieutenant-colonel Fisher commanding the grenadiers, and Lieutenant-colonel Gomm the light infantry. Hereupon the French abandoned Gozier, June 19, and assumed a position that commanded the road to Fort Fleur d'Épée. On the night of June 23, an attempt was made to dislodge them, which proved unsuccessful, through the disobedience of the troops; who recurred to the fire of their muskets, instead of trusting solely to their bayonets, as commanded. However, on the 27th, the republicans were attacked on all sides, and driven along a chain of high and woody grounds to Morne Mascot. Here they again rallied; but on being boldly charged, they retreated into the fort.

The post occupied by Col. Fisher on Morne

Mascot, under cover of the guns of Fleur d'Épée, was successively attacked by a motley army of whites, blacks, and mulattoes. On June 29, a more formidable army advanced, consisting of 1500 men, with a field-piece; but they were driven again from the heights with considerable slaughter by the bayonets of the English.

It being the determination of the British commander to make a grand and decisive blow, Brigadier-general Symes received orders to advance from Morne Mascot, and assault the town of Pointe-à-Petre. Before day-break, on July 2, Pointe-à-Petre was accordingly stormed by a body of infantry and the first battalion of seamen, under Captain Robertson; but having, through an unfortunate mistake on the part of the guides, entered at the strongest side, they were violently attacked by the enemy with round and grape shot, as well as small arms; and, notwithstanding the most heroic exertions, the attempt failed, with the loss of about 600 men. The commanding officer, Brigadier-general Fisher, Lieutenant-col. Gomm, and Captain Robertson of the navy, were wounded in the struggle. It was the determination of Sir Charles Grey, in case of success, to have stormed immediately Fort Fleur d'Épée; but this meditated attack was now relinquished, and a body of troops under Captain Stewart, and another of seamen from the Boyne, under Lieut. Woolley, were sent to the assistance of the unfortunate assailants. In the course of that very night, the English found it necessary to retire to Gozier, to march one part of the forces by Petit-Bourg to Berville, and to embark the remainder; which was happily effected, under the direction of Rear-admiral Thompson, without the loss of a single man.

The commander-in-chief, after this, occupied the ground between Point St. John and Mahault Bay with his whole force. He likewise erected batteries of heavy artillery, as well as of mortars, at Point Saron and Point St. John, opposite Pointe-à-Petre, whence he attempted to destroy both the town and the shipping; while the gun-boats belonging to the fleet were incessantly employed in battering the ports at Pointe-à-Petre and La Fleur d'Épée.

In the mean time the French commissaries, who had accompanied the expedition, endeavoured to inflame and seduce the inhabitants by their usual proclamations and addresses. The French victories were exaggerated, and the English conquests represented as easy tasks. As no succours had arrived from England, Basse-Terre, which had been defended as long as possible, again fell into the hands of the French, Sept. 27; who, during a dark night, made two different landings, the one at Goyave and the other at Lamentin. After seizing on Petit-Bourg, where, under pretence of retaliating former outrages, many of the

The enemy thrice attacked the troops at Berville, consisting of near 600 regulars and royalists, under Brigadier-general Colin Graham, and were as often gallantly repulsed. As the plantation of Berville had been the property and residence of a colonist unfriendly to the republican cause, it was therefore marked for republican vengeance. The attack was renewed, and both the English posts and men of war annoyed by batteries; the red-hot shot prevented the latter from succouring the besieged troops; and General Graham was obliged, though very reluctantly, to capitulate. He obtained the honors of war for his own troops, but for the protection of the royalists, could only procure the privilege of a covered boat, in which he conveyed the principal of them to a place of safety. One of the chiefs, finding that his three brothers were not to be admitted into this boat, shot himself, it is said, in the presence of the English General. The remainder of the royalists, who were obliged to cut their way through the ranks of their countrymen, were either shot or guillotined.

Thus the French obtained possession of the whole of the island of Guadaloupe, one post only excepted; and the militia, conscious of the fate that awaited their non-compliance, now declared in favor of the republicans. General Prescott, who commanded at Fort Matilda, (lately called Fort Charles,) finding his cannon dismounted, and that even the Boyne and other men of war, which had repaired to his assistance, were occasionally obliged to sheer off from the gun and mortar batteries, now, after protracting the siege for near a month, deemed it prudent to evacuate the place during the night of December 10; which, under the superintendence of Captain Bowen of the Terpsichore, who was wounded on the occasion, was effected without loss.

The chief of the French settlements, called Port-au-Prince, on the west side of St. Domingo, was taken by the British during the course of the summer; and Brigadier-general Whyte erected the flag on the fort on the anniversary of his majesty's birth-day. The main body of the English, however, had not yet arrived; and the national commissioners, taking advantage of this interval, escaped in safety, with their treasure, towards Aux Cayes. The merchantmen, indeed, consisting of twenty-two sail, laden with sugar, cotton, coffee, and indigo, fell into the hands of the victors.

It appeared, notwithstanding, that the occupation of so many places together rendered the defence of each too weak; for in October, the town and port of Leogane fell into the hands of the republicans, though Captain Grant, of the 13th regiment, gallantly repulsed three distinct bodies of the enemy, after both himself and his two lieutenants were wounded; and on the 30th of December, the officer commanding at Tiburon was obliged to evacuate that post.

CHAPTER I.

Political State of France at this Period.

DURING the latter events, recorded in the preceding book, the situation of France was far from being tranquil. No sooner had the faction of the Mountain obtained a bloody triumph over that of Gironde, than a second division took place; and the conflict now lay between the Cordeliers and the Jacobins. The latter were Christians; therefore power in the hands of the former would be as dangerous to them as if in the royalists; and Robespierre resolved to take advantage of this pious idea.

Hebert, Ronsin, Anacharsis Clootz, and others, were at the head of the Cordeliers, men who adopted the most extravagant theories to gain the attachment of the populace, condemned all religion, preached up equality in the most absurd extent, and publicly recommended an agrarian law. The table of the rights of man, in the hall of the Cordeliers, was covered with black crape in the beginning of March; and Hebert maintained, from the tribune of the society, that tyranny existed in the republic. Hebert, Ronsin, Clootz, and a number more of the same association, were arrested on the 25th March, brought before the revolutionary tribunal, and condemned to the guillotine. To these executions succeeded those of Fabre d'Eglantine, Chabot, Bazire, and Julien of Toulouse, with some other popular deputies of the convention; the accusation against them being, that they had engaged in counter-revolutionary projects.

The convention were informed, by Legendre, March 31, that four of their members were arrested—"Danton is one of them; I know not the others; you should hear them; I am pure, and so I believe is Danton." This gave offence to Robespierre, who moved the previous question, which was carried.

A decree of arrest being confirmed against Danton, Lacroix, Philippeaux, Camille Desmoulins, and Herault Sechelles, they were brought before the revolutionary tribunal. None appeared to be agitated. The wit of Danton disconcerted the judges, and he threw small balls about the size of a pin in their faces. All the prisoners asked for Robespierre to be present, but he excused himself under the view of assassination. They were sentenced at two, and in three hours afterwards brought out to the guillotine. Danton suffered last, and turned himself up to the dreadful axe with such magnanimity, that the spectators were penetrated with respect.

Danton is described as a man of abilities and eloquence, trained to the law. His person was tall, rather corpulent, and but few could look at him without being prepossessed in his favor. Many counter-revolutionary charges were alleged against him, but were never proved. When in the prison of the Conciergerie, he thus exclaimed, "Tis better to be a fisherman than govern men; the fools, as they see me pass to the scaffold, will cry, 'Vive la République!' Last year I had the revolutionary tribunal instituted; I beg pardon; it was to prevent the massacres of September." He is thought to have been the planner of the attack upon the palace on the 10th of August, which dreadful outrage was executed by the ruffian Westermann, and they both perished in one day on the same scaffold. Robespierre seems to have considered Danton in the light of a rival for power, which, in the eyes of that execrable monster, was a dreadful crime.

At this period Fouquier Tainville, the public accuser, demanded that the sister of the ci-devant king should be given up to the revolutionary tribunal. The Princess Elizabeth was accordingly sent to the prison of the Conciergerie on the 10th of May, and appeared before her judges. The trial was of the same hasty kind which had always distinguished these examinations, being composed of a few absurd questions put to the prisoner: she had neither advocates nor witnesses of any description whatever, and was condemned to the guillotine without further ceremony.

Robespierre fed his vanity by taking the lead at a procession in honor of the Supreme Being; and the awkward joy which he shewed in return for this flattery, gave the malevolent an opportunity of calling him an ambitious conspirator, who meant to usurp the sovereign power. Attempts were soon made to assassinate some of his party, and he was foolish enough to exalt himself into a servant of the Most High, and mounted the tribune to thank God that he and his party, as faithful servants to their country, were accounted worthy of the daggers of tyrants.

After he had butchered thousands to his own safety, being tormented by unceasing suspicion and remorse, he in vain sought to convert his couch of thorns into a bed of roses. That terror at last took possession of his own guilty mind, which he had infused into the minds of all: he was perpetually haunted with the dread of approaching death. Solitary and abstracted in the midst of company, he seemed to hear nothing but the cries of the victims whom he had sacrificed to his insatiable ambition and vindictive cruelty.

One of the members of the convention, whose name was Bourdon de l'Oise, was bold enough to demand, that the decree should be re-established, which affirmed the persons of the representatives to be inviolable; and that none should be brought before the revolutionary tribunal, but by virtue of a decree of accusation from the convention itself, not from the committee of safety, in which Robespierre, together with Couthon and St. Just, the execrable instruments of his infamous tyranny, carried every thing before them; which decree passed before the sanguinary despot could recover from his astonishment. After this event, the party formed against him increased with great rapidity; and even Barrère, his celebrated and artful colleague, had a secret but effectual hand in the accomplishment of his destruction. It was evident that he plotted the overthrow of all whom he considered as his enemies, and it was believed that he intended openly to assume the office of dictator of the French republic. It is uncertain whether he looked upon Barrère as among the number of his enemies; but, on the 23d of July, that wonderful man delivered a speech in the convention, which was admirably calculated to plunge him into a fatal security. "This government," said he, "is odious on account of its energy. Let me conjure the convention not to sleep on its victories, but to strike terror among its conspirators." A speech which Robespierre delivered in the convention, on the 25th of July, gave clear indications of his future designs. "What a terrible use," said he, "have our enemies made of a word which at Rome was applied only to a public function!" Every thing now conspired to prove, that his influence in the convention was entirely gone. This of course was the critical moment. He had still the armed force of Paris at his command; but his sagacity and resolution appeared to fail him; his popularity was declining fast, and the galleries were only attentive to the speeches of his enemies.

Billaud Varennes openly complained, in the sitting of the 27th of July, "That the armed force of Paris was entrusted to paricidal hands. Henriot was denounced as an accomplice of Hebert. One man alone had the audacity to support him. Need I name him?—Robespierre. In order to effect his purpose, he has resolved to mutilate the convention, to leave there men only as vile as himself, and to inflict a fatal blow on the representatives of the people. I proclaim—I proclaim the tyranny of Robespierre." Bursts of applause resounded from every part of the hall, and Robespierre, turning red with fury, darted towards the tribune, while vast numbers of voices exclaimed, "Down with the tyrant! Down with the tyrant!" He had now to encounter universal imprecations; was not permitted to speak in his own defence; and Tallien rose "to congratulate the convention that the veil was at length withdrawn, and the real conspirators unmasked. Every thing announces that the enemy of the nation is about to fall. In the house of that guilty man, who now stands humbled with the consciousness of detected crimes, and overwhelmed with that detestation which his infamous designs against liberty have so justly merited, were formed those lists of proscription which have stained with so much blood the altars of rising liberty. He copied the example of the detestable Sylla. His proscriptions were intended only to prepare the way for his own power, and the establishment of a perpetual dictatorship.—Was it to subject ourselves to so abject and degrading a tyranny, that we brought to the scaffold the last of the Capets, that we declared eternal war against kings, and swore to establish liberty as the price of life? No! the spirit of liberty has not sunk so low. I invoke the shade of the virtuous Brutus; like him, I have a poniard to rid my country of the tyrant, if the convention do not deliver him to the sword of Justice. Let us, republicans, accuse him with the courage which springs from loyalty in the presence of the French people: and, as it is of the utmost importance that the chiefs of the armed force do no mischief, I move that Henriot and all his staff be arrested. I move that our sittings be permanent, until the sword of the law has secured to us this revolution. I also move, that Robespierre and his creatures be immediately arrested."

These motions passed amidst thunders of applause. Barrère was now desired to speak in the name of the committee of public safety; and after making a proposition that the national guard should resume its primary organization, and that the mayor of Paris should be made responsible for the safety of the convention, he freely and ardently joined against the fallen tyrant, who had exhibited the art of wearing so many different masks, and who, having no farther occasion for his creatures, never failed to send them to the guillotine.

Being overwhelmed with astonishment, Robespierre submitted to the decree of the convention without any farther opposition, and the proper officers conducted him to the prison of the Luxembourg; but the governor would not receive him, being one of his creatures, in consequence of which he was conveyed to the Hotel-de-Ville.

In the mean time Hebert effected his escape, and collected his adherents with that astonishing rapidity which desperation inspires. Having made three divisions of the troops under his command, he resolved at once to attack the Hotel-de-Ville, the committee of public safety, and the convention. A high degree of courage and presence of mind was exhibited by the legislative body at this very critical juncture; for they were no sooner made acquainted with the situation of affairs, than they pronounced Robespierre and his associates to be outlaws and traitors. Barras was chosen to the chief command of the troops; and the people were exhorted by proclamation to assert their own liberty, and prove the defenders of the national convention. The sections of Paris appeared at the bar, one after another, swearing to be subject to no other authority than that of the convention. When the president, Collot d'Herbois, returned them thanks in the name of the convention, he expressed a hope that the heads of the traitors would fall before the setting of the sun. These measures induced nearly the whole of the troops under Henriot to abandon him, while he himself, and a few who remained with him, took possession of the Hotel-de-Ville. Here they were resolutely attacked by a party of the conventional guards, with Bourdon de l'Oise and some other commissioners at their head, who rushed with impetuosity into the hall of the commune. The insurgents made a short but unsuccessful resistance, after which they endeavoured to make away with themselves. Robespierre, who had been previously wounded in the side by a sabre, discharged a pistol in his mouth, which produced no other effect than to add fresh horrors to his ghastly countenance. Le Bas shot himself dead on the spot, and Couthon terminated his wretched existence by means of a poniard. While Henriot, from an upper window, delivered an oration to the people, he was, by their desire, precipitated to the street, and was thus dreadfully wounded.

The convention put an end to its sitting about six in the morning, victory having declared in their favor, in consequence of which Robespierre, and the other criminals who had been outlawed, were instantly conveyed to the revolutionary tribunal, for no other purpose than to identify their persons, and then conveyed back to the palace of justice, being on the evening of the same day (July 28th) executed in the Place de la Revolution, to the number of twenty-one, the multitude expressing their joy and transport in a more tumultuous manner than was perhaps ever known. The eyes of the populace were particularly fixed on Robespierre, Couthon, and Henriot, who were covered with wounds, and blood mingled with dust. The last who fell under the axe of the guillotine was Robespierre, having remained on the scaffold the whole time in a state of stupefaction, speechless, and petrified with horror.

Such was the merited fate of a tyrant, whose memory is devoted to the execration of all mankind, and who was perhaps superior in ferocious wickedness to even the Neros, the Domitians, and the Catilines. Not long after this great and memorable event, a very general alteration for the better took place in the different branches of the government of France. The Jacobin club, that sink of tyranny and barbarity, was completely abolished, and seventy-one members of the proscribed Gironde party were restored to their seats in the national convention. Hundreds were liberated from various state prisons, most of whom would no doubt have fallen a sacrifice to the implacable cruelty of Robespierre, had it not been for this revolution.

The different parties into which the convention was at one time divided, united for the purpose of accomplishing the overthrow of the infamous Robespierre; yet, when the danger was over, the former animosity of the several factions began again to display itself. Those who formerly acted with Robespierre, wished to mitigate, but not to abolish the cruelties of the revolutionary government; while others were anxious not only to establish a regular constitution, but to bring to punishment all the advocates of his monstrous tyranny. Merlin of Douay, on the 27th of December, said there was just reason for examining into the conduct of Barrère, Billaud Varennes, Collet D'Herbois, and Vadier. The accusation of Barrère was extremely unpopular, because he had been frequently known to exert all his influence in diminishing the horrors of that remorseless tyrant, joining the combination formed against him even at a time when ultimate success was extremely doubtful; and because he delivered a very animated speech to rouse the people of France to rise as one man to banish despotic hirelings from the territories of the republic, the importance of which advice was still gratefully remembered.

On March 2, 1795, M. Saladin made the report

BOOK II. concerning the committee of twenty-one, who said that the guilt of the accused was very apparent.

CHAP. I. The 22d of the month was fixed for their trial, before which Vadier found means to escape in the disguise of a courier. Lindet and Carnot made a very able defence in their behalf, although two members of the same committee of safety, but under the influence of compulsion, during the reign of Robespierre, whom none durst oppose without inevitable destruction. On the 1st of April, a prodigious number of the lower classes in Paris went to the hall of the convention, declaring that the accused patriots should not fall a sacrifice to the passions of the other party. Dumont observed, "That all these tumults were excited only to prevent the trials of the three great criminals. Let us abolish the pain of death, but cast out these monsters from our society." It was in consequence decreed, that Barrère, Collet, and Billaud Varennes, should be immediately transported to Guiana. As General Pichegru was at this time in the capital, the convention made choice of him to command the armed force of that extensive city. By his authority and exertions tranquillity was happily restored, and the opportunity embraced of arresting several other leaders of the Jacobin faction, who were conveyed to the castle of Ham in Picardy.

The convention certainly punished the abuses of arbitrary power upon arbitrary principles, combining in their own persons the heterogeneous characters of accusers, witnesses, and judges; and the establishment of a regular constitution of government became more and more the object of the general wish. For this important purpose a committee of eleven was made choice of, that they might frame a constitutional code for the examination of the convention.

The trial of the notorious Fouquier Tainville, who had sustained the office of public accuser, with the ex-judges and jurors of the late revolutionary tribunal, was deferred till the 8th of May, from a variety of causes. It was no difficult matter to substantiate the most abominable crimes against this abandoned court, completely subversive of all public justice, in the room of which was substituted a kind of judicial assassination. Next morning Fouquier and fifteen others, either formerly judges or jurors, were executed amidst the hisses and execrations of the multitude.

The deputies of the Jacobin faction under sentence of transportation for Guiana had been embarked on board different vessels; but Cambon and Thuriot, having effected their escape, reached Paris with great secrecy, and found means to excite a most dangerous insurrection. Hand-bills were previously posted up in different parts of the city, in which a degree of scarcity prevailed little short of famine. The tocsin was sounded at an early hour on the 20th of May, in the suburb of St. Antoine, and the générale beaten. A decree passed as soon as the convention met, which commanded all citizens to repair to their respective sections, declaring their sitting permanent, and pronouncing sentence of outlawry against all those who should appear at the head of the insurgents. Disregarding these injunctions, however, vast multitudes even surrounded the hall of the convention, when the gendarmes were summoned to defend the persons of the deputies, and a terrible conflict took place between the military and insurgents. General Hoche was chosen to the command of the military force of Paris, but the tumults and disorders in the hall were still continued. One of the representatives, called Ferrand, was butchered by the rabble with the repeated strokes of a sabre, after which his head was severed from his body, and brought into the hall exhibited on a pike. The president continued uncommonly firm and undaunted during this horrible scene of violence, while the convention had much more the appearance of a camp of military men than an assembly of legislators. Many of the Girondists having left the hall, this opportunity was eagerly embraced by the Jacobin party, to repeal several decrees which had been levelled against themselves, which they accomplished, at this moment of consternation and terror, amidst the applauding shouts of a misguided multitude. The military having made their appearance in great force, together with a number of citizens in arms, the mob hurried with the utmost rapidity through the doors and windows. The pretended decrees of repeal were themselves repealed, or rather annulled, on the motion of Bourdon de l'Oise, and many of the Jacobin members, who were concerned in this horrid transaction, were put under arrest.

Next day, however, the convention was again surrounded by the multitude, and a deputation from the insurgents was reluctantly admitted. The president was under the necessity of returning a favorable answer to their demands, and submitted to the mortifying deed of giving its members the fraternal embrace, who were likewise invited to the honours of the sitting. The convention resumed on the third day the exercise of their functions, but, on the fourth, the inhabitants of the suburbs were again preparing to assault the hall of the convention, and the citizens of Paris arose to defend their representatives, filling every avenue which led to the Thuilleries. The convention resumed courage when they found themselves thus supported, and declared the suburb of St. Antoine to be in a state of rebellion; giving orders at the same time to the sections of Paris to march immediately against them, sustained by the skill and energy of the regular troops. The wretched, the deluded multitude, finding themselves surrounded on all sides, and exposed to an immediate cannonade, surrendered at discretion. A decree then passed the convention, ordering all the Jacobins to be disarmed, abolishing the use of pikes, and, by order of the legislature, the cannon of the different sections were delivered up. When this dreadful insurrection was finally suppressed, several of the leaders of it were arrested and executed. Collet D'Herbois, Billaud Varennes, and Barrère, were ordered back to stand their trial; but the two former had sailed already, and Barrère was committed to close imprisonment.

While thus reviewing the internal state of France, it will here be proper to mention, that the infant Capet, the only son of Louis XVI. died on the 9th of June, 1795, in the prison of the Temple, where he had been confined since the unfortunate 10th of August, 1792. He was a boy of a sickly habit of body, and his valetudinarian state of health was in all probability augmented by the want of proper exercise.

The committee of eleven presented, on the 23d of June, the plan of the new constitution, the report concerning which was made by Boissy D'Anglas. After much discussion, and a number of changes, the constitutional act was pronounced complete on the 23d of August, and referred to the primary assemblies, for the purpose of obtaining the sanction of their approbation. It may here be proper to present our readers with the principal features of this constitution.—The legislative power was to consist of two assemblies, the members of which were to be nominated by the electoral assemblies; the one was to consist of 500 members, and the other of half that number; the former were to propose, and the latter to confirm the laws. The executive power was to be lodged in the hands of a directory of five members, to be in part renewed by the election of one member in regular rotation. The council of five hundred were to propose a list of ten persons by secret scrutiny, out of whom the senate was to choose one in a similar manner. The judges of departments and districts were to have committed to them the judicial power, and these judges were to be elected by the electoral assemblies, and a tribunal of appeal and annulment established for the whole republic by a similar mode of election. It would be extremely uncandid to deny that this was unquestionably the outline of a free constitution; but one egregious blunder entirely destroyed its beneficial effects. The two councils were in some respects rendered permanent, since the directory had not the power of convening and dismissing those formidable bodies in conformity to its discretion, which ought always to be the case, and as the ministers of the executive government could not sit in the legislative assemblies, which unavoidably created an opposition of interests. The functions of the executive power were necessarily encroached on by the councils; and the same act in reality established two distinct governments. The authority of the executive power was likewise very much weakened by being put into the hands of five persons, who, it was natural to think, would be actuated by different interests; and it was believed that it would have been more conducive to the general welfare to lodge it in the hands of a single person, under whatever name.

On the 22d of August, before the constitutional act was sent to the primary assemblies, it was decreed by the convention, that, in choosing the deputies, the electors should return two-thirds from among the members of the present convention; and, if a deficiency happened, the members wanting were to be nominated by the legislative body itself. The sections of Paris were much displeased with this decree, which they in vain endeavoured to have rescinded, and therefore declared openly, that means more forcible than remonstrances were necessary to bring the convention to reason. On the 4th of October, at midnight, the insurgents were heard to exclaim, "To arms! to arms! liberty or death!" By the dawn of day a bloody battle commenced, the insurgents having drawn out their forces to march against the convention. They suffered very severely from the cannon which were planted in the avenues of the Tuilleries, yet they often rallied, and returned to the charge with determined obstinacy, fighting the whole day before they were completely vanquished, with the loss, it has been said, of nearly 2000 men.

When the new legislature met, they first proceeded to the election of five men to constitute the executive directory; viz. Reveillière Lepaux, Reubel, Letourneur de la Manche, Barras, and the celebrated Carnot, the last of them being chosen instead of the profound Sieyès, who saw too clearly the radical defects of the new constitution, to have any concern in the execution of it. It deserves notice, that these men were inclined to the mountain or jacobin party, although certainly inimical to the horrid tyranny of Robespierre; but the late violent proceedings had made such an impression, that a majority of the two councils were unhappily disposed to elect men of ardent minds, possessing more courage and vigor than wisdom and moderation. Barras was formerly a viscount, trained from his early youth to the military service, and had very much distinguished himself in the suppression of riots, at the head of the conventional troops. Letourneur de la Manche was a man of abilities, whose character was unexceptionable, and he was an officer of engineers before the revolution. Carnot was formerly minister of war, and a member of the execrable committee of public safety, during the tyranny of Robespierre; but he had wholly confined himself to the duties of his peculiar department, and the success of his measures was perhaps the most splendid in the annals of history. Reubel had been bred a lawyer, and was employed in negotiating the treaty with Holland; and Reveilliere Lepaux was likewise a lawyer, one of the deputies of the Gironde, proscribed by virtue of the revolution of the 31st of May, 1793.

A treaty of defensive alliance was concluded, in the month of February, 1795, with the Empress of Russia, which was certainly not very favorable to the interests of Great Britain. If his Britannic majesty should be attacked by any power whatever, the empress, by the fourth article of the treaty, was to assist him with 10,000 infantry and 2000 cavalry; and, should Russia be attacked by any European power, Britain was to send twelve sail of the line, to continue in the Baltic from the beginning of May to the month of October.

Notwithstanding the agitated state of the government of France at this period, yet the repeated successes of her arms rendered her so formidable, that the coalition which had been formed against her began to dissolve; and most of the neighbouring powers were ready to acknowledge the republic in the beginning of 1795. A treaty of peace was concluded between France and Tuscany on the 9th of February. The King of Prussia, also, entered into a negotiation with the committee of public safety, and at length concluded a treaty, April 5, by means of his minister, Baron de Hardenberg, with Citizen Barthelemy, the French ambassador, at Basle. While this pacification, without surrendering any of the acquisitions on the left bank of the Rhine, withdrew a powerful enemy from the alliance against France, it also contributed greatly to the aggrandizement of Prussia; and, by admitting a number of states in the north of Germany to the benefits of neutrality, added greatly to the influence of Frederick-William II. in the empire. The mediation of this sovereign also procured an opportunity for the Landgrave of Hesse Cassel to retire from the war; and the latter prince not only agreed that the French should still occupy one of his fortresses, Rheinfeldt, but also stipulated neither to prolong nor renew the two subsidiary treaties with the court of Great Britain.

A treaty of peace was likewise concluded between France and Spain, July 22. The Regent of Sweden not only sent an ambassador to Paris, to compliment the convention in the name of his nephew, Gustavus Adolphus IV. but is also reported to have signified a wish to enter into a close alliance with the republic of France.

England, however, persevered in the struggle, Mr. Pitt having declared that the necessity and policy of the war were very apparent; the arguments of this able statesman, however, could not open the eyes of those who were advocates for a pacification.

CHAPTER II.

Review of the War of La Vendée.—Defection of the Republican Army.—Fontenay-le-Peuple seized by the Vendéans.—Their Defeat.—Defeat of the Republicans.—Battle of Chollet.—Capture of Noirmoulier.—Action at Martigné.—Battle at Mans.—Defeat of Charette.—Cruelties.—Treaty concluded by the Chiefs of La Vendée.

LA VENDEE being in a state of insurrection, as mentioned in the preceding Book, Chapter VII. Canelaux and Hoche were employed to counteract the horrors of a civil war, which at this time seemed inevitable; the Vendéan chiefs were suspected, and a correspondence with the English had been intercepted.

Some of the regiments, which had been sent by the convention against the Vendéans, began to imbibe their principles; many of the troops of the line deserted to them, and the foreigners in the French service went over in large bodies; the legion of Rosental, in particular, repaired in crowds to the white standard; while the greater part of the Germanic legion, especially the cavalry, withdrew in a body within their limits. A corps of infantry, of this description, assumed the appellation of "Avengers of the crown;" and, conscious that no mercy could be expected from their enemy, they neither gave nor received quarter, but fought with an uncommon degree of valor.

The catholic and royal army, as it was called among the Vendéans, besides other valiant achievements, took possession of Fontenay-le-peuple, the chief town in the department, which continued to be their head-quarters for some time. The Vendéan war now began to exhibit a degree of regularity which threatened the downfall of the republic. A sovereign council, consisting of generals, priests, and civilians, assembled at Chatillon, and not only directed all the operations of the army, but concentrated all authority within itself. Bernard de Marigny was the president at this board; while Lescure, Stofflet, D'Elbée, Fleuriot, Beauchamp, and others, gave their assistance. The ancient laws were substituted in the place of the new code, all acts of authority were proclaimed in the name of Louis XVII., and no assignat was suffered to have currency unless sanctioned by their signature.

The exclusive establishment of the catholic religion, and the plenary restoration of loyalty, were the views of all. The insurgent army assumed a new form, and the peasantry were classed into communes and divisions, styled the "defenders of the altar and the throne." Regular battalions of infantry, squadrons of cavalry, and seven regiments of artillery, were formed from among the foreign deserters; some of these were, in point of discipline, equal to the first troops in England; and they were regularly paid, and even billeted. But, notwithstanding this regularity, and the unity of sentiment which prevailed, the leaders differed frequently about the means of effecting their wishes; and many of them, actuated by ambition, aspired to the supreme rank, to the entire exclusion of their colleagues. Talmont and D'Autichamp imagined that their birth entitled them to superiority; Charette thought his military talents and the number of his followers should recommend him; however, D'Elbée, who boasted of both parentage and abilities, was elected generalissimo. In consequence of this difference among the chiefs, two distinct bodies of troops were formed; the catholic and royal army of Anjou and Upper Poitou, under the direction of D'Elbée; and the army of Jesus, or Lower Poitou, led by Charette.

The convention, in order to oppose this formidable rebellion, sent detachments from the northern departments, and several battalions of national guards, cavalry, and chasseurs; which, being collected together, was entitled the army of the West.

These republican troops, drawn up in form of a semicircle, endeavoured to pierce the revolted provinces on all points, but on all points were constantly defeated. The Vendéans, becoming assailants in their turn, appeared on the plains in large unbroken companies, from 20 to 30,000 men; while one army, under Charette, menaced Nantes, and advanced under the cannon of Les Sables; June 2, another seized on Saumur, after a battle in which the republicans lost, as imagined, 23,000 men, in killed, wounded, and prisoners; General Chalbot, beaten under the walls of Fontenay, lost 1500 men, a vast quantity of fire-arms, and from twenty-five to thirty cannon. BOOK II.

General Quétineau, with nearly 6,000 troops, although stationed within Thouars, only resisted two hours; and with the possession of this place, the insurgents obtained 7000 muskets and twelve pieces of artillery. Menou was equally unfortunate, although invested with the chief command, and supported by a considerable army; still he was incapable of defending Saumur, the capture of which emboldened the Vendéans to cross a river hitherto the boundary of their incursions. CHAP. II.

The Vendéans remained ten days at Saumur, and then directed their march, towards the right bank of the Loire; and having first menaced Tours, they obtained possession of Angers. In the month of June the siege of Nantes was resolved upon, and they appeared before that place at a period when every thing seemed auspicious to the royal cause. The only fortifications consisted of a few ditches and some mounds of earth thrown up in great haste; the cannon were supplied from the navy, and the garrison was composed of about 10,000 men, mostly national guards. On the other hand, the besieging army amounted to at least 30,000 troops, under D'Elbée, who had been ever victorious from the commencement of the war. A second body of nearly equal force, commanded by Charette, invested the city, which was so defended by the republican generals, Canclaux and Bonvoust, that D'Elbée and Charette failed in their design.

At the epoch when Nantes was attacked, the insurgents were in the height of their power; and its capture would have been considered as a signal of general insurrection in Brittany. Had that event taken place, the castle of O, and Painbœuf on the Loire, and all the fortified ports on the coast, would have fallen into the hands of the Vendéans. The cause of the miscarriage originated partly in the disputes among the leaders, and partly in their ignorance of the art of attacking fortified places.

Biron, a general of experience, having been dispatched for the purpose of terminating this war, obtained, on his arrival, some advantages at Luçon, and soon after established his headquarters at Niort, where he collected about 16,000 chosen men. Having confided his advanced guard to Westermann, who had commanded at the attack on the Tuilleries, this officer surprised one of the Vendéan chiefs, and obtained possession of Parthenay; but soon after he was himself surrounded, and with great difficulty escaped at the head of his horse, his cannon having been taken and his infantry cut to pieces. Westermann was consequently deprived of his command; and General Biron, who was suspected of remaining inactive, while his van was sacrificed at Châtillon, and one of his detachments completely

BOOK II. beaten at Vihiers, was recalled, and expiated his ill fortune by a premature death, through the enmity of his accusers.

CHAP. II.

The rebellion of La Vendée still continued formidable, and the ruling party became alarmed. On the arrest of Biron, generals of another description were sought, it having been determined that none but plebeians should for the future be entrusted. In September, Rossignol, formerly a journeyman goldsmith, was accordingly appointed to the command of the army of Brest, who immediately established his head-quarters at Saumur, where he collected his scattered forces. Soon after he took the field, and commenced his operations by the capture of Doué. At this critical time, the chiefs of the insurgents were again divided by their personal jealousies. The Prince de Talmont, who possessed large estates on the right bank of the Loire, and had achieved some brilliant exploits after crossing that river, still aspired to the supreme command, although he had been recalled from a dungeon in Angers by the general-in-chief, D'Elbée. Lescure, who was rescued by Stofflet from a similar confinement in the prison of Bressuire, was another candidate, in consequence of the skill and bravery he had displayed in an action before Thouars two years before. Chevaliers D'Autichamp and Charette were also other candidates. Had these leaders been cordially united, they might not only have been a match for the plebeian general, now elated with his success at Doué, but they might have regulated the fate of France.

The republican army had been considerably increased by fresh reinforcements from all parts of the empire; and the garrison of Mentz, which had not been precluded by the King of Prussia serving at La Vendée, added to their strength. The convention at this time adopted measures most shamefully severe. Fire, as well as the sword, was to be carried into the recesses of La Vendée; the banditti, as they were entitled, were to be pursued to their most secret retreats; the villages which afforded them occasional shelter, were to be destroyed, the granaries to be burned, the windmills and ovens to be thrown down, the cattle and crops to be seized, and the peaceable part of the inhabitants to be removed. Such were the measures resorted to, which neither justice nor policy could sanction.

A council of war, consisting of eleven deputies and eleven officers, was convoked by the representatives on mission, in order to deliberate on the expediency of a general assault. Different opinions, however, arose among the members, concerning the side on which the enemy ought to be attacked. Canclaux was for commencing operations by the west, which was opposed by Menou; others thought Doué was the point whence they could begin with the greatest advantage; while Turreau observed, "that as the country occupied by the rebels formed a kind of square, of which the sea and the Loire constituted two sides, they ought to close upon and drive them into the angle formed by these two natural barriers, by commencing the assault from the opposite quarter." As the plan proposed by Canclaux was preferred, the direction thereof devolved on that general, who entered La Vendée on the side of Nantes with three columns; and after carrying Sainpen Lege and Machecoul, intended to unite all his forces, and proceed against Chollet, the centre of the rebellion.

Notwithstanding their private disputes, the Vendéan leaders now united their efforts against the republicans. Accordingly General Beysser, who led one of the invading columns, was surprised at Montaigu; Canclaux, who by this time had obtained possession of Clisson, on being informed of Beysser's misfortune, prepared to fall back; but being also attacked, he effected his retreat in disorder, and was obliged to take shelter under the cannon of Nantes, while he beheld his baggage carried off, and his wounded men strangled. Soon after this, Rossignol was assaulted at Doué by a division of the grand catholic and royal army, but was indebted entirely to General D'Amburere, an officer of engineers, who arranged the troops, disposed the artillery, and took post on a commanding eminence, for having obtained an easy victory over the Prince de Talmont and M. D'Autichamp.

In order to profit by this success, Santerre, formerly a brewer in Paris, advanced against Coron with a body of troops forming a single column, and headed by the representatives of the people. Though the insurgents were driven from Coron, Santerre was soon after attacked in this town by a body of about 30,000 men, who advanced in form of a crescent, and counteracted the effects of a battery of two 12-pounders and two mortars, erected on the great road, by three 8-pounders stationed in their centre. The republican army, after an engagement for nearly an hour, was routed.

Bouchet, then minister of war, having invested Lechelle, originally a fencing-master at Saintes, with the command of the army of the West, that general penetrated to Chatillon. After taking that place, he was attacked, October 16, by D'Elbée, Bouchamp, and Stofflet, who had assembled the wreck of the catholic and royal army, which still amounted to 40,000 men. During an engagement of two hours, victory seemed to incline to the assailants; but Merlin and the other deputies placing themselves at the head of the troops, and D'Elbée, Bouchamp, and some of the principal royalists, being wounded, the Vendéans were at length defeated. Their cause appeared at this time desperate, as the Prince de Talmont and Charette had either declined to form a junction with or to support the confederates by means of a diversion. But, notwithstanding the insurgents disappeared, they were not destroyed.

At length the Vendéans, burning with implacable fury to renew the contest and recover their glory, retaliated on their adversaries; and Lechelle, who had hitherto triumphed in opposition to all the rules of war, was overcome under the walls of Chollet, the scene of his former success. Hereupon he was suspended from all his functions by the representatives with the army, and, having been imprisoned at Nantes, he died soon after of a broken heart.

Taking advantage of the absence of the army of Rochelle, Charette, who had lately declined to succour the other chiefs, now marched at the head of the insurgents of Lower Poitou, and seized on the islands of Bouin and Noirmoutier; and although he was successively defeated by Haxo, Dutruy, and Dufour, and even lost the former of these acquisitions, yet his army still appeared vigorous and formidable.

The major part of the republican forces having crossed the Loire in search of the Prince de Talmont, the Vendéans crept forth from their places of concealment, began to assemble in bodies, and in a short time resumed all their former audacity. On the contrary, the diminution of the army of the west was daily apparent; the cavalry decreased with incessant toil, and numbers of the infantry perished by fatigue of forced marches in a close country; in short, the number of commissioned and non-commissioned officers in many of the corps, exceeded that of the soldiers, so that 157 squadrons, battalions, or regiments, formed scarcely 40,000 men. A division of 15,000 men had been indeed dispatched from the army of the north, to supply the loss of the garrison of Mentz, most of which had been already cut off. In addition to these disadvantages, the commanders, who were frequently changed, were wholly unacquainted with the art of war, as well as with the manners of the people against whom they marched.

The place of Lechelle was supplied by Danican, who commenced his military career under auspicious circumstances, and displayed a degree of moderation which in times like these was deserving of the highest praise. However, as this general was defeated at Martigné, he was suspected of a secret attachment to the cause of the royalists; his remonstrances on the occasion were productive of no benefit; and although he afterwards overcame the same enemy before Angers, December 5, he was recalled and disgraced.

The provisional command was then given to Marceau, a general of division, and scarcely twenty-four years of age; who, soon after his appointment, December 12, fought a long and sanguinary battle, in which he defeated the insurgents led by the Prince de Talmont. The slaughter of the Vendéans during this engagement was immense; and, had it not been for the exemplary conduct of a young royalist, Laroche Jacquelin, who gallantly secured the retreat of the fugitives, and succeeded in conducting them back to the almost inaccessible roads, these unfortunate people would in all probability have been nearly exterminated.

After this victory, Marceau was immediately recalled on purpose to superintend the operations of the army of the Ardennes. Turreau, who succeeded him, had formerly acted as adjutant-general in the insurgent departments, and since commanded the troops in the eastern Pyrenees. As he had received instructions from the ministers at war to retake Noirmoutier, situated at the mouth of the Loire, he made a descent for that purpose with a body of about 3000 light troops; while Carpentier, in pursuance of his orders, attacked Charette at Machecoul, in his way to the relief of that island. Having effected a landing with the loss of a few men, he proceeded against the principal village, placed in the midst of salt-pits, and protected by about 1260 men and nearly twenty pieces of artillery; but, although the garrison at first exhibited a show of resistance, yet, being unacquainted with the defence of fortifications, they abandoned the lines without firing a single shot. This act of cowardice sorely embittered the last moments of D'Elbée, the celebrated Vendéan chief and generalissimo of all the forces beyond the Loire; who, in consequence of a mortal wound, was now languishing in his bed. Some of the leaders, particularly Willaud and D'Hauterive, were made prisoners; and Cathelinier, one of Charette's confidential officers, was also taken by Turreau, who had distinguished himself by this brilliant exploit.

The wreck of the grand catholic and royal army having been collected and re-organized by the remaining chiefs, it was divided into three circles, in consequence of the death of D'Elbée, and commanded by Stofflet, Laroche, Jacquelin, and Bernard de Marigny; while Charette, who seemed to have been rendered more valiant by having endured thirty successive defeats, still maintained the terror of his name at the head of a body of faithful followers.

Two detachments of the republicans having penetrated to Chollet, the intrepid Laroche Jacquelin, gliding with a body of troops during night between two others, fell on the rear of Turreau, and seized on the town of Chemillé, the garrison of which abandoned it without firing a gun. General Turreau, however, ordered the two columns at Chollet to attack Charette by the east, while two others, still more numerous, were to advance

BOOK II. against him by the west. Charette, remarkable for his sagacity, was not to be found by his antagonists. In avoiding General Duquesnoy, now in full pursuit of him, he fell upon Legé, the advanced post of General Haxo, which he carried, occupied, and abandoned in succession. At length overtaken at Pont James, he was compelled to give battle, and, although defeated with the loss of 8000 men, he safely conducted the main body of his army to the Brocage, still remaining, notwithstanding all his disasters, unsubdued. Stofflet then appeared before Chollet, in order to attack it. The garrison, alarmed at the ferocity of his followers, fled after the first discharge of musketry, though threatened and intreated by Moulin, the general of division, who commanded there, to stay and defend the place. Indignant at the cowardice of his troops, Moulin, who was at the same time wounded by two shots from the enemy, snatched a pistol from his belt, and put an end to his miserable existence.

No sooner did intelligence of this event reach Paris, than the convention decreed, that the memory of Moulin was dear to his country; and orders at the same time were given for the erection of a tomb to his memory at Tiffanges.

The general-in-chief, Turreau, once more marched to attack Charette at Luc; but, on advancing against that place, he found that the Vendéan chief had gained his rear, and taken post at St. Philibert-de-Boué. Having by a rapid counter-march reached the neighbourhood of the latter station, to his great mortification Charette had already decamped. An action, however, commenced on the part of the marksmen of the republican army; but, as usual, Charette avoided a general engagement. At length, being pressed and pursued on every side, he was overtaken April 26, and defeated by a body of troops commanded by General Haxo. The Vendéans, however, remained in the same district as before: and Haxo killed himself, like Moulin, apprehensive of falling into the hands of the enemy.

Stofflet twice overcame General Grignon, and was also twice defeated by that general. Charette was once more foiled at Challans; but retreated, with his usual good fortune, into the strong woody country called the Bocage. Adjutant-general Dusirat was about the same time beaten by Stofflet and Marigny, near Mount Gléne.

The cruelty of Turreau was at this period taken great notice of. This general, on his commencement, is said to have addressed his soldiers in the following language:—

“We are about to enter the country of the insurgents. You are to burn every thing, and bayonet all the inhabitants. There may be indeed some few patriots among them; but, notwithstanding that, the whole must be sacrificed.”

Other republican generals were equally as cruel; and some of the deputies sent to those devoted departments acted more like executioners than legislators. Francastel assisted Carrier in the massacre of the priests of Nantes; and he himself is said to have issued an order to bind sixty-one of the clergy of Nièvre together, and drown them, by means of a vessel sunk for that purpose. The following were his directions to General Grignon:—

“You must make the robbers tremble, and give them no quarter. Our prisons are crowded. What! prisoners in La Vendée!—It is necessary to burn all the lone houses, the mills, and, above all, the castles; in short, to transform the whole country into a desert—no mildness, no clemency. Such are the intentions of the convention.”

The Vendéans retaliated these cruelties, even with the approbation of the priests, and with the assistance of the women. All the republican prisoners, even those who had not carried arms, finished their existence in dreadful and prolonged tortures. Every cruel device which the most rancorous enmity could invent, was perpetrated on the mutilated bodies of their expiring enemies, in the name of the catholic faith and of Louis XVII.

Turreau being unable to finish this war, notwithstanding his plausible system of entrenched camps and moveable columns, was recalled. Conciliation was adopted, as the best means of terminating those miseries. Hoche, at the head of a powerful army, extended the olive-branch of peace with one hand, and the sword of war with the other; and, while he willingly received the peasantry under his protection, on a simple promise of submission, he gained over several of the leaders by commissions. A treaty was accordingly signed at Jaulnay, near Nantes, by Charette on the part of the Vendéans, and Carmartin on behalf of the Chouans. For about a fortnight Stofflet refused to fix his signature as chief of the army of Poitou; but he at length consented.

Substance of the treaty of peace, signed by Charette, on the part of the inhabitants of La Vendée, and the commissioners of the National Convention, March 7, 1795:—

Article I. The representatives of the people promise, in the name of the convention, that the sum of eighty millions shall be granted to the inhabitants of La Vendée to indemnify them for the losses, burnings, and devastations, they have suffered.

II. Forty millions shall be immediately paid and distributed.

III. All the contracts entered into between the generals and inhabitants of La Vendée shall be discharged by the French republic.

IV. The sum of ten millions shall be deposited for that purpose.

V. The inhabitants of La Vendée acknowledge the French republic.

VI. and VII. General Charette shall have the command of a body of 2000 men, in the pay of the republic, consisting of three battalions, to be stationed at Machecoul, Challans, and a third town to be determined hereafter.

VIII. A list shall be given of such persons as shall be banished from La Vendée; that list to be drawn up and presented by General Charette.

IX. The free exercise of the catholic religion shall be permitted; ground may be purchased for the building of a church, but there shall not be any bells or exterior ceremonies.

X. XI. and XII. The banished nonjuring priests may return, but can only be restored to their patrimonial estates. There shall be no districts or municipalities, but only a national agent in La Vendée, in which no requisitions shall take place for the space of five years.

Summary of the treaty, signed by Carmartin, between the inhabitants in Brittany, known by the name of Chouans, and the French Convention:—

Article I. The laws for the freedom of religious worship shall be put in execution. BOOK II.

II. The Chouans, who have neither profession nor estate, shall be received into the armies of the republic. CHAP. II.
1795.

III. The inhabitants of the insurgent departments shall be allowed to organize a body of chasseurs, not to exceed 2,400 men.

IV. and V. The youth of the first requisition shall remain at home; and the contracts entered into by the chiefs for defraying the expences of the war, shall be liquidated to the amount of one million five hundred thousand livres.

Thus terminated, for the present, the war of La Vendée, with disgrace to the convention, who had ordered a speedy annihilation of the country. How far the French were faithful to the above treaties, will be seen in our Fourth Chapter; where the reader will find, that hostilities were not only renewed, but that the bravest of the Vendéan chiefs were either shot or guillotined as traitors.

CHAPTER III.

Preparations for a Campaign.—Disposition of the French Armies.—Commencement of Hostilities.

—Surrender of Luxemburg.—Jourdan crosses the Rhine.—Pichegru follows him.—Capture of Dusseldorf, Berg, and Manheim, by the Imperial Army.—Retreat of Jourdan and Pichegru.

—The French worsted on all sides.—Campaign in Italy.—Cursory Remarks.

A SUBSIDIARY treaty having been signed at Vienna between Great Britain and Austria, May 4, as "the Emperor and King of Great Britain were equally convinced of the necessity of acting with vigor and energy against the common enemy, in order to procure to their respective dominions a safe and honorable peace," the latter engaged to guarantee the regular payment of the half-yearly dividends, on the sum of four millions six hundred thousand pounds sterling, to be raised on account of his Imperial Majesty; who, in return, stipulated to employ in his different armies, in the ensuing campaign, a body of troops which should not be under the number of 200,000 men, to act against the common enemy. The emperor, according to this agreement, immediately re-united his forces, strengthened his garrisons, and prepared a numerous and well-disciplined army for the field.

Equal preparations were also made on the part of the French. The army of the Sambre and Meuse was confided to Jourdan; the army of the North to Moreau; and the army of the Rhine and Moselle to Pichegru, who, in case of a junction, was to act as generalissimo. The armies of the Alps and Italy were united under Kellermann; the army of the eastern Pyrenees was to be led by General Scherer, and that of the western by Marceau; while Conclaux was to command a body of troops in the neighbourhood of the insurgent department, and Hoche to have the direction of the joint armies of the coast of Brest and Cherbourg. Such was the disposition of the French armies.

As the French were unable to secure the possession of the Austrian Netherlands, without previously reducing Luxemburg, they were determined to make a bold attempt on that fortress, which they had formerly taken; but by the treaty of Utrecht it had been restored to the house of Austria, and was now rendered nearly impregnable. The republican generals, aware that its reduction was extremely difficult, and would be easier effected by famine than by the sword, cut off all supplies, and left a numerous garrison to subsist entirely on its own magazines. This place was under the command of Field-marshal Bender, a veteran general; but, as it was regularly in-

BOOK II. vested, without the most distant prospect of relief, he was under the necessity of capitulating, and yielding, not to courage, but to stratagem.

CHAP. III.

Thus far successful, the French were determined upon the subjection of Mentz, which the King of Prussia had recently wrested from them. Accordingly, the blockade of this city was the first operation that took place on the frontiers of Germany. The defence of Mentz, formerly entrusted to the troops of the house of Brandenburg, had now devolved upon the emperor, who was pleased to select Marshal Clairfayt, as the most able officer, to whom the command of the troops collected for that purpose could be confided. Though, towards the termination of the last campaign, this general had been driven across the Rhine, yet, undismayed, he returned to the charge; and, having gallantly attacked and routed the French, who were posted upon the heights of Mornbach, on the 7th of May he and his troops occupied that advantageous position.

In the month of October, however, Germany was menaced with a new invasion, and Mentz with a new siege, by Generals Jourdan and Pichegru. A considerable time having elapsed in preparation, a large portion of the army of the Sambre and Meuse suddenly crossed the Rhine, October 6, in the neighbourhood of Dusseldorf, which city was immediately summoned to surrender. It was taken by assault, but not before the Austrians had fortunately retreated. The duchy of Berg was also over-run; and the imperial army retiring on every side, a large quantity of ammunition and artillery fell into the hands of the invaders, who again invested Mentz.

When Pichegru had received intelligence of this success, he immediately crossed the Rhine with his army, and advancing against Manheim, obtained possession of that city, but with such astonishing facility, that it was evident, from the strength of the place, that the inhabitants had been seduced. Hereupon General Wurmser, who was advancing by rapid marches to the relief of Manheim, in vain endeavoured to form a junction with Marshal Clairfayt, having been overtaken and defeated by a detachment of the army of the Rhine and Moselle. The imperial arms, notwithstanding this sudden reverse, recovered their good fortune; for, having soon after surprised and overcome their enemy, they boasted of superior advantages.

As Pichegru was now no longer capable of assisting his colleague, Jourdan was under the necessity of raising the siege of Mentz, and retreating before the victorious Austrians to Dusseldorf, when he repassed the Rhine. In the mean time, Pichegru fell back upon Manheim; and, after leaving a considerable garrison in that place, and sustaining several sanguinary attacks, he was also very happy to cross that river, and effect his escape.

On the 29th of October, Marshal Clairfayt, having appeared before Mentz, attacked and carried the entrenched camp, which, by the assiduous labour of eleven months, the French had endeavoured to render impregnable. On the retreat of Jourdan, General Schaal occupied this strong position with fifty-two battalions of infantry and five regiments of cavalry. He was, however, obliged to retire, and leave in the possession of the assailants 260 pieces of cannon and 200 ammunition waggons. They also took about 2000 prisoners, among whom were two generals.

Notwithstanding the garrison of Manheim consisted of about 9000 men, it made an ineffectual resistance. On November 23, the Imperialists obtained possession of an entrenched hill, called the Guyenberg, by assault, as well as Nacker fort; but, though they were driven from the latter, such was their obstinate perseverance and unabating ardor, that this important city was at length obliged to capitulate after a long siege.

Other disasters the French army were also obliged to encounter. Marshal Clairfayt and General Wurmser had crossed the Rhine in pursuit of them; and, having formed a junction, they resumed possession of the Palatinate, and not only retook many of the acquisitions of the French, but even threatened to recover Luxemburg.—Hereupon, Pichegru and Jourdan, having received the necessary reinforcements, marched to encounter the victorious foe. Pichegru carried the town of Kreutznach twice by storm, in the course of one day, December 1; but he was obliged to evacuate it soon after; while Jourdan, equally unsuccessful, was repulsed on the 20th of December, in an attack upon Kayserlautern, in which he lost 2000 men.

The severity of the weather, and an unexpected armistice of three months, put an end to this campaign, the close of which was far different from its commencement, and indeed from what might have been predicted, in consequence of the superior numbers of the French forces. The troops of the house of Austria, who were now entirely destitute of the support of the Prussians, with whom they had been formerly united, conducted themselves with exemplary skill and uncommon bravery. The Field-marshal Clairfayt and Wurmser added greatly to their former reputation; and the generals Boros, Kray, and Had-dick, displayed the most promising talents.

The reputation of the French generals, Pichegru and Jourdan, experienced a sudden diminution, in consequence of the losses they had sustained; and these generals, which is so frequently the case on such occasions, endeavoured to attach the blame to each other, and by these means became inveterate enemies.

The peace with Spain had produced a considerable effect on the military operations in Italy.

As soon as the court of Spain agreed to the termination of hostilities, the French troops, which had crossed the Pyrenees in search of conquests, soon found their way to the Appenines; and Kellermann became possessed of all the summits of the Alps, from the lake of Geneva to the county of Nice. For some time, however, the war was defensive in this quarter; and while the Austrians entrenched themselves at Borghetto and Albenga, the French strengthened their position at Dego, neither of the armies paying any attention to the neutrality of Genoa, the territories of which were occasionally invaded and occupied by both. This is the more remarkable, when we consider that the war was ostensibly undertaken on one side in defence of religion and monarchy, and on the other in behalf of the liberties of mankind. It seems, however, that neither party, when it suited its interests, paid the least respect to the rights of independent nations.

In the mean time, General de Vins, who had again assumed the direction of the Austro-Sardinian army, extended his redoubts along Mount Balin, which commands Savona and Vado, for the purpose of securing a retreat, in case he should be pressed with superior forces, and also with the view of keeping up the communication with Alexandria and Savona, whence he drew his supplies.

In consequence of the capture of all neutral vessels laden with corn in the Mediterranean, the army of Italy was at length reduced by famine; and a council of war having been held at Albenga, Oct. 26, it was determined to attack the Imperialists throughout the whole extent of their line, with a view of chasing them from the dominions of Genoa, and obtaining a supply of provisions. Several partial engagements accordingly took place, in one of which the generals Augereau and Chastel drove the Austrians from Campo di Petra, with the loss of 500 prisoners. They were again attacked, November 16, by General Scherer, in the valley of Loano; and, on the 22d, after a battle which lasted from six o'clock in the morning until five in the afternoon, the Imperialists were obliged to retreat to Garesio, with the loss of 8000, who were either killed or made prisoners. This action being renewed at break of day, Nov. 24, the Austro-Sardinians retreated towards Savona and Bagniano. De Vins, in this state of embarrassment, summoned the senate of Genoa to surrender the fortress of Savona, which was refused; and not being able to obtain possession of the place by force, the allies were obliged to pass the defiles of the Bochetta, and retire towards Acqui. Hereupon the French took possession of Pietra, Loano, Finale, and Vado, as well as of the immense magazines which the Austrians had collected at Savona. By means of this success, the barriers of the Pyrenees were completely laid open to the invaders.

The excesses, however, which accompanied their triumphs, soon reduced the republican army to a state of complete anarchy. In the mean time, the emperor, by his recent successes on the Rhine, was enabled to detach a body of 25,000 men into Italy, who fortified a position on the back of the Appenines; while the court of Turin, fully aware of its critical situation, sent a reinforcement of 6000 troops to General Colli, who commanded the Sardinian army. These circumstances added to their disorganization, and stopped for the present the career of the French.

The allies, however, were prevented from accomplishing any important enterprise by the rigor of the season, the mountains being at this time covered with snow; and the fate of Italy was consequently postponed.

CHAPTER IV.

Renewal of the Civil War in La Vendée.—Expedition to the Coast of Brittany.—Landing of the Emigrants at Quiberon.—Fort Penthièvre taken.—De Puisaye's Proclamation.—Hoche dispatched with an Army.—His Proceedings.—Fort Penthièvre retaken by the French.—Sudden Attacks.—Unfortunate Termination of the Expedition.

THE French government, under pretence of bad faith, having refused to advance the sum stipulated in the late treaty with the chiefs of La Vendée, as mentioned in a former chapter, another civil war broke out, and orders were issued to arrest several of the principal insurgents. Clermont, who had been permitted to traverse the departments lately in commotion, with a view of preventing further hostilities, was seized in the act of distributing forged assignats. Tinçinac de la Bossière was also taken prisoner, when about to repair to Jersey. Cormartin was stopped, and likewise imprisoned, under the accusation of spending the money advanced to him in recruiting a new army. Charette, of whom the French government was particularly jealous, was likewise BOOK II. surrounded with spies. Another correspondence between the Vendéan chiefs and the English ministry having been intercepted, hostilities were unavoidable.

CHAP. IV.

1795.

On the 16th of June, a report was made to the convention relative to the critical situation of La Vendée; and on the 21st, a manifesto appeared on the part of the insurgents, which was published in form at the head-quarters of Charette and Stofflet.

An expedition to the coast of Brittany had in the mean time been meditated by the British government, for the purpose of attacking France in the most vulnerable point. A number of regiments were accordingly raised and embodied, consisting partly of the unhappy Toulonese, who had been forced to abandon their country, and partly of those who had retired from France at different periods. As the number of volunteers for this desperate undertaking was insufficient, a multitude of prisoners were recruited from the gaols, a measure which had nearly proved fatal, as some of the troops exhibited a spirit of mutiny immediately after they sailed.

The youthful but promising Count de Sombreuil, who, by an extraordinary degree of courage, had lately obtained a military decoration from the King of Prussia; and the Count d'Hervilly, a general anterior to the abolition of monarchy, were prevailed upon to engage in this expedition. The chief command, however, was given to M. de Puisaye, formerly adjutant-general to Wimpffen, who possessed considerable influence among the Chouans, having formerly been one of their leaders. On this account he was chosen to direct this important enterprise; but, unfortunately, he was destitute both of military talents and of the confidence of the troops.

This little army, consisting principally of the regiments of Hector, Hervilly, Dudrenuc, Royale-Marine, Royale-Louis, Loyal-Emigrant, and Royale-Artillerie, was embarked in transports, under the convoy of a small squadron, commanded by Sir John Borlase Warren. After being sixteen days at sea, the fleet arrived at the place of destination, and anchored in the bay of Quiberon on the 4th of July. During the night the debarkation of the main body of the troops was effected, under the orders of General d'Hervilly; and on the succeeding days the remainder landed, together with an immense quantity of muskets, uniforms, provisions, ammunition, and five pieces of cannon. In order to gratify the royalists, homilies, benedictions, and titles of nobility, were liberally recurred to: a quantity of assignats was also provided; and it is worthy of remark, that this paper money could not be termed forged, as it was entirely different from that issued under the authority of the French government.

The republicans having been obliged to evacuate Auray and Vannes, the invaders took possession of those places, and extended their cantonments. As their position, however, could not be maintained without Fort Penthievre, which had recently received the appellation of Fort Sans-Culottes, it was attacked on the 2d of July, by means of three frigates on one side, while the emigrants presented themselves on the other with four pieces of artillery. The garrison, consisting of 400 men, capitulated to the English, after a resistance of two days.

Soon after, the royalists became masters of the whole peninsula, and also of the entrenched camp of Carnac, the inhabitants of which were quickly joined by a body of Chouans. M. de Puisaye established his head-quarters at the village of Genève; and, having armed and clothed such of the peasantry as volunteered, under the title of "Lieutenant-general of the King's armies, and commander-in-chief of the catholic and royal army of Brittany," he invited every description of Frenchmen to rally round his standard, by the publication of the following proclamation:—

"Ye brave inhabitants of La Vendée, the admiration of Europe, and the envy of France, the moment is arrived to reap the fruits of your heroic toils. The illustrious shades of Bouchamp, L'Escure, La Roche Jacqueline, and as many other heroes as were your guides and friends, are hovering around you! The associates and inheritors of their glory, Charette, Stofflet, Sapineau, and all your intrepid leaders, will accomplish this great work, which they have begun and conducted with so much constancy and courage. We bring you ammunition, arms, and the assistance which a protecting power, that does not confine itself to a bare admiration of your fortitude, condescends to grant you.

"Ye loyal inhabitants of Brittany, who have honored me with your confidence, you now see that it has not been violated. The British government, roused by your perseverance and misfortunes, has granted your request. An army, entirely composed of French troops, comes to second your endeavours; and I bring you all the succours you have demanded. His Britannic majesty, forced to repel the aggressions of your tyrants, and to assert the respect due to his crown, has, nevertheless, graciously received your fellow-citizens, and the persecuted ministers of your religion, whom he now restores to your wishes. This is the only answer worthy of his majesty to the ambitious and destructive plans which your foes have imputed to his generous intentions. French officers and soldiers, who, like yourselves, for these four years past have fought for their king, now hasten to rejoin you; and your princes intend to place themselves at the head of your invincible columns."

As soon as the intelligence of these events reached Paris, the national convention immediately selected two deputies, Blad and Tallien, whom they dispatched to Brittany. While these stimulated the neighbouring departments, Hoche assembled troops; and having left Cherin, whom he had placed at the head of his staff at Rennes, in order to furnish him with occasional supplies of ammunition, artillery, and provisions, he immediately proceeded to Auray to watch the enemy's motions. Conscious that he was at present incapable of opposing so formidable a force, he allowed the emigrants to remain in quiet possession of the fort of Quiberon, as well as of the peninsula, and remained a patient spectator of their progress. This commander-in-chief excused his inactive state, by declaring that it was his intention to shut up the enemy like so many rats in a trap!

When the general had collected a sufficient army, he forced the emigrants to withdraw to the camp of Kousten, under protection of the fort of Penthievre, July 10, while he himself remained at the village of Sainte-Barbe, and entrusted General Lemoine with the erection of the batteries intended to encompass the invading army. These preparations naturally alarmed the chiefs of the royalists, who immediately saw the necessity of raising the blockade, in order to keep up a communication with the disaffected in the interior parts of the country; and were therefore resolved, early on the following day, to assault the republican lines. On the preceding evening, however, July 15, intelligence of this important design was communicated by no less than four deserters; and preparations were accordingly made to counteract the enemy's operations. General Humbert, therefore, on the approach of their columns, agreeable to his orders, fell back: and the assailants were not only exposed to a severe fire of grape-shot from two covered batteries in front, but also to a charge of infantry and cavalry on both their flanks. By this unexpected reception, the emigrants were entirely disconcerted; and about 300, with a number of nobles, including the Count de Talmont, were left dead on the field of battle. General d'Hervilly, who commanded on this occasion, was desperately wounded; and the republicans obtained possession of three pieces of cannon. Had it not been for the timely protection of five English boats, the victors would have accompanied the fugitives into Fort Penthievre.

By this time the French commander-in-chief had a formidable force, consisting of the national guards of Brest and all the adjoining towns, in addition to a powerful reinforcement of regular troops. Thus the republicans were increasing, while the royalists were diminishing; and, as the latter were penned up within the peninsula, Hoche determined to leave the lines hitherto occupied by his army, and oppose the invaders. It being however necessary first to obtain possession of Fort Penthievre, he resolved to attack that place; and, notwithstanding all the engineers in his army were of opinion that it could only be reduced by regular approaches, Hoche was determined to carry it by assault. He was certainly encouraged to make this bold attempt by the number of deserters, who not only made him acquainted, from time to time, with all the movements in the royalists' camp, but even undertook the task of conducting the republican troops to the fort, and obtaining its surrender.

The entrenched camp at length was forced, and while numbers of the royal army joined that of Hoche's, and protested their inviolable attachment to the republican cause, the remainder retired to a rock, where they had posted a piece of cannon, and defended themselves with the greatest intrepidity. As some of their chiefs, however, seized this opportunity of effecting their escape on board the boats which were sent to their assistance; and as the fire of the republicans was exceedingly fierce, these unhappy men, now reduced to the deplorable alternative of perishing by the swords of their enemy or the waves of the sea, were obliged to surrender at discretion.

Such was the melancholy fate of this unfortunate expedition to the coast of France. About 700 of the emigrants perished at the foot of the rock, where they had taken shelter, called Le Rocher de Portignes; about 2000 were saved by the boats of the fleet; of those who surrendered, such as were not noble obtained their freedom after some time; and all the women and children of the Chouans were immediately liberated. This was the boast of those historians who defended the proceedings of France at this period: but, on an impartial review, we must deem it more policy than humanity: it is evident, from what followed, that humanity was entirely abolished. The Bishop of Dol, and fourteen of his clergy, were devoted to immediate death, which they met with the most exemplary resignation. M. de Broglie, and several others of birth, to the amount of about 300, were tried by a military tribunal, consisting of a lieutenant-colonel, a captain, serjeant, corporal, and a private; and being, as usual, condemned, suffered upon this occasion. The fate of Count Charles de Sombreuil, who had embarked in the expedition from sentiments of honor, and conducted himself in a gallant and disinterested manner, from the beginning to the end, was deeply lamented by all Europe. In a letter which this unfortunate youth addressed to Sir J. B. Warren, on the 28th of June, he said:—

"A number of vessels which remained on the coasts, might have afforded me the disgraceful retreat which M. de Puisaye so vigilantly seized; but the dereliction of my companions in arms would have been far more shocking to me than the lot which awaits me. I am bold to say, I deserved a better fate; and this you will acknowledge, together with all those who know me, if chance will ever permit any of the companions of my misfortune to reveal to the world the mysteries of this fatal, this unexampled day.—Farewell: I bid you farewell with that calmness which can alone result from purity of conscience.”

BOOK II.

CHAP. IV.

1795-6.

In Fort Penthievre and the peninsula were found 70,000 muskets, 150,000 pair of shoes, and all the artillery landed from the fleet. The beach of Quiberon was covered with wines, liquors, provisions, and stores of all sorts; and a regiment of infantry, taking advantage of the general confusion, is reported to have obtained possession of a number of vessels laden with flour, rice, and provisions.

The British squadron, having remained some time on the coast, occupied the attention of the republican army. Several partial descents were attempted from time to time; and it was at length determined to seize on Noirmoutier, formerly the haunt of Charette and his followers. As this island was found to be too well guarded, the isle of Dieu, though considerably smaller in extent, was taken possession of instead, by the royalists, and converted into a place of arms; whereby the Chouans might be occasionally succoured: while the British cruisers, by hovering in the neighbourhood, kept the adjacent coast in continual alarm, and intercepted all communication by sea. The ardor of the insurgents, however, was cooled by reiterated defeats.

As Sapineau had recurred to arms, General Willot was sent, with a column of 1800 men, into the districts occupied by his adherents, with orders to seize on the grain and oxen of the inhabitants, and not to restore the latter until they had deposited their arms in the public magazines. Another body of troops proceeded in search of Stofflet, who still headed a small band of determined followers; but, unable any longer to cope with the republican forces in the open field, he lurked in the woods, and was forced to recur to the habits of his early life, by sometimes firing upon his prey from behind trees and hedges, and at other times encouraging his adherents in the pursuit and murder of occasional wanderers. The conduct of Charette, however, was more cautious; for he remained secreted with a few faithful companions, and made war more like a free-booter than a general. In short, it was apparent that these chiefs had lost all their influence, and that the Vendean insurrection was near a termination.

The two principal leaders at length fell into the hands of their enemies. Stofflet, being desirous to place himself at the head of a formidable party, left the haunts where he had so long remained in security, and ventured into the neighbouring towns. Being indefatigable in his exertions, he repaired from place to place, endeavouring to stimulate the now lukewarm spirit of a people which had been heretofore burning with zeal. In one of these excursions he unfortunately repaired to the village of Langrerie, with only one domestic and a couple of aide-de-camps. Intelligence of his arrival having reached Lontil and Liegard, two republican officers, they immediately hastened thither, at the head of a small body of infantry and cavalry; and, having secured all the avenues, suddenly entered the apartment, and seized one of the most powerful of the Vendéan chiefs, who, in the course of two years, had fought no less than 150 actions; in more than a hundred of which he had proved victorious. He was guillotined Feb. 23, 1796.

Still the bold and crafty Charette eluded the vigilance, and defied the menaces, of his enemies. Although no longer able to appear at the head of a formidable army, and raise a whole department in his defence, he yet continued to sustain a petty warfare. At this time his troops did not exceed 1000 infantry and 300 cavalry; but with these he acted constantly on the offensive; and, after a defeat, still found means to escape, and carry on the war anew, by rallying the wreck of his troops at twenty or thirty miles distance from the field of battle. As he knew some of the priests were in the pay of the government, he distrusted them all, and at length became so suspicious, that he confided his secrets to a few female favorites alone, who are said to have encouraged a temper naturally sanguinary to fresh excesses. At times, however, he pretended to negotiate with the generals, and actually offered to accept of terms; but he refused the proposition of being exiled to Switzerland, or conveyed to Jersey; and disdainfully replied, “that all the fleets and vessels of the republic were not sufficient to transport the brave royalists under his command.”

This hero having retired into the recesses of the forests of Machicoul and Prinée, wandered with a few fugitives along the margin of Grand Lieu, and seldom left his retreat but when imperious necessity obliged him. Three small moveable columns of cavalry were sent thither in pursuit of him; and, as it was well known that he possessed about 6000 louis-d'ors in gold, this booty was promised as a reward to the person who should take him. The pursuit, at length, became so hot, that his mistress was seized, and a trunk, containing his correspondence, fell about the same time into the hands of his enemies. Soon after this, Moelle, one of his generals of division, was killed; and Caillue, another, wounded and taken prisoner, after a disastrous skirmish, at the close of which the brave Charette escaped, with great difficulty, at the head of forty horsemen. Hereupon, Robrie and Guerin, two inferior chiefs, laid down their arms, and surrendered themselves and their party.

Charette was still incessantly pursued by the cavalry of Hoche; as, during his life, the Vendéan war could never be considered as finished. At length, Travot, the adjutant-general of the army, came up with him at Chabottier, in Poitou; and although harrassed with unceasing fatigue, and wounded both in the head and hand, he had still sufficient strength and sagacity to make his escape into a wood, supported by two faithful followers, who were determined to share his fate, and who actually fell dead in succession at his feet, covered with wounds. Adjutant-general Travot ran up, seized the chief, March 23, and conducted him to Nantes, where, but a few months before, he had made a triumphal entry, mounted upon a superb courser, surrounded by the officers of his staff, and accompanied by republican generals as well as the representatives on mission in the western departments. On the present occasion, he appeared dressed in a short green vest and pantaloons, disfigured by blood, with his arm in a scarf, and his countenance pale and dejected. Notwithstanding, he beheld the preparations for his execution with an undaunted eye, for he not only surveyed the soldiers that were drawn up for that purpose without shrinking, but even refused to have a bandage tied across his face, and actually gave the signal for his own death. On the fall of their chief, all the insurgent departments readily submitted.

CHAPTER V.

Naval History.—Action in the Mediterranean under Admiral Hotham.—Gallant conduct of Vice-admiral Cornwallis in the Channel.—Lord Bridport's Action with the French Fleet.—Encounters between single Ships.—Death of Captain Faulknor.—Campaign in the West Indies.—Insurrections in Grenada.—Re-capture of St. Lucia by Victor Hughes.—The Maroon War.—Proceedings of England with respect to Holland.—Conquests of the Dutch Settlements by the English.

ALTHOUGH the memorable engagement off Ushant had considerably reduced the naval power of France, yet, early in the spring, she found means to fit out a squadron in the Mediterranean. This armament, consisting of fifteen sail of the line, four frigates, and two corvettes, issued forth from Toulon, with a view of making a descent upon Corsica, and restoring that island to the dominion of its former masters.

Intelligence, from Genoa, of this fleet having been seen off the isle of Marguerite, soon reached Vice-admiral Hotham, who immediately left Leghorn Road, with fourteen sail of the line, four frigates, and four armed vessels, in pursuit of it; and, anticipating the enemy's destination, shaped his course accordingly. He likewise sent orders for the Berwick, then at St. Fiorenzo, to join him off Cape Corfe; but received the disagreeable news of the capture of that ship, two days before, by the enemy's fleet, after an action in which Captain Littlejohn was killed.

Notwithstanding the respective squadrons were daily seen by the advanced frigates of both, yet they did not descry each other until three days had elapsed, when the French were discovered to windward. As no inclination to bear down was evinced, the signal was made by the admiral for a general chase; in the course of which, one of the enemy's line-of-battle ships was perceived to have lost her top-masts, the wind being squally and blowing very fresh. Hereupon the Inconstant, which acted as repeating frigate to the commander-in-chief, attacked, raked, and harassed this vessel, until the arrival of the Agamemnon, of 64 guns, commanded by Captain (the late Lord) Nelson, who rendered her a complete wreck; but he was twice recalled, by signal from the Britannia, as several of the enemy's ships were advancing to her succour, by one of which she was soon after taken in tow.

On the 14th of March, the vice-admiral, perceiving that the British squadron did not gain upon that of the French, the ships of the latter being fresh from port, gave orders to form on the larboard line of bearing; and, finding the disabled ship, with her consort, separated from, and to leeward of, the main body, it was determined to reduce the enemy to the alternative of either abandoning two of their line-of-battle ships or coming to action. Accordingly, the Captain and Bedford, of 74 guns and 590 men each, (Captains Reeve and Gould,) were dispatched to secure these vessels: on this the French squadron bore down to their assistance, and a partial action ensued; in the course of which, the British van ships, particularly the illustrious of 74 guns and 590 men, (Captain Frederick,) and the Courageux, of 74 guns and 640 men, (Captain BOOK II. Montgomery,) not only lost their main and mizen-masts, but suffered considerably, the former having 20 seamen and marines killed, and 70 wounded. However, the Ca Ira, of 80 guns and 950 men, was captured, with the Censeur, of 74 guns and 930 men, which had been separated from the fleet after an obstinate and sanguinary engagement, for one of these ships having 1300 men and the other 1000 on board, their decks were strewn with carnage, and they lost nearly 400 men. The whole loss, on the part of the English, amounted to only 75 killed, and 280 slightly wounded. The English had fourteen ships: and the order of battle was—

On the 7th of July, a flying squadron, consisting of the Agamemnon, Meleager, Ariadne, Mosselle, and Mutine cutter, under the command of Captain Nelson, was chased into St. Fiorenzo Bay, by twenty-three sail of the enemy, seventeen of which proved to be of the line. Hereupon, Admiral Hotham immediately put to sea; and the enemy was at length desisted to leeward, July 13. Unfortunately, six of the English squadron were forced to bend main-top-sails in the room of those that were split in the course of the night; and, in consequence of this delay, the attempt to cut the French off from the land, from whence they were only five leagues distant, proved abortive. About eight o'clock the signal was hoisted for a general chase, and a few of the van ships got up with their rear about noon; in consequence of which, a partial action took place, and the Alcide, of 74 guns, struck, but about half an hour after she caught fire, and was entirely consumed. The rest of the fleet, being favored by a shift of wind, took shelter in Frejus Bay, and eluded all further pursuit.

On the 26th of August a detachment from the Mediterranean fleet, consisting of the Inconstant, Meleager, Southampton, Tartar, Ariadne, and Speedy, under the command of Captain Nelson, proceeded to the bays of Allassio and Languellia, in the neighbourhood of Vado, whence he cut out nine ships belonging to the French; and, had it not been impracticable, the enemy having two thousand horse and foot in the adjoining town, he would have landed in Allassio, and destroyed a convoy of ammunition and provisions.

On the other hand, the Censeur, and part of the Mediterranean convoy, were taken, nearly about the same time, by a squadron under Richery, consisting of six sail of the line and three frigates: that admiral, however, being either afraid to keep the sea or return to a French port, took shelter in Cadiz, which was immediately afterwards blockaded by the English.

In the course of this summer a manifest superiority over the French, both in skill and resolution, was evinced by a small detachment from the Channel fleet. On the 16th of June, Vice-admiral Cornwallis, whose flag was flying on board a first-rate, the Royal Sovereign, with four 74-gun ships, the Mars, Triumph, Brunswick, and Bellerophon, and two frigates, the Phaeton and Pallas, fell in with a fleet of thirteen line-of-battle ships, fourteen frigates, two brigs, and a cutter, near the Penmarks. The enemy, in consequence of a change of wind, obtained the weather-gage, and while one of their large ships began to fire on the Mars, a frigate, which had kept to leeward, ran upon her larboard quarter, and frequently yawed and fired with an unusual portion of gallantry, while the other ships kept up a distant cannonade. An attempt was made, towards evening, to cut off this vessel, which was at some distance from the squadron; on which the English admiral bore up for her support, and all the ships under his command displayed such resolution and valour, that the superior fleet absolutely drew off, and tacked and stood away before sun-set.

On the 22d of June, a portion of the same fleet was perceived off L'Orient by Admiral-lord Bridport, whose flag was flying in the Royal George, with a strong squadron under his command, consisting of two ships of 100, three of 98, one of 80, and four of 74 guns. As he found the French declined a contest, four of the fastest sailing men of war, the Sanspareil of 80 guns, the Orion of 74, the Russel of 74, and the Colossus of 74, were the first detached, and the whole followed soon after, in quest of the enemy, and continued the pursuit during the whole night. Early on the 23d, the headmost ships came up with the enemy, viz.

Orion	74	Sir James Saumarez,
Queen Charlotte . . .	100	Sir A. S. Douglas,

After an action of three hours, the Alexander, Formidable, and Tigre, struck; and, had not the remainder been protected by the land, there is no doubt but more would have been captured: notwithstanding, when it is recollected that this action was fought in the face of batteries, and before a strong naval port, it must be allowed that the British squadron evinced considerable gallantry.

The coasting trade of France was at this time greatly distressed; and, by the zeal and attention of the English cruisers, many of her armed ships captured. Several commanders, well acquainted with all the rocks, shoals, and harbours, distinguished themselves upon this occasion, particularly Sir W. S. Smith, who, in the Diamond, chased some of the enemy's corvettes on shore, and engaged with their land batteries; while Sir John Borlase Warren, Sir Richard Strachan, and Sir Edward Pellew, seized every opportunity of doing some bold achievement.

Early in this year, the most remarkable of all the actions between single ships during the campaign took place in the West Indies, between the Blanche, mounting thirty-two guns, commanded by Captain Faulknor, and La Pique, of thirty-eight guns and 360 men. During a cruize off the island of Guadaloupe, Captain Faulknor perceived, on the 4th of January, a frigate at anchor near Pointe-à-Petre, under protection of the batteries. Finding that this vessel came out the next day, and was two leagues astern, he made sail for, and about noon passed under her lee, on the starboard tack, exchanging broadsides at the same time. Having put about, and come up with her again, the enemy wore within musket-shot, with the intention to rake; on which the English tacked also, engaged nearly aboard, and soon after, putting the helm a-starboard, ran across and lashed the bowsprit to their own capstern. While in this critical situation, the French frigate's main and mizen masts having fallen, they payed off before the wind, towed the enemy along with them, and finding that their own stern-ports were not sufficiently large, the upper transom-beam was blown away, so as to admit the guns to run out, and fire into the adversary's bows; while the marines kept up such a well-directed fire, that no man could appear on her fore-castle. At length, after an engagement of five hours, during which La Pique had 76 men killed and 110 wounded, she surrendered to the Blanche; but Captain Faulknor, who had before displayed his gallantry in presence of the English fleet and army, at the assault of Fort Royal, received a mortal shot in the midst of this action, and was no longer alive to receive the sword of his vanquished rival. The Blanche had only eight killed and twenty-one wounded; an indisputable proof of the superior skill and seamanship of the victors. A monument was soon after erected at the public expence, to commemorate the exploits of this much-lamented commander.

Another gallant action, which was fought in the Mediterranean, between two English and two French frigates, is worthy of recording. The Dido, Captain Towry, and the Lowestoffe, Captain Middleton, having fallen in with three French frigates off the Hieres, the Dido bore down upon La Minerve, carrying forty-two guns, and commenced a close fight, in the course of which both vessels suffered considerably; while the Lowestoffe prevented the Artemise, of thirty-six guns, from assisting her consort; and, after having forced her to retreat, returned, and helped to secure the

In short, the naval campaign of this year was peculiarly auspicious to England, who lost only four ships, namely, the Berwick, of seventy-four guns, in the Mediterranean; Le Censeur, of seventy-four, which was retaken by the enemy off Cape St. Vincent; the Daphne, which was forced to yield to two men of war; and the Nemesis, of twenty-eight guns, taken by two frigates in the port of Smyrna, in express violation of the law of nations. On the other hand, the French had about fifty armed vessels of various descriptions sunk, destroyed, and captured. Of these, one was a ship of ninety-eight guns, two of eighty, four of seventy-four, two of forty-four, one of forty-two, two of forty, one of thirty-eight, and one of thirty.

Victor Hughes, renowned for his boasting, as well as for his inhumanity, retained possession of Guadaloupe, and extended his influence to the neighbouring isles. This man not only exposed the living to all the penalties of rebellion without remorse, but absolutely violated the sanctuary of the dead without compunction. He had, in the latter end of the preceding year, published a proclamation, in which, after stating, "that the rights of humanity, of war, and of nations, had been violated by the British commanders," he added, "that the body of Thomas Dundas, major-general and governor, interred in Guadaloupe, should be taken up, and given as a prey to the birds of the air." In one of his numerous publications, he boasted, that 800 republicans and two French frigates had conquered the island where he then resided; and, after ridiculing the idea of declaring Guadaloupe to be in a state of blockade, he asserted that his cruisers "had taken, sunk, and burnt, eighty-eight of the enemy's vessels," while they, according to his account, had "turned pirates, and ransacked neutral vessels;"—a powerful armament was therefore fitted out by the English ministers for the West Indies.

In the mean time, the French government thought proper to provide a reinforcement for Commissioner Hughes; and the following small armament sailed from Brest, with troops and warlike stores on board.

1. L'Esuelle, a 74 cut down, carrying 46 guns and 500 men.
2. L'Astrée, of 30 guns.
3. La Leveret, 20 ditto.
4. La Prompte, 20 ditto.
5. Le Ducas, 20 ditto.

Ten armed transports.

This squadron having been chased by Captain G. Wilson, of the Bellona, and Captain Carpenter, of the Alarm, the Ducas, laden with field-pieces, mortars, shells, shot, and entrenching tools, was captured. The rest arrived safe in the West Indies, January 7.

Hereupon the commissioner, who had dispersed proclamations and emissaries every where, determined to extend hostilities, and retaliate on the English, by attacking them in their own settlements. Accordingly, he began with the island of Grenada, which formerly belonged to France; and, having conveyed thither a considerable quantity of arms and ammunition, with a small body of troops, an insurrection took place under Fedou, April 10; by means of which, the lieutenant-governor and several of the inhabitants were taken prisoners. Another insurrection broke out in St. Vincent, which was considerably aggravated by the fury of the Charibbs. The French inhabitants of Dominica were also instigated to revolt, and a small detachment sent to their assistance; but they did not hold out so long as in the other islands, for the invaders were resisted by the militia, and obliged to submit as prisoners of war, while those who had joined them were punished with all the rigor of the laws.

The island of Dominica is so situated as to be commanded both by Martinico and Guadaloupe. It is a small and mountainous colony; and, as the negroes amounted to 20,000, there was some danger that, in case of a descent, these might be induced to rise in arms, and add all the horrors of a servile war to those of an invasion. These fears were naturally increased by the consideration, that Farcelle, a French negro, and many slaves who had joined him, were then in the woods, and well acquainted with all the fastnesses of the settlement. Governor Bruce, actuated by motives of policy, accordingly entered into a negotiation with this chief; and both he and his followers were allured from the mountains, in consequence of certain stipulations, which for some reasons were not adhered to; as it appears, that Farcelle was afterwards arrested and sent out of the island.

Victor Hughes, having found means to recover St. Lucia, landed a body of troops there under Massades and Lombard, April 20; and, by the allurements of liberty, stimulated the negroes to revolt. Brigadier-general Stuart, after obtaining possession of Vieux Fort, proceeded to attack the enemy at Soufriere; but he was anticipated in his intentions, and notwithstanding he found means to dissipate an ambuscade, his troops were compelled to retire, after an engagement of seven hours. The capture of Pigeon island, and the loss of the Vigie soon after, rendered St. Lucia no longer tenable; and it was therefore determined to evacuate it, which Captain Barrett, of the Experiment, happily effected without loss on the 19th of June.

The Maroons took up arms in Jamaica about the same time, which produced a severe contest.

The most rigorous measures were obliged to be adopted; and the insurgent slaves, whom the sword had spared, were transported. On this occasion many stratagems were resorted to, which have been highly, and perhaps justly censured; but absolute necessity appears to have been the cause.

The conquest of Holland by the French, and the treaty of alliance which ensued immediately after, May 18, produced an entire change in the connection between that country and England. A proclamation was therefore issued by the King of Great Britain, ordering all Dutch vessels in the ports of Great Britain to be stopped; and five men of war, nine Indiamen, and about sixty sail of smaller vessels, were consequently detained. Afterwards, all kind of property belonging to that nation was ordered to be seized; and at length the king in council published a third declaration, in which, after stating that divers injurious proceedings had lately taken place in the United Provinces, in derogation to the honor of his crown and the just rights of his subjects, an order for general reprisals was granted "against the ships, goods, and subjects of that country."

On the 2d of May, 1796, a manifesto appeared in the name of "the national assembly representing the Batavian nation." This ridiculous production stated, that the people of Holland, so often oppressed and pillaged, under the mask of friendship, would no longer suffer themselves to be dragged in the dust, but would cease to be the sport of the ambitious ministers of England, who, by the dazzle of piratical treasures, blind their own nation, which fancies itself to be free, and at the same time exempt from the terrible calamities they have brought upon Europe and the whole of the human race. After asserting, that the proceedings in the Netherlands, alluded to in the above declaration as contrary to the honor of his majesty's crown, were the acts of his majesty's own troops, it added, that the orders given to the Dutch ships of war, "to repel violence by violence," originated in the rights of an independent republic.

In the Dutch manifesto it was also asserted, "that letters were sent, signed by the Prince of Orange, and dated at Kew, the 7th of February, 1795, to several of the colonies of the republic in the East Indies, and also to the Cape of Good Hope; ordering, on his individual authority, the respective governors to put the colonies of the state under the protection of the British arms; that is to say, in the artful and customary language of the British ministry, to surrender them to England."

The government of Madras, pursuant to the instructions received from England, immediately set about fitting out a small armament, for the purpose of obtaining possession of the important island of Ceylon. This expedition, which was entrusted to Rear-admiral Rainier and Colonel Stuart, sailed on the 24th of July, and consisted of the Suffolk, which was the flag ship, the Centurion, the Diomedé, which joined off Negapatam, and several transports. The chief hope of success, however, depended upon a secret negotiation entered into with a Swiss officer, who commanded there; for the Dutch had entrusted the defence of their settlements to foreigners. The name and authority of the Prince of Orange were also made use of on this occasion with extraordinary effect; but the promised liquidation of certain or supposed debts contributed still more to the advancement of this intrigue, which was entrusted to the adjutant-general of the army.

On the 2d of August, being the day after the little squadron had anchored in Back Bay, Major Agnew, who had been dispatched in the Heroine to Columbo, with letters from Lord Hobart, returned with an order from M. van Angelbeck, the governor-general of Ceylon, to the commandant, to surrender Fort Oostenburgh to the English. The latter having refused obedience to this injunction, under pretence of informality, it was determined to attempt the reduction of that part of the island by force. The Diomedé unfortunately struck upon an unknown rock, between Pigeon Island and the outer point of the bay; but, notwithstanding this loss, the first detachment, consisting of 520 European and 110 native soldiers, with two field-pieces, landed at the White Rocks without opposition, and the remainder of the troops immediately followed. The debarkation of stores and provisions occupied ten days more; and the English then commenced their approaches, opened batteries against the fort of Trincomalé, and completed a practicable breach in the course of a week after they had broken ground, during all which operations the enemy seldom or never interrupted them. Hereupon Rear-admiral Rainier and Colonel Stuart summoned the garrison to surrender, on the 18th of August; and on the 26th Major Fornbauer consented to a capitulation, by which the troops, amounting to more than 600, were made prisoners of war, but it was expressly stipulated that none of the officers should be sent to Europe; whence it appears, that some apprehensions were entertained of the displeasure of the Dutch government.

Immediately after this, (August 31,) the commandant of Oostenburgh also entered into a negotiation for the surrender of that place; which was accordingly delivered up, on terms similar to those of Trincomalé, and the British colours were hoisted on the ramparts. On the 18th of September, the fort of Batticaloe was secured, as well and the fort and military post of Molletivoe, October 1.

CHAP. V.
1796.

On the 5th, the capture of the island of Manar was effected by Captain Barbutt, with the flank companies of the 72d regiment and two parties of sepoys.

A small armament from Madras, consisting of the Resistance, Captain Newcombe, some transports, and the Suffolk tender, with four companies of Europeans and some native troops, commanded by Major Brownie, obtained possession of Malacca on the 17th of August; by which addition, security was afforded to the British commerce in the straits of that name, as well as in the Chinese seas. Cochin also surrendered to the English arms, with Chinsurah and its dependencies, and the fort of Porca and Quilon; in short, all the settlements on the continent of India appertaining to the Dutch.

The invasion of the Cape of Good Hope was undertaken, partly with a view of preventing the French from obtaining possession of it, and partly for the purpose of securing an intermediate station between Europe and the rich and numerous acquisitions of Great Britain in the east. The conduct of this expedition was entrusted to Vice-admiral Sir George Keith Elphinstone and Gen. Sir Alured Clarke; but a considerable time elapsed before the armament could be completed, and even then it sailed liable to many disadvantages. At length part of the squadron reached the place of its destination, and a negociation was immediately entered into with the governor of Simon's-town; but, as he could not be prevailed upon either to acknowledge the Prince of Orange or surrender his charge, a landing was effected and possession obtained of that place, July 14, though the enemy had intended to destroy it with fire previous to its evacuation.

At this time the British troops consisted of the 78th regiment, the marines of the squadron, and two battalions of seamen, in all about 1600 men; while the enemy, composed chiefly of the Burgher militia and Hottentots, were not only more numerous, but amply provided with heavy cannon and field-pieces. Notwithstanding this disparity, and although the commander-in-chief with the remainder of the troops had not yet arrived, and they were entirely destitute of artillery, Major-general Craig determined to march against the enemy, who occupied Mysenberg, a formidable station, provided with cannon, and rendered difficult of approach both by land and sea, on account of a steep mountain on the right, and the shallow water and high surf on the left. In the interim, the admiral secretly prepared a gun-boat, and armed the launches of the fleet with heavy caronades; he also obtained two battalions of seamen, about 1000 in number, under the command of Captain Hardy of the Echo, and Captain Spranger of the Rattle-snake; while his cruisers were frequently dispatched round the bay, that no suspicion of an attack might be entertained.

About 12 o'clock on the 7th of August a favorable opportunity occurred, and the preconcerted signal was hoisted from the flag-ship; on which General Craig put the troops in motion, while Commodore Blankett in the America, with the Stately, Echo, and Rattle-snake, got under weigh, in order to precede and protect the march of the advancing columns. Immediately on their approach, two small batteries were abandoned, and the respective vessels having taken the stations assigned them, a fire commenced upon the Dutch camp, which, in the course of a few minutes, was evacuated with precipitation. Hereupon the major-general proceeded over heavy sand, and, after a most fatiguing march, took possession of it. He also drove the Dutch from an advantageous ridge of rocky heights, and resisted an attack which was made, the succeeding morning upon his position by the whole force of the enemy, supported by eight field-pieces. An attempt, however, failed, which was made at night upon one of the principal out-posts, defended by the burgher militia; partly through the timidity and ignorance of the guides, and partly on account of the intricacy of the road.

The situation of the British commanders was at this period very critical, for neither the numbers nor energy of their adversaries appeared to be diminished; and while the army had no fair opportunity of advancing, the navy was not able, on account of the unfavorableness of the weather, to occupy Table Bay, by means of which a shorter and readier communication with the troops would have been procured. It was at length agreed to wait six days longer for General Clarke; and if, at the expiration of that time, no succour arrived, Major-general Craig was to march forward under every disadvantage, in order to try the fortune of an attack, before the total failure of their provisions rendered a retreat inevitable.

The enemy, however, anticipating their intentions, meditated a general assault on the British camp; and on the 1st of September advanced during the night with their whole strength, supported by a train of eighteen field-pieces. At this critical and important moment, considerable bodies of troops had already made their appearance, when fortunately the signal for a fleet, soon after succeeded by the appearance of fourteen large vessels, induced them to relinquish their enterprize, and return to their former post in haste.

Had the enemy's project been accelerated, the British troops would have been in a very awkward dilemma; the timely arrival of the fleet, however, was decisive of the conquest of the Cape. General Clarke, having immediately landed, September 14, with a body of troops, proceeded to the camp, and soon after advanced against the post of Wyneberg, where the Dutch, with nine pieces of cannon, seemed determined for resistance. Hereupon the army, which had marched in columns, was formed into two lines, and a detachment dispatched against each of the flanks of the enemy, while the main body and artillery advanced against the centre. As Commodore Blankett appeared at the same time with three ships in Table Bay, in order to effect a diversion on that side, the Dutch immediately retired, and early on the 16th of September an officer arrived with a flag and letter from governor Sluysken; in consequence of which a cessation of arms ensued, and the castle and Cape of Good Hope were surrendered to the British.

In addition to five Dutch men of war detained in England, one of sixty-four was seized at Cork, and six smaller ships were captured elsewhere.

Campaign in Italy.—Napoleon Bonaparte appointed General.—His Education, &c.—Situation of the Voltri seized by the Austrians.—Montenotte attacked.—Battle of Millesimo.—Action at Dego.—Second Action at Dego.—Attack on the Camp of Ceva.—Retreat of the Piedmontese.—The Treaty of Cerasco.—Passage of the Po.—Actions at Tombio and Cadogno.—Battle of Lodi.—Insurrections.—Seizure of Leghorn by Buonaparte.—His Arrival at Brescia.—Action at Borghetta.—Blockade of Mantua.—Battle of Castiglione.—Second Blockade of Mantua.—Battles of Roveredo, of Bassano, and of Arcole.

As hostilities were now doomed to take a more extensive range, the unoffending inhabitants of the Alps and the Tyrolese mountains, as well as those of the Danube and the Po, experienced all the horrors of a conflict which the Revolution in the capital of France produced, when a new constitution was presented to the French, June 29, 1795. The Italian war consequently began to assume an interesting appearance, and great preparations for the approaching campaign were made on all sides. The command of the troops of the King of Sardinia was still entrusted to General Colli, an officer supposed to be admirably calculated for the management of a defensive system; while the emperor confided the direction of his forces to Baron Beaulieu, an able and enterprising warrior, who had acquired considerable reputation, not only for his exploits, but for his virtues.

The Directory, (for thus the present government of France was styled,) instead of selecting an experienced officer, General Scherer having been displaced for habitual intoxication, gave the command of the army of Italy to NAPOLEON BONAPARTE, a man hitherto untried and almost unknown.

In our history of the WARS of the French Revolution, biographical sketches of the principal warriors are absolutely essential. We have not copiously dwelt upon the trials and executions arising from the revolution, as they are not the leading features of a work of this nature; and particularly as unnecessary prolixity would oblige us to curtail recent events, by an abbreviation of which that part of our history, which should be most interesting, would be the least satisfactory.

Napoleon Bonaparte, who has been slightly mentioned in our first book, on his being employed as engineer at the siege of Toulon, was born August 15, 1769, at Ajaccio, a small town in the island of Corsica. He was the eldest son of Carlo Bonaparte, (supposed to be a lawyer,) of Italian extraction, by his wife Letitia Raniolini. General Count Marboeuf was the only patron of Napoleon, who became so much the object of his protection, that, by the Count's influence with the Maréchal de Segur, he was admitted as an Elève du Roi, into L'École Royale Militaire at Brienne, in the province of Champagne.

This school was one of the thirteen royal military schools, or colleges, which were established in various provinces of the kingdom of France, and they were particularly patronised by the two last sovereigns of the Bourbon family. These establishments were magnificently endowed, and the pupils enjoyed every advantage which was essential to their domestic convenience. The most able masters superintended their education, and they were principally encouraged to acquire a competent knowledge of the ancient and modern languages, geography, history, the mathematics, and every branch of military science. L'École Royale Militaire, at Paris, was at the head of the other military schools in the provinces; and it was to this school that not only subordination was acknowledged by the pupils of the others, but to which they looked forward as the haven of all the youths of pre-eminent genius that the military schools of the provinces had educated. Bonaparte arrived at the Royal Military School at Brienne in the year 1779, being then only ten years old. At this early age, however, he discovered a peculiar temper of mind. He avoided the juvenile sports and amusements of the other pupils, and courted solitude and gloom: withdrawing himself from their mirth, he devoted his attention to sedentary rather than to active employments, and appeared entirely engaged in his own individual and retired pursuits. He seems to have neglected, if not altogether rejected, in his early years, the attainment of the Latin language. He soon, however, applied himself with earnestness to the mathematics, the rudiments of which he was taught by Father Patrault, a minim at Brienne. Fortification, and all the other branches of military science and tactics, he studied with increasing ardor; and these, with the reading of history, principally of ancient Rome and Greece, were his most delightful occupations. During the period which Bonaparte continued at Brienne, a library was formed for the amusement and instruction of the pupils, and which was to be under their entire direction. To give them proper notions of arrangement and order, their superiors left the distribution of their books and other affairs to the management of two of the boarders, chosen by their comrades. The calls of Bonaparte on one of these, who was appointed librarian, were so often and so much more frequent than the applications of his companions, that the young man considered him tiresome, and sometimes lost his temper; Bonaparte was not less patient nor less positive, and on these occasions extorted submission by blows.

The rudeness of manners which Bonaparte displayed, and the violence of temper to which he was subject, were not at all softened or subdued previous to his quitting Brienne; his paroxysms of passion had sometimes amounted even to fury, and his anger was often so sudden and so uncontrollable, that few of his comrades would venture to hazard his displeasure.

The annual examination of the pupils by the Royal Inspector General, M. le Chevalier de Renault, took place soon after. This officer found Bonaparte well versed in the art of fortification, and as he himself owed his preferment and his fortune to his talents, and to the universal testimony of an honorable conduct, he knew well how to estimate the ingenuity and ability which are the result of inquiry and reflection, and he adjudged that Bonaparte's proficiency in military knowledge entitled him to be sent to L'Ecole Royale Militaire at Paris. His masters, however, represented to the inspector several occurrences unfavorable to his promotion, but without effect, and Bonaparte arrived at the Military College at Paris on the 17th of October, 1784. To complete his knowledge of the mathematics was the principal object of Bonaparte. He labored with unwearied diligence under the instructions of the celebrated Monge. The corps of artillery and the corps of engineers were, at that time, the only corps in France where merit was certain of promotion, and in which interest had no influence, and into one of these he determined to enter as soon as he had passed the requisite probation. Monge had so well qualified Bonaparte by his care and information, that, on his first examination, he passed with praise, and was allowed to enter the regiment of artillery de la Fere, in garrison at Auxone, as Lieutenant, in the month of July, 1785, and he immediately proceeded to join the regiment. His attention to the theory of his profession was unremitting; he devoted part of the night to the study of military details, and passed most of the day in contemplating and examining the fortifications of the garrison. In his occasional conversations with the officers of the regiment, he expressed opinions which were then considered as factious, both by those of the higher orders and those who were the partisans of royalty. His opposition of sentiment to all the measures of government was uniform, and unchangeable by any endeavours to remove its inconsistency or its injustice. The death of General Count Marbœuf, in the year 1786, deprived Bonaparte of his protection and influence; the advantages which he derived from that officer's pecuniary assistance were no longer attainable, and his pay as a lieutenant was scarcely adequate to support the appearance his rank required. His dissatisfaction was increased by the narrowness of his income, and the numerous factions which disordered all the ranks of society in France, induced him to await with complacency for some terrible convulsion of the state that should open a path to his military activity and preferment.

When the directory was inaugurated, Bonaparte, as General of the armed force of Paris, waited on each of the five directors. Carnot, who succeeded Sieyes, lived at the top of a house beneath the ruins of the Luxembourg, his official apartments not being ready. It was on a Monday that Bonaparte presented himself, the day when a celebrated writer regularly visited Carnot. This person was singing an air, accompanied by a young lady on the piano-forte. The appearance of Bonaparte, a little well-made olive-complexioned youth, amid five or six tall young men, who paid him great attention, was a great contrast; he entered the room, and bowed with an air of ease and self-possession; and the author in question asked Carnot who the gentlemen were. The Director answered, "the General of the armed force of Paris, and his aids-de-camp." His being unlike such generals as Santerre or Rossignol was striking. "What is his name?" said the author.—"Bonaparte."—"Has he great military skill?"—"So it is said."—"What has he ever done that is remarkable?"—"He is the officer who commanded the troops of the Convention on the day of Vendemiaire." The enquirer was one of the electors of Vendemiaire; he retired to an obscure part of the room, and looked on the new visitor in thoughtfulness and silence. Bonaparte seeing the young lady still at her instrument, and the company taken up with him, said, "I have stopped your amusement; some person was singing; I beg I may not interrupt the party." The Director apologized; the general insisted; and after two or three national airs were played, he rose, and took his leave. When he departed, the conversation turned on Bonaparte, and Carnot predicted from this short interview, that the young general would not long retain a command that an aspiring genius would consider only as a step to future fame and glory.

Barras duly valued the exertions of Bonaparte in the business of the sections; he saw that he was fitted for a station in which vigilance and activity were essentially requisite, and he procured him the command of the army of the interior. The high rank of this appointment was attended with adequate emoluments, and carried with it considerable influence.

We must now take notice of Bonaparte's first wife, a widow, from whom he was afterwards divorced. Josephine la Pagerie, when twenty-two years of age, married the Viscount Alexander de Beauharnois, major in a royal French regiment of infantry; both were descended from noble families, both natives of Martinique, and both educated in France. The fortune of the beautiful Josephine was a pleasing addition to the slender income of the youthful viscount; their expenditure was liberal; and, having been introduced at court, their rank, their manners, and the elegance of their entertainments, ensured them the best company in Paris. At the beginning of the revolution, M. de Beauharnois was chosen by the nobility of the bailiwick of Blois, a deputy to the States-general or National Assembly; and in June 1791, he was elected their president, and in that capacity signed the proclamation to the French people on the journey of the king to Varennes. He served under General Biron in April 1792, and bore the rank of adjutant-general when the French were defeated near Mons. He succeeded Custine in the command of the army of the Rhine; was suspended by the deputies in August, 1793, and soon after arrested with his wife. He was consigned to the guillotine on the 23d of July, 1794; if Robespierre had not followed him a few days after, Madame Beauharnois would also have perished on the Republican scaffold. In one of the thirty-six lists of persons destined by Fouquier Thionville to feed the guillotine for thirty-six successive days, appeared the name of Madame de Beauharnois; another list contained the name of Barras. On the 12th of August, 1794, she was released by Legendre. Barras had the national seals taken off her house, in the Rue de Victoire, a few weeks after, and honored her with his protection, by sojourning in her hotel until October, 1795, when his being chosen to the office of Director, required that he should make use of the splendid suite of apartments allotted to him in the palace of the Luxembourg.

Barras, dignified as one of the chief magistrates of France, found it inconvenient to continue his intimacy with Madame Beauharnois; had their attachment been mutual, it was either easily subdued, or it had suddenly subsided, for the lady agreed to an arrangement, which shewed her obedience to the wishes of her friend, and the self-command that she had acquired over her own feelings; she agreed to give her hand to Napoleon Bonaparte, the general of the interior, if the general could be brought to offer her his vows of conjugal affection. The plan was formed, and Barras proceeded to provide his mistress with a husband, and his friend with a wife.

Bonaparte having shewn his talents both at Toulon and on the 13th Vendemiaire, Barras recommended him to Carnot, as most likely to serve the Republic faithfully in Italy. Carnot's high opinion of the genius of Bonaparte seconded the nomination. Barras offered to Bonaparte, Madame Beauharnois and 500,000 livres, and Carnot offered him the army. Barras told him the lady and the army were equally necessary to a youthful and aspiring general; his friendship, gallantry, and ambition were roused; and as the terms of the offer signified, that neither could be gratified without the other, he obliged his friend Barras, and became the husband of Madame Beauharnois, and commander-in-chief of the army of Italy. The remaining particulars of Bonaparte's life, his divorce from Josephine, his second marriage, &c. will be duly mentioned in the course of this history.

The Italian war, no longer confined to the attack and defence of posts, exhibited at this time a scientific appearance: the course of the rivers, the height and direction of the mountains, the extent of the forests, the nature of the government, and the inclination of the inhabitants, were all consulted; every movement was studied and generalized; and the contest, no longer depending on the fate of a single action, became a continued series of combats, or rather of pitched battles.

Bonaparte having arrived at the head-quarters of his army, early in the spring, prepared to take BOOK II. the field as soon as the disappearance of the snow permitted his troops to march. In the mean time he endeavored to gain the affection of the soldiery, with whom he lived in the habits of familiarity, often marching on foot at their head, exposing himself to the same hardships, and listening with attention to the complaints of the lowest sentinel, in order to redress their grievances.

CHAP. VI.
1796.

The Austrians occupied the heights of Savona, Sassello, Musona, Campo-Fredo, the Bochetta, the valleys of the Trebia and the Serevin, including within their entrenchments the two roads leading from Genoa to the Milanese; the one by Novi and Tortona, and the other by Bobbio and Piacentia. The Piedmontese were posted on the declivity of the Alps, so as to extend from the Col de Tendi to Cairo in the province of Acqui. The French army was cantoned all the way from Nice to the neighbourhood of Final; the headquarters were established at Albenga; the advanced posts extended to Voltri, between Savona and Genoa; while Ormea, on the other side of the mountains, was in their possession.

After some time spent in movements, intended to deceive the French, hostilities were first renewed on the part of the Imperialists. Beaulieu ordered 10,000 men to attack Voltri, and the attempt was made on the 9th of April. This important post was defended for a considerable time by General Cervoni at the head of about 4000 troops, but he was obliged to retreat during the night to the church of Our Lady in Savoni; and the Imperialists, pursuing their advantage, in the course of the following day carried part of the line of entrenchments. On the 10th Beaulieu, with 15,000 men, attacked and drove in all which supported the centre of the French, and at one o'clock of the day was before the redoubt of Montenotte, the last of their entrenchments. In spite of repeated charges, this redoubt arrested the progress of the Imperialists. The chief of brigade, Rampon, who commanded 1500 men, made his soldiers take an oath to perish in the redoubt, and, for the whole night, kept the enemy at the distance of pistol-shot. In the night-time, General La Harpe took post behind the redoubt, and Bonaparte, followed by the Generals Berthier and Massena, and the Commissioner Salicetti, brought up his centre and his left, at one o'clock in the morning, by Altara, on the flank and rear of the Austrians. On the 11th, at day-break, Beaulieu and La Harpe, attacked each other with vigor, and various success, when Massena appeared, dealing death and terror on the Austro-Sardinians, where General Argenteau commanded. The enemy's generals, Roccavino and Argenteau, were wounded, and the rout was complete. Fifteen hundred men were killed, and 2500 made prisoners, of which sixty were officers; several standards were also taken.

As Beaulieu was yet able to send assistance from his right wing to the left of the Austro-Sardinian army, Bonaparte changed his head-quarters to Cawcara on the 12th, and ordered General La Harpe to march to Sozello, in order to threaten the eight battalions of the enemy stationed there, and on the day following, by a rapid and concealed march, to get to the town of Cairo, while General Massena was to gain the heights of Dego, at the time that the Generals Menard and Joubert occupied one of the heights of Bietro, and the other the formidable position of Santa Margherita. This movement following the battle of Montenotte, placed the French army on the other side of the Alps, notwithstanding many of the passes were still in the hands of the enemy; and it was now determined to obtain immediate possession of them.

General Augereau accordingly forced Millesimo, early in the morning of April 13, while the Generals Menard and Joubert drove the Imperialists from all their posts, and surrounded a corps of 1500 Austrian grenadiers, commanded by Lieutenant-general Count de Provera, (a knight of the order of Maria Theresa,) who gallantly retired to the mountain of Copalia, and entrenched himself in an old castle, extremely strong on account of its position. Augereau ordered his artillery to advance, when a cannonade was kept up for several hours. In the course of the day, Bonaparte, vexed at finding his march checked by a handful of men, ordered General Provera to be summoned to surrender. He requested to speak with the commander-in-chief, but a lively cannonade commencing on the right wing of the French, hindered him from going to the commander, who treated with General Augereau for several hours. Augereau, at length, formed his men into four columns, and advanced against the castle. Joubert entered the enemy's works with seven men, when, being wounded in the head, he was thrown on the ground; his soldiers thinking him dead, his column relaxed. The second column, under General Banel, advanced in silence, when the general was killed. The third column, under Adjutant-general Quenin, who was also killed, was in like manner disconcerted. Night coming on, made Bonaparte fear that the enemy would attempt to make their way sword in hand: he therefore made dispositions to prevent them.

Next morning, April 14, at dawn, the hostile armies faced each other; the French left, under Augereau, kept General Provera blockaded, who, with his grenadiers, was also assailed by batteries of howitzers, which had been erected in the course of the night by Bonaparte's orders. Several of the Austrian regiments strove to penetrate the centre of the French, but were repulsed by General Menard, who was then ordered to fall back on the right wing. Before noon General Massena extended his line beyond the enemy's left, which occupied the village of Dego, strongly entrenched. The French pushed their light troops as far as the road leading from Dego to Spino. General La Harpe's division marched in three close columns; the one on his left, under General Causse, crossed the Bormida, and attacked the right of the enemy's left wing. General Cervoni with the second column, also passed the Bormida, covered by one of the French batteries, and advanced against the enemy; while the third column, under Adjutant-general Boyer, turned a ravin, and cut off their retreat. The Imperialists had not time to capitulate; and the French columns, spreading terror and death, put them to the rout. The brave General Provera, with the corps he commanded at Copalia, surrendered prisoners of war. By this victory the French acquired from seven to nine thousand prisoners, and the Austrians had near 3000 men killed, besides the loss of forty field-pieces, and the greater part of their baggage and magazines.

On April 15, before the French troops had scarcely returned to their camp, Beaulieu, with the flower of his army, attacked the village of Dego at break of day, and carried it by a sudden charge with the bayonet. The French, taken by surprise, fled on all sides. Massena, when he had formed part of his troops, attempted to stop Beaulieu's progress, but was repulsed in three attacks. General Causse was still more unfortunate; he attacked the enemy, and was on the point of charging with the bayonet, when he fell mortally wounded. In this situation, observing General Bonaparte, he collected his strength, and asked him if Dego was retaken.—“The posts are ours,” replied the general. “Then,” said Causse, “Vive la Republique! I die content.” The affair, however, was not yet decided, and it was already two o'clock in the afternoon. Bonaparte ordered a demi-brigade to form under General Victor, whilst Adjutant-general Lasnes, rallying a demi-brigade of light infantry, threw himself on the enemy's left. These movements carried Dego; the cavalry completed the rout of the enemy, who left 600 dead and 1400 prisoners. General Rusca took the post at San-Giovanni, which commands the valley of the Bormida. General Augereau, having driven the enemy from the redoubts of the Montezemo, communicated with the valley of the Tanaro, which Serrurier's division had already occupied.

The Directory, in their dispatches to Bonaparte, expressed what they felt, in finding they had chosen him to conduct the army of Italy to victory. “To-day, General!” said they, “receive the tribute of national gratitude: merit it more and more, and prove to Europe, that Beaulieu, by changing the scene of action, has not changed his opponent; that, beaten in the north, he shall be constantly defeated by the brave army of Italy; and that, with such defenders, liberty shall triumph over the impotent efforts of the enemies of the republic.” General La Harpe, and the chief of brigade, Rampon, also received honorable testimonies of the regard which the Directory had of their exertions.

While the Austrians, abandoning the important post of Bochetta, were in full retreat towards Tortona, by the road leading through Acqui and Gavi, on purpose to form a junction with the Neapolitan and Pontifical troops, the Piedmontese army, entrenched at Ceva, was exposed to the most imminent danger in consequence of the vicinity of Bonaparte, who immediately advanced with the assurance of a certain victory. Nor was he disappointed; for the Generals Augereau and Serrurier having commenced an attack, April 16, the greater part of the redoubts thrown up by the enemy were immediately carried; and General Colli, being afraid lest his flank should be turned before morning, took advantage of the approaching darkness to retire to an admirable position at the confluence of the Cursaglea and the Tanaro. Being nearly surrounded by these two deep and serpentine rivers, he immediately fortified their banks with strong batteries, and waited for succours either from the court of Turin or Field-marshal Beaulieu.

In the mean time General Serrurier entered Ceva, in which was a garrison of between seven and eight hundred men. The heavy artillery had not been able to keep pace with the army in the mountains, and were not yet arrived. The Piedmontese army, driven from Ceva, took a position at the confluence of the Cursaglea. On the 20th, Serrurier attacked their right by the village of St. Michael, and, passing the bridge, compelled them, after three hours fighting, to evacuate the village; but the Tanaro not being fordable, the division destined to attack their left could harass them only by its riflemen. General Serrurier therefore retreated: the enemy's position was formidable, surrounded by two deep and impetuous rivers; they had destroyed all the bridges, and erected strong batteries on the banks. Both armies reciprocally sought to deceive each other by false manoeuvres, to conceal their real intentions.

General Massena crossed the Tanaro by means of a bridge, April 21, and occupied the village of Lezegno; Guieux and Fiorella, generals of brigade, took the bridge of the Torra. Bonaparte meant to bear down on Mendovi, and compel the enemy to change the field of battle; but General Colli, dreading the issue of an action, which must have been decisive on so extended a line, retreated. At day-break the two armies were in BOOK 11. sight of each other, and the engagement began in the village of Vico. General Guieux bore down on the left of Mendovi, while the Generals Fiorella and Dammartin carried the redoubt which covered the enemy's centre; the Sardinian army abandoned the field of battle, and on that evening the French entered Mendovi. The enemy's loss amounted to 1800 men, of whom 1300 were prisoners.

CHAP. VI.

The enemy crossed the Sturâ, and took a position between Coni and Charasco. The French entered the town of Bena. General Serrurier on the 25th marched to La Trinite, and cannonaded the town of Fossana, the head-quarters of General Colli. General Massena advanced against Cerasco, and drove in the enemy's grand guard. Bonaparte sent General Dujard, and his own aide-camp, Marmont, to reconnoitre the place, and plant howitzers to beat down the pallasades. The enemy evacuated the town, and repassed the Sturâ. This victory was of the greatest consequence; for, besides supporting the right wing, it gave an ample supply of subsistence. The French threw bridges of boats across the Sturâ, and Fossana surrendered to Serrurier. General Augereau marched against Alba, which surrendered, and threw several bridges of boats across the Tamaro, to enable the army to pass the river.

The King of Sardinia, shut up in Turin, determined to treat for peace. General Colli, commander-in-chief of his army, addressed a letter to Bonaparte, stating, that as the king had sent plenipotentiaries to Genoa to treat for peace, under the mediation of the court of Spain, he thought the interests of humanity required that hostilities should be suspended during the dependence of the negotiation. He therefore proposed an armistice, in order to prevent the effusion of human blood. Bonaparte replied, that the Executive Directory preserved the right of treating for peace; it was therefore necessary that the plenipotentiaries of the king should repair to Paris, or wait at Genoa the arrival of those whom the French government should send thither. He further observed, that the military position of the two armies prevented every unqualified suspension of arms; and although he was convinced that his government was disposed to grant reasonable conditions of peace to his majesty, yet he could not arrest his march. There was, however, he remarked, a mean by which General Colli might attain his purpose, conformable to the true interests of his court, and which would prevent an effusion of blood; and that was to put into his possession two of the three fortresses of Coni, Alexandria, or Tortona; they could then wait the issue of negotiations, which probably might be protracted. A peace was granted to the unfortunate monarch, who, by the treaty of Cerasco, surrendered Exilles, Tortona, Coni, Alexandria, and Château Dauphin, as the pledges of his faith, and relinquished Savoy and the county of Nice for ever.

Immediately after this, Bonaparte addressed his head-quarters at Cerasco, in the following manner:—

“Soldiers!—In the course of fourteen days you have gained six victories, taken twenty-one stand of colours, fifty pieces of cannon, several strong fortresses, and conquered the richest portion of Piedmont; you have already seized 1500 prisoners, and killed and wounded more than 10,000 men.

“You have as yet, however, only fought for sterile rocks, illustrated indeed by your valor, but useless to your country. Yet you already edit the victorious armies of Holland and the Rhine; destitute of all, you have acquired every thing; you have gained battles without cannon, crossed rivers without pontoons, made forced marches without shoes, and watched all night under arms without brandy, and sometimes even without bread. Republican phalanxes, the soldiers of liberty are alone capable of suffering such privations as these.

“But, soldiers, notwithstanding two vanquished armies flee before you, it is needless to dissemble that you have achieved nothing, since Turin and Milan are not yet yours, and the ashes of the conquerors of Tarquin are still trodden under the feet of your enemies.

“You were bereft even of necessities at the commencement of the campaign, and now you enjoy plenty: the magazines taken from your enemies are numerous; the heavy artillery is arrived, and your country has a right to expect important events. Will you realise her hopes? The greatest obstacles are, doubtless, overcome; but you have still battles to win, cities to take, rivers to pass. Is there one among you whose courage is subdued? Who would prefer to return again to the summit of the Appenines and the Alps, patiently to listen to the reproaches of a soldiery composed of slaves? No, there are none such among the conquerors of Montenotte, Millesimo, Dego, and Mendovi.

“All burn to extend the glory of the French people; all are desirous to humble those haughty sovereigns, who dared to menace us with chains; all wish to dictate a glorious peace, calculated to indemnify our country for the immense sacrifices it has made; all are eager to be able, on returning to their native villages, to exclaim with pride, ‘I also belonged to the victorious army of Italy.’

“Friends! I promise you this conquest; but it is on the express condition, that you respect the people whom you are about to deliver from bondage, and avoid all thoughts of pillage, only dreamed of by those vile wretches set on by our enemies. Without this, you will not be the liberators, but the scourgers of enfranchised nations;

you will not be an honor to the French, for they will disavow you; your victories, your courage, your successes, the very blood of your brethren shed in battle will all be lost, and your honor and glory gone for ever!!!

"Nations of Italy!—The army approaches, on purpose to burst your fetters; France is the friend of every people; approach our standards with confidence. Your religion, your property, and your customs, will all be respected. We will carry on the war like generous enemies, for you have no dispute but with the tyrants who keep you in servitude."

The words in italics prove that Bonaparte, at the age of twenty-six, was a perfect master of dissimulation. The facts hereafter recorded are sufficient tests, that neither religion nor property was ever respected by him or his army.

After signing the armistice with the King of Sardinia, Bonaparte marched his army towards the Po. Massena had reached Alexandria, and seized on the magazines, which the Austrians had sold to the town. On the 6th of May the army of Italy took possession of Tortona; they found here more than one hundred pieces of brass cannon, and immense magazines. Ceva and Coni were in an equal state of defence, and liberally provisioned. Thus the war supported itself, and the successes of the French furnished them with the means of making new conquests. The stipulations of the fourth article of the armistice, induced the general of the Austrian army to believe that Bonaparte wished to cross the Po at Valentia; but Bonaparte hastened by a forced march to Castel San-Giovanni with 5000 grenadiers and 1500 horse. Andreossi, chief of battalion of artillery, and Adjutant-general Frontin, with 100 dragoons, reconnoitred the Po as far as Placentia, and took five boats loaded with rice, on board of which were 500 sick, and all the army medicines. On the 7th, at nine in the morning, Bonaparte reached the Po, opposite Placentia. Two squadrons of hussars, on the opposite side of the river, seemed determined to dispute the passage. The French troops got into the boats, and landed on the other side, when the enemy's cavalry retired. The divisions of the army passed the river in the course of the day. In the mean time Beaulieu, acquainted with the march of the French, was convinced of the usefulness of his entrenchments on the Tesino, and his redoubts at Pavia. On the 8th, at noon, Bonaparte heard that a division of the enemy was near; he advanced, and found them entrenched in the village of Fombio, with twenty pieces of cannon. After a spirited resistance, the Austrians retreated; and were pursued as far as the Adda.

Another body of the Imperialists reached Codogno, the head-quarters of General La Harpe, at two in the morning, and drove in the French videttes. General La Harpe ordered a demi-brigade to advance, when the enemy were driven back and disappeared; but La Harpe was killed by a ball. General Berthier went directly to Codogno, pursued the enemy, and took Casal, with a vast quantity of baggage. The passage of the Po, which was effected May 20, was a great operation, as in many places that river could not have been passed in two months. This alarmed all the states of Italy, and the Infant Duke of Parma signed an armistice with Bonaparte, in which he engaged to pay a military contribution of 2,000,000 livres French money; to furnish 2200 draught horses and harness, and others for the officers and the cavalry; to give up twenty paintings, and lodge a quantity of wheat and oats, and furnish 2000 oxen for the French army.

Bonaparte informed the Directory of his intention of sending to Paris, as soon as possible, the finest pictures of Correggio, and among others a St. Jerome, said to be his master-piece. "I confess," observed Bonaparte, "this saint has chosen an unlucky moment to arrive at Paris; but I hope you will grant him the honors of the museum." Accordingly, the Duke of Parma, conscious of his weakness, suffered all the master-pieces of painting and sculpture, which had hitherto adorned his states, amounting to twenty pictures, to be forthwith transmitted to Paris.

No sooner had the French crossed the Po, than the potentates of Italy became eager to consult their own safety. The senate of Venice ordered Louis XVIII. to quit its territories, and the Grand Duke of Tuscany sued for favor. The King of Naples sent to Genoa to make peace, and all the sea-ports of the peninsula were shut against the English. Abundance reigned in the French camp, and the treasury of the army was filled by extorted contributions, notwithstanding the fair promises of the French general, who was well aware that his conquests could never be consolidated, until he had overcome the Austrians and seized all their Italian possessions.

The road to Milan, which was opened to the French, was not safe until the Austrians were driven from the banks of the Adda. Bonaparte had so disposed the march of his divisions, that, in less than three hours, he could unite them; but Beaulieu had placed the Adda between himself and the French, and waiting for them at the end of a bridge, 100 toises in length, he hoped to stop their progress by covering it with a numerous artillery. This bridge lay at the town of Lodi; it was at the head of it, on the side next the city, that Bonaparte was to plant, under a shower of grape-shot, two pieces of cannon, to prevent the enemy from breaking it down, whilst a column was forming to carry the pass. The French entered Lodi, May 12, and Beaulieu, with his whole army, and thirty pieces of heavy can-

BOOK 11. non, defended the passage of the bridge. Bonaparte formed all his artillery, and the cannonade was kept up for many hours with great vivacity. The troops formed in close column with a battalion of carabineers at their head, followed by all the grenadier battalions, at charge-step, amidst reiterated acclamations of "Vive la Republique!" They shewed themselves at the bridge; but the Austrians kept up so tremendous a fire, that those who advanced fell by columns; they retreated, but were rallied, and the slaughter was again dreadful; a second time they retreated, but Bonaparte was immovable in his determination; again they darted forward, over the dead bodies of their comrades, and the Generals Berthier, Massena, Cervoni, Dallemagne, the chief of brigade Lasnes, and the chief of battalion Dupat, placed themselves at the head of the column, and passed the bridge; the Generals Rusca, Augereau, and Bayrand, with their divisions, passed the Adda, a few miles below Lodi, when the French began to force the bridge, and attacked the Austrians suddenly in the rear, when they thought the French only on one side of the river, and this decided the fortune of the day. The line of artillery was instantly carried, Beaulieu's order of battle broken, and the French troops spread terror and death in every direction; the hostile army was dispersed, though the Austrian cavalry strove to protect the retreat of the infantry, and charged the French. The Imperialists lost 20 pieces of cannon, and between two and three thousand men, killed, wounded, and taken prisoners. The brave, but unfortunate Beaulieu, with the remains of his army, took refuge under the cannon of Mantua during night, and abandoned Pizzighitone, Cremona, and all the Milanese, to the French.

Bonaparte, in his dispatches to the Directory, after stating this memorable battle, observed, that although the French had been engaged in many warm contests, none approached the terrible passage of the Bridge of Lodi; the French pursued the Austrians as far as Pizzighitone, and entered it on the 12th, after a brisk cannonade, and took about 400 prisoners. Cremona surrendered to them, and the vanguard of Bonaparte took the rout to Milan, and entered it on the 15th, having received the submission of Pavia, where they found immense magazines of the Imperial army. The conquest of Lombardy might now be regarded as complete; for, although the castle of Milan still held out, the tri-coloured flag floated from the Lake of Como, and the frontiers of the Grisons, as far as the gates of Pavia. Such rapid success, in so short a time, made some days of repose necessary to an army so much engaged. The Austrians had quitted Milan soon after the news of the battle of Lodi; and, when the French were about to enter the city, a deputation of the inhabitants carried them the key of its gates. The court of the archduke departed, and the archduke and duchess shewed great sorrow at quitting their capital; the streets and squares, through which they passed, were crowded with people, who evinced neither joy nor sorrow, and few of the nobility attended the court in its flight. The people collected in great crowds to witness the entry of the French, and almost all wore the national cockade; the Imperial arms were taken away from most of the public buildings, and many of the nobility took the arms off their carriages. On the 14th of May, the tree of liberty was planted in the grand square; and, on the same day, General Massena entered the city with his troops. A deputation, with the archbishop, went out to meet him; upon entering, he clapped the keys, which had been given him, one against the other, in token of rejoicing.

The conqueror's entry was extremely brilliant; the nobility and gentry of the city went out to meet Bonaparte in their most splendid carriages, and returned in the procession, amidst the shouts of an immense populace; the cavalcade went to the archducal palace, where he was to lodge, with several bands of musicians, playing patriotic tunes; and, soon after his arrival, he sat down to a dinner of two hundred covers. The day was concluded by an elegant ball, where the ladies vied with each other in patriotism, by wearing the French national colours in every part of their dress. The next day, Bonaparte received visits from the citizens; and in the evening there was a concert of vocal and instrumental music at the theatre. All the chests, which contained the property of the archduke and the city, were emptied into the French coffers; and a splendid fête was given the day after, with much enthusiasm, which finished in the evening with a general illumination; the whole was terminated by sending deputations into the different towns and villages, to instruct the people in the principles of liberty and equality.

May 21, a proclamation was issued by Bonaparte to the people of Lombardy, stating, "That the French people, looking on the people of Lombardy as their brethren, had a right to expect a just return, and he therefore should impose a contribution of 20,000,000 livres, to be raised in equal proportions by the different districts of Lombardy: the necessities of the army require it, and it is a small sum for a country so fertile."

Twenty-one standards of the Austrian and Piedmontese armies had been already sent to Paris, and presented to the executive directory. These were received in a public sitting, amidst the acclamations of "Vive la Republique!" and, the day on which Bonaparte entered Milan, the ambassadors of the King of Sardinia signed, at Paris, the definitive treaty of peace between that sovereign and France. The government, anxious to encourage the ardor of the troops, by publicly acknowledging their services, decreed the celebration of a Fête des Victoires, on the 29th of May, and it was observed at Paris. Great preparations were made in the Champ de Mars for this grand ceremony. Several ornamental statues were erected, and military ensigns festooned together in various parts of the field, added to the dignity of the place. The constituted authorities were on a mount, raised in the middle, and large bodies of cavalry and infantry were ranged round them. An immense crowd assembled; the directory advanced to the sound of music; and, after a profound silence was observed, the decree was read, and the president of the directory addressed the crowd in an appropriate speech; discharges of artillery and music continued after the ceremony to exhilarate the people, and, forming themselves into dancing parties, the day was spent in mirth and festivity.

While these feats were acted on the banks of the Seine, Bonaparte, faithful to his plan of activity, made dispositions to attack the castle of Milan; and, preparing to pursue the remains of the Austrian army, meditated an attack on the dominions of Rome and Naples.

He was so completely overpowered with vanity at the extent and rapidity of his own conquests, that in his proclamation from the city of Milan, May 22, he addressed his army in the following language of triumph:

"Soldiers! you have precipitated yourselves like a torrent from the height of the Appenines; you have overthrown and dispersed all that dared to oppose your march: Milan is yours; and the republican standard is displayed throughout all Lombardy. Yes, soldiers, you have done much; but still more remains for you to do. Shall posterity reproach us with having found a Capua in Lombardy?—To re-establish the capitol; to replace there the statues of those heroes who have rendered it immortal; to arouse the Roman people, entranced in so many ages of slavery;—this shall be the fruit of your victories. It will be an epoch for the admiration of posterity!"

General Despinoy, the French commandant of Milan, observing, on the 24th, that the people were collecting in the suburbs of the city, on the side of Pavia, ordered some troops to march there, whom the rebels attempted to disarm; but the French detachment, having wounded and taken some of them, put the rest to flight. This movement took place at the same moment at Varese, Pavia, and Lodi. The tocsin was sounded in the country; the peasants assassinated the persons employed in the administration; and the garrison left at Pavia, having been surprised in their quarters, were disarmed.

Bonaparte set out from Milan on the 24th, to repair to Lodi, leaving only at Milan sufficient troops to blockade the castle. Scarcely had he reached Lodi, when General Despinoy informed him, that, three hours after his departure, the tocsin was sounded in Lombardy; and that it was industriously circulated, that Nice was taken by the English; the army of Condé arrived by Switzerland, on the borders of the Milanese; and Beaulieu, reinforced with 60,000 men, was on his march to Milan. Every where the people were called on to arm against the French; the nobles had discharged their domestics, telling them, that equality did not allow the continuance of their services; and all the partisans of the house of Austria, the sbirri, and agents of the customs, appeared in the front. The inhabitants of Pavia, reinforced with five or six thousand peasants, invested the citadel, in which there were only 300 French. At Milan, the people tore down the tree of liberty, and trampled the national cockade under foot. General Despinoy, the commander, mounted his horse, whilst patrols put the populace to flight. When Bonaparte arrived at Milan, he ordered a number of hostages to be arrested, and those to be shot who were taken in arms; at the same time acquainting the archbishop, chapter, monks, and nobles, that they were responsible for the public tranquillity.

The chief of brigade, Lasnes, attacked Binasco, which seven or eight hundred armed peasants seemed determined to defend; he charged them, and, having killed about 100, dispersed the rest. Bonaparte ordered the village to be burned, which exhibited a horrible spectacle. He then sent the Archbishop of Milan to Pavia, with the following proclamation:

"Milan, 6 Prairial, 4th year, (25 May, 1796.)"

"A misled multitude, destitute of the means of resistance, have been guilty of the greatest excesses in several communes, contemning the republic and the brave army triumphant over so many kings. This inconceivable frenzy merits pity; the unhappy people are led astray, only to conduct them to ruin. The general-in-chief, faithful to the principles the French nation have adopted, who do not make war on the people, earnestly wishes to leave a gate open to repentance; but those who, in twenty-four hours, shall not lay down their arms, and take anew the oath of obedience to the French republic, shall be treated as rebels, and their villages burned. May the terrible example of Binasco make them open their eyes! its fate shall be that of all the towns and villages which persist in revolt.

(Signed) "BONAPARTE."

Bonaparte proceeded to Pavia, which he reached at day-break, when the rebels were driven back. The place was filled with a multitude of people, and in a state of defence; the castle was taken, and the French troops were prisoners. The general made the artillery advance, and, after some discharges, summoned the insurgents to submit, and have recourse to French generosity; but they answered, "that while Pavia had walls, they would not surrender." General Dammartin formed the 6th battalion of grenadiers in close column, with two eight pounders in their van; and, each man having a hatchet, the gates were burst open, on which the multitude dispersed, and sought safety in caves and on house-tops, attempting, by throwing down tiles, to dispute the entry of the troops into the streets. "Thrice," said Bonaparte, "had the order to set fire to the city expired on my lips, when the garrison of the castle arrived, and hastened with cries of joy to embrace their deliverers. Their names were called over, and none were found missing; if the blood of a single Frenchman had been shed, I had resolved to raise on the ruins of Pavia a column, on which these impressive words were to be inscribed, 'Here stood the city of Pavia!'" The result, however, declared, that Bonaparte had no great reason to boast of his compassion, for he ordered the whole municipality to be shot, and 200 hostages to be arrested, and sent immediately into France. The punishments of Bonaparte for insurrection were tremendous; the village of Binasco burnt, Milan given up to pillage for twenty-four hours, and many of its principal inhabitants put to death, and the municipality of Pavia shot, after the city had been taken, were terrible proofs of his inhumanity.

The French general-in-chief now issued a proclamation, stating, that the nobles, the priests, and the agents of Austria, had led astray the people of these delightful countries; that the French army, as generous as brave, would treat as brethren the peaceable natives, but that it would be terrible as the fire of heaven to rebels, and to the villages that gave them protection. He therefore declared all those villages in a state of rebellion which had not complied with his order of the 25th; and ordered the generals to march against them the troops necessary to suppress the insurgents, to set fire to them, and to shoot, on the spot, all who had arms in their hands. All priests and nobles, in the rebellious communes, were to be arrested as hostages, and sent into France; every village where the tocsin was sounded was to be instantly burnt; and the generals were responsible for the execution of the order. The villages where a single Frenchman was assassinated, were to pay three times the sum they annually paid to the archduke, until they gave up the assassin. Every man found with a musket and ammunition, was to be immediately shot, by order of the general commanding the jurisdiction. Wherever concealed arms were found, the place was to pay thrice its usual revenue by way of fine; and every house, where a musket was found, was to be burnt, unless the proprietor declared to whom it belonged. All the nobles and rich persons who excited the people to revolt, were to be taken as hostages, and sent to France, and a part of their revenues confiscated.

Bonaparte, having removed his head-quarters to Brescia, made dispositions to induce Beaulieu to believe, that he meant to turn him by the head of the lake, in order to cut him off from the road to Tyrole, by way of Riva. At two in the morning, May 30, all the divisions were in motion, and marched towards Borghetta, where Bonaparte intended to cross the Mincio: they crossed that river, and engaged, when the Austrians fought with the utmost bravery, and retreated only after performing acts of the greatest intrepidity: the Austrians lost 1500 men and 500 horse in killed and prisoners; among the latter was Prince Cuto, lieutenant-general in the army of the King of Naples, and commander-in-chief of the Neapolitan cavalry. The French also took five pieces of cannon, two 12-pounders and three 6-pounders, with seven or eight waggons loaded with warlike stores. At Castlenuovo many magazines were taken, part of which, however, had been burnt. Thus the Austrians were driven out of Italy, and the French advanced posts reached the mountains of Germany.

The division of General Massena took Verona, which had been the refuge of Louis-Stanislaus, brother of Louis XVI. and of his little court of emigrants, to whom the Venetians had given a ready reception: but who, as before mentioned, had been ordered to quit the territories.

Vigorous measures were now adopted for the investment of Mantua. Accordingly, while Massena was posted at Verona, so as to intercept all succours at that side, and the garrison of Peschiera prevented the arrival of any supplies from the Tyrole, the French took possession of the suburbs of St. Georgio, and, established their head-quarters at Favorita; the cannon taken from the emperor and the king of Sardinia furnishing them with artillery sufficient for all the purposes of a blockade. Bonaparte, at the same time, addressed a proclamation to the Tyrolese, which preceded the march of his troops into the defiles of the mountains; he also took possession of the defiles of the Appenines, and seized on the fortress of Fuentes, situated on the lake of Coma.

In the mean time, new commotions took place in the Imperial fiefs, which border on the states of Genoa, Tuscany, and Piedmont; the communications of the army with the river of Genoa were menaced, the convoys attacked, and the couriers assassinated. General Lasnes, having been dispatched to chastise the peasantry, entered the imperial fiefs with 1200 horse, arrested and shot the chiefs of the revolt, and burned their habitations. The same severity was displayed in the environs of Tortona; a proclamation was issued and strictly executed. All the seigneurs, holding imperial fiefs, were to repair in person to Tortona, there to take the oath of obedience to the republic; and if, within five days after the publication of the order, they had not done so, their goods were to be confiscated. The inhabitants were to carry, to the military agent at Tortona, within twenty-four hours after notice, the sum of the military contribution, which was to be enhanced one-tenth for each day's delay of payment. All persons, after the space of forty-eight hours, found with arms or ammunition, were to be shot. All the bells which sounded the tocsin were to be taken down from their steeples, and broken to pieces, within twenty-four hours after the proclamation; and those who neglected to do so, to be considered as rebels, and their villages burnt.

General Augereau having crossed the Po at Borgoforte, arrived at Bologna on the 19th of June, where he found 400 of the pope's soldiers, who were made prisoners. Bonaparte left Tortona on the 17th, and arrived, on the 19th, at Modena, whence he sent orders, by Adjutant-general Vignole, to the garrison of Urbino, to surrender prisoners of war; after this he continued his march to Bologna, where he arrived at midnight. The French took, in Fort Urbino, fifty pieces of cannon, in excellent condition, 500 muskets, and provisions for 600 men for two months. Fort Urbino was encircled by a wall, which covered bastions, and surrounded by ditches full of water, having a covered way newly repaired. It was commanded by a knight of Malta, with 300 men, who were taken prisoners. At Bologna the cardinal legate was taken, with all the officers of the état-major, and four standards. The cardinal legate of Ferrara was also taken prisoner, with the commandant of that fort, who was likewise a knight of Malta. In the castle of Ferrara there were 114 pieces of cannon.

After taking Bologna, a French division proceeded to Ferrara and Faenza, whose submission promised that of Romagna; a column of the French army also marched from Reggio, across the Appenines, to Pistoia, and threatened to advance to Rome by the way of Florence. This intelligence threw the court of the grand duke into the greatest alarm. Manfredini, his prime minister, was sent to Bologna in great haste, to state to the French general, that, as a passage through Tuscany had been denied the troops of Naples, it would be unjust to violate a territory the allies had respected, and with which France was at peace. The grand duke, however, could not hinder the French entering his territories, and could only get a promise from Bonaparte, that he would not enter Florence. The French army marched rapidly towards Leghorn. Bonaparte, on reaching Pistoia, acquainted the grand duke of the circumstance by a letter, wherein he observed that the flag of the French republic was hourly insulted in the port of Leghorn, the property of the French merchants violated, and every hour marked by some attempt against the French, as contrary to the interests of the republic as to the law of nations. The executive directory had often complained to the minister of his royal highness at Paris, who had been forced to avow the impossibility his master found in checking the English, and keeping neutrality in the port of Leghorn. The directory, therefore, felt it their duty to repel force by force, and make their commerce be respected; and had ordered him to send a division of the army under his command to take possession of Leghorn; he had therefore the honour to inform his royal highness, that a division of the army would enter that city on June 28, but would conduct itself agreeable to the principles of the neutrality it was to maintain; and the flag, the garrison, and the property of his royal highness and his people, would be scrupulously respected. The general was also to assure the grand duke of the wish entertained by the French government for a continuation of the friendship which united the two states, and of its conviction, that his royal highness, witnessing the excesses committed by the English ships, and, unable to prevent them, would applaud the measures adopted by the directory.

The French general left Pistoia to join the column already at the gates of Leghorn. An English frigate, on going out of the harbour, was fired at, but without effect. A few hours before the French troops arrived, more than forty English ships, fully laden, left Leghorn. The general ordered the Chevalier Spannoch, governor of the city for the grand duke, to be arrested; he was conducted to Florence, and sent to prison by order of the grand duke.

The consul of the French republic was ordered, by Bonaparte, to put seals on all the English magazines; and he was also ordered to take similar measures as to those appertaining to the emperor, the Empress of Russia, and, in general, all the princes or subjects of states with whom the French were at war; and to employ every means necessary to discover the merchandise deposited in the houses of the different merchants at Leghorn, and take possession of them. A strong garrison, under General Vaubois, was left in Leghorn. Bonaparte, with Berthier, and a part of the état-major, passed through Florence,

The Pope and the King of Naples having made application for an armistice, it was granted to the King of Sicily, on the easy terms of withdrawing assistance from the combined army. In addition to the towns then possessed by the republicans, the Pope was obliged to surrender the city and fortress of Ancona, on the Adriatic; to pay the sum of twenty-one millions of francs, by instalments; and to give up 100 busts, statues, vases, or pictures, according to the choice of commissioners who were to be sent to Rome.

As the court of Vienna was confounded at the alarming progress of the republican army in Italy, the chief command was given to Marshal Wurmser, an officer both brave and experienced, having seen more than sixty campaigns, and who, although in his 80th year, was exempt from the infirmities of age. Wurmser had collected in the Tyrole the wrecks of the Austrian army, and received powerful reinforcements, while Bonaparte was employed in his expedition to Leghorn and against the states of the Pope. After the engagement of Borghetta, the Imperialists retreated to the mountains, with an intent to dispute the passes of the Tyrole: they fortified their lines from the lake of Garda to the Adige with infinite labor. Massena ordered General Joubert to attack the Imperialists by the Rochetta di Champion; the French climbed up the rocks, killed 100 men, and took 200 prisoners, with 400 tents and all the baggage. During this, the chief of battalion, Recco, having carried the important post of Belona, killed 300 men, and took 70 prisoners, the Austrians abandoned their entrenchments. Such was the event of the first battle between the two armies since the new general assumed the command.

Insurrections soon after appeared in the Romagna. General Augereau ordered a body of troops to set out, with cannon and waggons amply supplied. A numerous phalanx presented themselves, and were attacked by the republican troops at two points, the one on the side of Imola, and the other on the side of Argenta. The defence was terrible: but, after an engagement of three hours, disorder took place amongst the insurgents, and part were cut to pieces, and part saved themselves by flight; the town of Lugo was surrounded, and delivered up, for three hours, to be pillaged by the troops. Every individual found in arms was put to death. The army returned with an immense booty; and Bologna exhibited one of the richest fairs that had been witnessed for many years, the plunder being exposed there for sale.

On the 16th of July the siege of Mantua was hotly pressed forward, when the garrison made a most gallant resistance. About 4000 men sallied from two of the gates, and drove in all the French advanced posts, and retreated into the city. On the 18th, General Murat and Adjutant-general Vignole, with 2000 men, were to attack the right of the Austrian entrenched camp; while General D'Allemagne, with a strong column, attacked the left. Andreossi, chief of battalion of artillery, with five gun-boats, gave a false alarm to the enemy, and, by drawing their fire, enabled the Generals d'Allemagne and Murat to carry disorder into the enemy's ranks. During this, Chasseloup, chief of brigade of engineers, under a fire of grape-shot from the ramparts, directed the opening of the trenches. The batteries of St. George, Pradella, and La Favorite, began to play against the fortress. Soon after the batteries opened, several parts of the town were on fire; and the custom-house, the palace of Colloredo, and several convents, were reduced to ashes. At day-break the Austrians made a sally, under a dreadful fire from the ramparts; but the republicans, posted behind banks, and occupying every place which could protect them from the enemy's fire, waited for them in silence, and annoyed them from concealed situations; the Imperialists returned within the walls, and the French, in the following night, succeeded in completing their trenches.

General Berthier had summoned the governor to surrender; observing, that, as he was attacked on all sides, he could not long defend the town, and that an ill-judged obstinacy would entirely ruin the unfortunate city; the laws of war, therefore, prescribed to him to surrender it; but, if he should persevere in his resistance, he would be responsible for the blood thus uselessly shed, and for the destruction of the place; a conduct which would compel the French general to treat him with all the rigors of war. The Count Canto D'Irles, general commandant, answered, that the laws of honor and of duty compelled him to defend the city entrusted to his command.

On the 29th of July, Field-marshal Wurmser attacked the posts of Salo and Corona, by which the city of Mantua was covered. Hereupon the French were obliged, not only to evacuate their points on the Adige, but even to raise the blockade of Mantua, with considerable loss. This success, on the part of the Austrians, inspired them with fresh animation; and in the course of the succeeding day they seized the prodigious magazines of the French in the vicinity of Brescia, nearly cutting off their communications with the Milanese, owing to the skilful exertions of their new commander.

No sooner had these happy tidings reached the ears of Pope Pius VI, who had neither political discernment nor discretion, than his vice-legat was ordered to take possession of Ferrara, now evacuated by the French; although Chevalier Azara, the Spanish ambassador, advised him, in the most friendly manner, not to take such a step, as it was a gross violation of the armistice between him and the French republic. The people of Ferrara seemed extremely unwilling to be again put under the papal dominion.

The victories of Wurmser placed the French armies in a very delicate situation. On the 1st of August the army advanced, while the Austrians detached a force to Castiglione, where General Valette had been left with 1800 men to defend that important post, and to keep the division of Wurmser at a distance; but Valette was completely defeated, and escaped with only half his troops to Monte-Chiaro. Bonaparte, vexed by the issue of this affair, instantly suspended General Valette. The two armies faced each other on the morning of the 3d. The hostile armies joined battle on the 5th, and fought with the most obstinate perseverance. The Imperialists, not waiting the attack of the French, surrounded the advanced guard of General Massena, near Castiglione, and took General Pigeon prisoner, with three pieces of flying artillery. The French had hopes of penetrating the Austrian line, and the latter extended it in order to surround the French; the Imperialists were thrown into disorder, and retreated to Salo; but that place being in the hands of the French, they wandered through the mountains, and many of them were taken. Meantime General Augereau took Castiglione, and during the day maintained several obstinate actions with the enemy, who fought with great bravery.

General Wurmser assembled the remains of his army, and drew up between the villages of Scanello, which supported his right, and La Chiesa, which covered his left. Bonaparte hastened in person to Lonado, to be certain of the number of troops he could detach from it; but, on arriving there, a messenger summoned the commandant at Lonado to surrender, which was completely surrounded. Bonaparte had recourse to stratagem; there were but a few hundred men at Lonado, and the place must have surrendered; he ordered the messenger to be brought before him, and his eyes uncovered. Bonaparte told him, that, if his general indulged the hope of taking the commander-in-chief of the army of Italy, he had only to advance; that he ought to know that officer was at Lonado, as every one knew the republican army was at that place; and that all the officers belonging to the division should be responsible for the insult he had been guilty of toward the general-in-chief. He then told the messenger, that, if his division did not, within eight minutes, lay down their arms, he would have no mercy. The officer was confounded at seeing the general, and returned with his answer. Preparation was affected to be made for attacking the enemy, when the whole column of 4000 men, with four pieces of cannon, and three standards, laid down their arms.

The French commander, when convinced of the destruction of all the hostile corps from Corona and Salo, on the 5th of August, instead of tarrying for repose, ordered the whole army to make a retrograde movement, whilst General Serrurier's division advanced from Marcaria, in order to turn General Wurmser's left. This movement had, in some degree, the desired effect, and Wurmser extended his right wing to observe their rear. General Augereau attacked the enemy's centre, while Massena attacked the right; the cavalry, under General Beaumont, proceeded to the right, to support the light artillery and infantry. The French were victorious, and obtained 18 pieces of cannon and 120 ammunition waggons. The Austrians lost 500 men killed, 8 pieces of cannon, and 2000 prisoners.

One portion of the Austrians was driven as far as Trent, while another retired to the banks of the Brenta, on which Bonaparte resumed his former position on the Adige, and sat down once more before Mantua.

While General Satruguet conducted the operations of the siege, the main body of the French advanced against the Austrians, who had already burned part of their flotilla on the lake of Garda; and, after being driven from the camp of Mori, retired to Roveredo, where Wurmser had established a most formidable line of defence, with the centre of his army supported by the castle of Colliano, his left strengthened by a steep mountain, and his right by the Adige. Bonaparte determined on an immediate attack, apprehensive that if he suffered this opportunity to escape him, the position of the Austrians would be rendered more formidable. Accordingly the troops, though greatly fatigued, were instantly formed into columns, (August 6,) and while General Dommartin commenced the battle of Roveredo with eight pieces of artillery, Massena advanced at the head of the grenadiers, who penetrated to the entrenchments, and cut down the barriers with their hatchets. On this the Austrians gave way, and were pursued by the republicans, who immediately took possession of Trent.

General Augereau and Massena forced the Austrians to raise the siege of Peschiera, and to abandon the line of the Mincio. On the 7th, Augereau passed the Mincio at Peschiera, while General Serrurier advanced to Verona, and got there at ten at night, the very moment the division under General Massena had recovered its former position; the rear-guard of the Austrians was yet at Verona, the gates of which were shut, and the draw-bridges raised. The provveditor of the Venetian republic being summoned to open them, answered, that he could not comply within two hours; Bonaparte ordered the gates to be burst open with cannon-shot. The French seized all the stores in the place, and resumed their former po-

The gallant Wurmser, notwithstanding the loss of 6000 of his troops, displayed equal constancy, and after abandoning the banks of the Arisio, occupied the borders of the Brenta; but being pursued by the enemy, his rear-guard was overtaken and defeated at the village of Primolano, (August 9,) after which, Bonaparte immediately passed the defiles of the mountains, and commenced an attack on the main body. The Austrians, encouraged by the presence of Wurmser, fought bravely, but unfortunately their centre was pierced by the fourth demi-brigade of the line, and the fifth demi-brigade of light infantry; while Augereau, forcing a bridge, in spite of the opposition experienced on the part of a body of grenadiers posted there, entered Bassano, August 10, nearly at the same time, but in a different quarter from Massena, who had marched through the suburbs.

The intrepid field-marshal, finding himself cut off from the main body of the army, immediately assembled some horse, which had suffered but little during the action, and with great difficulty rejoined a division of 5000 cavalry, and an equal number of infantry in the neighbourhood of Montebello. With these poor remains of his army, he proceeded with remarkable celerity, by mounting his foot-soldiers behind the dragoons, and having crossed the Molinella, and defeated General Char-ton, who attempted to oppose his progress, he at length entered Mantua, August 27, to the great joy and surprise of the garrison, who had destroyed the works of the French, and carried into the place 140 pieces of heavy artillery, which the latter had left in their trenches, with provisions for a considerable period.

To conclude a final settlement with the Pope was found to be a matter of considerable difficulty, as the conditions exacted from him were much too severe. He was desired to liberate all persons, of whatever country, who were confined for their political sentiments; to decline prosecuting any for their religious opinions; to abolish the infernal inquisition; to renounce all claim upon Avignon and the Venaissin; to advance monthly the sum of 300,000 livres (12,500*l.* sterling) during the war; to leave Ferrara and Bologna, with their legislations, at the disposal of France; to yield different specified commercial advantages; and to agree, without any reserve, to all those conditions. A meeting of cardinals was summoned by his holiness, in order to deliberate on the terms thus offered by the republicans, who declared with one voice, that they were destructive of the rights of religion and sovereignty; and they were in consequence immediately rejected.

The Emperor of Germany, in the mean time, being deeply concerned for the fate of Marshal Wurmser, and the numerous garrison shut up in Mantua, gave orders to Field-marshal Alvinzy to collect an army on the borders of the Tyrole, descending from thence in two divisions along the Adige and Piava to Verona, where the French army had established its head-quarters. The latter division was commanded by Alvinzy in person, who, having crossed the Piava and Brenta, engaged the van of the French army, conducted by Bonaparte in person, who forced his veteran opponent to repass the Brenta, after a smart engagement. But as the Tyrole division vanquished the enemy under General Vabois, Bonaparte found it necessary to retreat, for the purpose of defending the passes of the Adige.

As the Austrian general believed that it was now impossible to prevent the junction of the two divisions, he hoped he would soon be able to raise the blockade of Mantua; but General Bonaparte, clearly perceiving the dangerous consequences of such an event, instantly determined to hazard an engagement with Alvinzy's army, which had again proceeded as far as the Adige. Having passed that river, on the 14th of November, during the night, the republican general advanced to the village of Arcole, at an early hour of the morning, as the execution of his plan could not be accomplished without forcing his passage through it. Its natural strength was very great, being situated in the midst of morasses and canals, and the bridge leading to it was defended by the utmost display of military skill. The conflict, during the whole day, was clearly in favor of the Austrians, the French having lost many of their best officers, and a very considerable number of men.

A detachment of the republicans, however, took a circuitous route, and at last carried the village by a dreadful assault in the rear, before which the Austrians had conveyed away their baggage and artillery. The way being thus fairly opened, the French began a general action on the 16th of November, at the dawn of day; the centre of the Austrian army was soon vanquished, but, as the wings were secured by the strong nature of their position, no impression of any consequence could be effected. Bridges, by order of Bonaparte, were thrown over the impracticable parts of the morass during the night, and next day the battle was renewed with tenfold obstinacy; but the flanks of the Austrian army were turned by a number of skilful manœuvres, their rear being attacked by a corps in ambuscade, which created a general confusion, and the Austrians fled on all hands, the French gaining a complete but bloody victory. Bonaparte, in his dispatches to the directory, declared, "Never was field of battle so variously disputed as that of Arcole." The battle of Arcole had continued for three days, with remarkable and persevering obstinacy on each side.

In the mean time, the left wing of the French army had been forced by General Davidowich, who seized on the important post of Rivoli, and advanced to Castello-Nuovo, within eight leagues of Mantua: but Bonaparte, taking advantage of his late victory, ordered a body of troops, under General Massena, to repass the Adige and attack the successful division, which was forced, November 22, to retire behind the Arisio; while General Alvinzy, after losing about 6000 men in killed and wounded, eighteen pieces of cannon, and four standards, took refuge on the other side of the Brenta, leaving Mantua to its fate, which was gallantly defended by the veteran Wurmser.

Although the expedition of Alvinzy had a very unfortunate issue, it did not dispose his holiness to agree to the terms which were offered him by the French. Prior to the battle of Arcole, General Bonaparte had sent a letter to Cardinal Mattei, written with his own hand, requesting that he would go to Rome, using every exertion to prevail with his holiness to consider the genuine nature of his situation, and the imperious necessity of consulting his true interest, declaring that peace was the anxious wish of the republic. It was not till the expiration of six weeks that the cardinal's answer was received, which stated, "that his holiness, as sovereign pontiff and depository on earth of the precepts promulgated by the Saviour of mankind, had ever been solicitous for the preservation of harmony in the great family of Christians; that he had felt the extremest sorrow in seeing France delivered up to such wild excesses, and the children of the church plunging themselves into such horrible disorders; that the gentleness with which he had treated these wanderers from the fold of Christ, was so far from having its due effect, that, blinded by the success of their arms, the French government had exacted from him the overthrow and total destruction of religion, the gospel, and the church; that his holiness, after devoutly asking counsel from God, and recalling to mind the example of the ancient martyrs, was decided to try the chance of war."

Various opinions prevailed on the different successes of the contending parties. When the Austrians were triumphant, it was thought that victory had abandoned the republican standards. Much agitation was produced at Cremona, Casal Maggiore, and two villages in the environs of this latter town. At Cremona, after the surprise of Brescia, it was suggested to preserve the tree of liberty, to hang on it those who had assisted in planting it. At Casal Maggiore, the commandant, as he was going to embark, was insulted. His embarkation was strongly opposed, and, in trying to escape, he rushed into the river, and there met death.—The French garrison in the citadel of Ferrara suddenly left it, having spiked their cannon, and thrown into the river what ammunition they could not carry off; tranquillity was maintained until the arrival of the vice-legate, as before mentioned, which caused as much surprise as the departure of the French troops. His entry was modest, but having replaced the Papal arms, the municipality and national guards repaired instantly to the place, where they were again pulled down, and replaced by those of the republic. On the news of the victories of the French, the vice-legate returned to Rome; and, by the armistice concluded at Bologna, that city and Ferrara were to continue in the possession of the French.

The republican writers have not failed in warmly eulogising the juvenile career of Bonaparte in this campaign; but be it recollected, that the French general had fame and fortune to seek at this period, temptations which could not have induced Marshal Wurmser to take the field, as former victories had long established his reputation. When we impartially consider the deeds of the young commander and the veteran German, the contrast will certainly appear more striking in favour of the latter.

raged in other parts with increasing fury. The armies of Austria were placed under the direction of the Archduke Charles, the Emperor's BOOK II. brother, a popular and gallant prince. The command of the army of the Sambre and Meuse was given by the Directory to Jourdan, instead of Pichegru, though the former was reckoned the worst general that the republic of France produced; having been always beaten, except at Maubeuge, where his numbers, not his talents, procured him the victory.

CHAP. VII.

On the 23d of May, the Austrian commander-in-chief informed General Jourdan that the armistice was to cease, and that hostilities would commence on the last day of that month. General Jourdan accordingly marched with the army of the Sambre and Meuse, when General Marceau repulsed the Austrians on the right bank of the Nahe, and the French general Championnet was equally successful at Nidder Diebach. General Kleber, on the same day, marched towards the Sieg, and on the 1st of June obtained a victory over the Austrians, who lost 2400 men, including wounded and prisoners.

On the 16th, the archduke pursued Lefebvre; and General Kray, with thirty-two squadrons of light horse, and ten battalions of infantry, a corps of riflemen, and a number of artillery horse, marched towards Cologne and Dusseldorf. Gen. Kleber was defeated, but passed the Sieg in the night, and continued his route to Dusseldorf, while Jourdan crossed at Neuwied with the rest of his army, the archduke having given him but little trouble during his retreat.

Marshal Wurmser, who was stationed between Frankendal and the Rehut, his front protected by a canal, and his left wing by the Rebach, was attacked by General Moreau, the leader of the army of the Rhine and the Moselle. The French passed the fortifications, with the water up to their chins, in defiance of a tremendous fire of musketry and cannon. They engaged the Austrians with impetuosity, took their front works, and made bridges for the passage of their cavalry; the Austrians were defeated, and obliged to take shelter under the cannon of Manheim. The most part of the Austrian forces having gone towards the Lower Rhine, to pursue General Jourdan, orders were sent by the Directory to General Moreau to cross the river. Such was the gallantry of the Archduke Charles, that Jourdan retreated with great difficulty, having suffered a defeat at the Lahn. Hereupon the French resumed the positions they before occupied. General Moreau, pretending preparations for an attack of a serious nature, drew off his troops with the greatest privacy, and arrived at Strasburgh by forced marches; and although the waters of the Rhine were raised to an uncommon height, in consequence of an inundation, he accomplished the passage of the river, June 24, and reduced the fortress of Kehl by a sudden assault, which was situated on the opposite bank. The French carried all the works in the islands of the Rhine with the bayonet, and with such rapidity, that the Austrians could not destroy the bridges which kept up their communication with their different divisions, and they fell into the hands of the French.

The French army was at first put in motion with the view of besieging Mentz, but another plan was suddenly projected by Carnot: and, in pursuance of his romantic scheme, a powerful army was to penetrate into the circle of Suabia, seize on the country adjoining the lake of Constance, march through the passes of Bregentz, and, after scaling the Rhetian Alps, enter the Tyrole.

General Laroche made himself master of the mountain of Knubis, said to be the highest of the groupe called the Black Mountains, taking two standards, two pieces of cannon, and 400 prisoners. Next day Freiburg was carried by General St. Cyr with the bayonet. The march of the republican left wing was always interrupted by conflicts with the enemy; but at Ost, the Imperial general La Tour made a vigorous opposition, though without effect. On the same day, Bibrach, in the valley of Kintzig, was taken possession of by General Ferinot. Possessed of Freiburg, Gen. Moreau could act against the left wing of the archduke's army, and cut off his communication with the Prince of Condé. It also laid open to him the territory of the Duke of Wirtemberg, and the roads which led to the Austrian magazines at Villengen and Rothwiel.

On the arrival of his artillery, General Moreau attacked and carried the camp of Wilstedt. On June 28, an action took place at the village of Renchen, when the republican army succeeded, having taken a number of prisoners and a quantity of light artillery.

General Desaix had orders to engage the Austrians at Rastadt on the 4th of July. To oblige them to abandon Rastadt by turning their left, General Lecourbe attacked them between Olbach and the mountains, while General Decaen was ordered to seize, if possible, on the bridge of Kuppenheim, and dislodge them from the mountains; and, after an obstinate conflict of three hours, the republicans forced them to abandon Kuppenheim. The left side of the river was still possessed by the Austrians near Olbach; the passage was forced by the French infantry, who also attacked the wood of Nidderbichel, and after a contest of three hours, they were successful, while another demi-brigade of infantry took possession of the woods near Ottersdorff. Both wings of the Austrian army being nearly surrounded, were under the necessity of seeking shelter by repassing the Murg. The French made 1300 prisoners, but their own loss was perhaps more considerable, as the Austrians, from their position, must have acted with greater advantage.

As General Wurmser, the gallant and veteran commander in this quarter, found himself far from adequate to the task of resisting such dreadful impetuosity, he instantly applied to the archduke for assistance, who, deeply sensible of the importance of giving the French a timely check in the Brisgaw, marched to his aid in person, with a large body of troops; but, before he could reach the place, the Austrians had been vanquished in different actions, and the French had forced the passes of the Black Forest in various parts. A junction being at length effected between the archduke and Wurmser, the Austrians took a most advantageous position near Ettlingen, waiting for the attack of the French. Here a sanguinary battle was fought on the 9th of July, in which the hostile armies exhibited the most desperate valor. The French began a bombardment, when many parts of the city being suddenly in flames, the garrison agreed to surrender, and the republicans, on the next morning, entered in triumph.

The Archduke Charles was eagerly pursued by the republicans, and upon learning that the French meant to cut off his communication with General Frolich and the Prince of Condé, who were marching to Stutgard, the archduke deemed it expedient to retire to Vahingen. Moreau posted some troops at Bruchsal, to watch the motions of the enemy in Philipsburg and Mannheim. General St. Cyr, after an obstinate conflict, drove the Austrians from Stutgard. His next object was to make them abandon their posts in the rear of that town; the attack commenced at four in the afternoon with uncommon severity, against General Baillet and Prince John of Lichtenstein. The former defended himself most gallantly till evening, when, as by the republicans occupying the ground on the right flank of the Prince of Lichtenstein, the fire of their musketry crossed in their ranks, orders were sent to General Devay, then on his march, to come forward with the utmost dispatch. He arrived when the troops under the command of the Prince of Lichtenstein were in danger of being totally destroyed, and compelled the republicans to retire. The prince gallantly effected the passage of the Neckar on the 19th of July, and encamped his troops at Felbach, that he might keep up a communication with Ulm, without experiencing any important opposition.

The Archduke Charles, with a considerable part of his army, marched from Nordlingen, crossing the Eger, to guard the roads to Donawert. The republicans compelled General Hotze to abandon his position, on the 8th of August; but the attempts against General Riese were defeated. The Prince of Condé had retired to Mannheim, where his royal highness was informed of the critical situation of Wartensleben, who durst not hazard an engagement with General Jourdan, to which the republican commander wished, if possible, to force him. General Moreau arrived on the 9th, and next day came to an engagement with the left wing of the army of General Hotze, which they fought with the utmost fury, obliging his advanced posts to give way. On the 11th the Archduke made preparations for a general attack on the republicans; his principal army was in three columns or divisions, the centre being commanded by the Prince of Furstenberg, the right wing by General Hotze, and the left by General La Tour. The centre and left were to engage the same divisions of the republican army, while the division under General Riese repulsed them in the vicinity of Laningen, continuing its route with a view to reach the rear of Moreau's station. It was settled that a strong advanced guard should manoeuvre on the left wing of the French army, to compel them to abandon the heights of Umenheim. The battle took place on the 10th, at seven in the morning, when the Austrian army repulsed the advanced guard of the republicans; but the division which proceeded to Umenheim was under the necessity of retiring. By this the right flank of General Hotze being exposed, he was obliged to fall back to Forcheim; but the Prince of Furstenberg and General La Tour were enabled to maintain the advantages they had acquired. The conflict was most desperate, and continued seventeen hours; but when the Archduke was strengthening his right wing to bring it again into action, he received intelligence that Wartensleben was obliged to retreat towards Amberg, and that a division of General Jourdan's army had reached Nurnberg, with the intention of uniting its strength with the forces under General Moreau; this made the archduke conclude, that if he should be finally defeated the consequences might be alarming. He therefore reluctantly determined to decline an attack, although General Riese had proceeded successfully to Haydenheim, by obliging the French etat-major-general to retreat to Konigsbron, and got possession of four leagues of country in the rear of the French army. At the approach of day the Austrians began their retreat towards Donawert.

August 13, the archduke arrived at Donawert; and having passed the Danube, he encamped his army at Rain, behind the Acha, eight miles east-south-east of Donawert.

The French general brought his troops to Dillingen and Laningen, to pass the Danube, as the Austrians had made it impracticable to cross at any other place. Meanwhile General Ferinot took the route to Bregantz, where he seized a number of mortars, one howitzer, twenty-two pieces of cannon, forty large barges, and 40,000 sacks of oats, flour, and barley. By these wonderful movements the republicans established a communication between the armies of the Sambre BOOK II. and Meuse, the Rhine and Moselle, and the army of Italy under General Bonaparte.

CHAP. VII.

The archduke determined to march to the relief of Wartensleben, whom Jourdan had pursued almost to Ratisbon; Wartensleben, however, retreated towards Wurtzburg. On the 24th the garrison of Koenigstein surrendered by capitulation, and the French obtained an immense quantity of military stores.

The Duke of Wirtemberg and the Margrave of Baden, being deprived of their territories, dispatched ambassadors to the executive directory of France, to treat for peace, which was readily granted, on condition of their abandoning all alliances, offensive and defensive, against the republic, ceding to France whatever territories they possessed on the left side of the Rhine. The French also concluded a new treaty of friendship and alliance with his Prussian majesty, who rejoiced to behold the humiliation of the house of Austria, and whose attention was wholly engrossed with the way in which he might best convert the passing events of the war to his own advantage.

The people of Germany at first looked with a favorable eye on the French revolution, admiring the principles on which it was originally founded; but as the republican troops advanced into the empire, they began to perceive that there is no inseparable connection between principles and practice. So exorbitant were the contributions levied by the republican generals, in the principalities of Germany, for the support of their troops, that the people even lamented the loss of the milder tyranny of their own petty despots.

The army of the Rhine and Moselle took possession of Ulm and Donawert, and on the 24th of August reached the banks of the Lech, an extensive river which empties itself into the Danube, and by which the circles of Suabia and Bavaria are divided. Its passage was gallantly disputed by a large party of Austrians posted near Augsburg; but fortune still declared in favor of the French, and General Moreau having entered Bavaria in triumph, made himself master of Munich on the 27th.

The archduke having abandoned Donawert, occupied a strong position behind the Lech, where it joins the Danube, but having information that a division of the republicans under General Bernadotte was marching towards Ratisbon, while Jourdan's army was directly in front of Wartensleben's, his royal highness marched troops along the right bank of the Danube, leaving General La Tour to watch General Moreau, as he himself meant to pass the river at Ingolstadt, to act against Jourdan, while General Wartensleben was to engage him in front. He passed the Danube on the 17th of August, both at Neuburg and Ingolstadt, in which last fortress he placed a very strong garrison, not merely to protect his own rear, but also to annoy the left flank of General Moreau, should he put in execution his intention of marching to Ratisbon and Landshut.

Lefebvre, having been ordered by General Jourdan to engage the right flank of the Austrians encamped at Sultzbach, where a large body of troops, with a powerful train of artillery, had been stationed by General Wartensleben, succeeded in forcing the Austrians to abandon the heights, after a gallant resistance. The republican centre was charged with the attack on the enemy's front before Sultzbach; and General Ney, to facilitate this object, marched with the vanguard from Herspruck towards Sultzbach, by the only road that was practicable for the conveyance of artillery. The distance was twenty-two miles, the whole road being flanked by lofty mountains, which enabled the Imperialists to do incredible mischief to the republicans. General Ney gave orders to attack the woods with the bayonet, while his right wing, to deceive the Austrians as to the ultimate point of attack, was ordered to ascend the hill. The Imperialists, under General Hohenlohe, began a heavy fire from the woods, but the French troops entering it, the Austrians, unable to resist, left them the possession of it. General Jourdan, changing his position, ordered General Colaud's division to support his vanguard, which, with the generals Ney and Grenier, enabled the right wing of the republican army to turn the left of the Austrians, and made them retreat to Sultzbach, their strongest, though only remaining position. It was wholly inaccessible in front, and the skirts of it were defended by artillery and infantry. A small plain on the left of the rock, being encircled with woods, the position of the republicans prevented their reaching it, except through a narrow defile. As it did not strike the Austrians that their left was in danger, they neglected to take possession of a hamlet, environed with trees and hedges, as well as of that part of the wood beyond the plain. General Jourdan, therefore, ordered General Ney to occupy the hamlet with light infantry, and Grenier was to get possession of the wood at the head of a brigade. The Austrians, on being made acquainted with these manœuvres, endeavored to recover the wood, but General Grenier compelled them to fall back towards the rock. The plain being held by the republicans, they commenced a heavy cannonading against the enemy. The heights on the left were at length reached by General Lefebvre, where the enemy fought with the most determined bravery. The troops by which the place was defended retreated in the night, which prevented Lefebvre from pursuing them; but as he was now master of the heights, the forces could encamp on the field of battle.

The generals Championnet and Bonneau pressed on to Amberg, to check the progress of the Austrian troops stationed in that quarter, and came up with the enemy on the heights of Poperg. They were directly attacked, and forced to retreat to Amberg, after an obstinate engagement of twelve hours. General Wartensleben changed his head-quarters in the night towards Schwartzfeld, behind the Nab; and on the next day, the division under General Grenier marched to Amberg, and made the Austrians recross the Wils, one of the feeders of the Nab.

In the evening of August 18, the archduke was informed of General Wartensleben's being forced to abandon Amberg, and retreat across the Nab. Two days after he reached Hemmau, with his right column, which gave him the command of the road to Ratisbon, and allowed him to annoy the right flank of General Jourdan's army, which had marched towards the Nab. On the 22d, the archduke's advanced guard engaged the French under General Bernadotte, who had taken a position near the village of Teming. The republican forces were obliged by the Austrian general, Nauendorff, to retreat to Neumark, from which place he was driven the next day by the archduke; he retreated to Nurnberg, which left the right flank and the rear of General Jourdan's army totally exposed; and the military talents of Prince Charles enabled him to profit by the valor of his troops. Accordingly, he and General Wartensleben pressed upon General Jourdan on the 24th; the latter moving against the front, and the former against the flank of his army; which must have been followed by a decisive battle, had not the republican commander-in-chief been induced to retreat. General Bernadotte evacuated Nurnberg, and, in great haste, marched on towards Forchheim, while the Austrians at Lauff made it impossible for Jourdan to carry that passage. General Kleber retreated towards Pegnitz, where he received the orders of General Jourdan to march directly for Pondenstein, where he arrived at midnight. The archduke having dispatched Nauendorff by the way of Ratisbon, to co-operate with General La Tour, to threaten the left flank of Moreau, continued his pursuit of the French commander-in-chief. By the skilful movements of the archduke, Jourdan, on the 29th, found it necessary to retreat to Bamberg, where he took possession of both sides of the Rednitz. He was pursued by the archduke, but his retreat was well covered.

General Moreau sought to gain intelligence of the movements of the Austrians along the Danube; but it does not appear that he was acquainted with the sad reverses experienced by General Jourdan. General Desaix had orders to attack the enemy at Ingolstadt, on the 1st of September, and oblige them to destroy the bridge; the republicans were attacked by the enemy at day-break, when General La Tour was reinforced by detachments from the prince under General Nauendorff, who, on his march, defeated the French, and forced them to take shelter in a wood. This was followed by a desperate battle, when the republicans were enabled to repulse General La Tour with great loss.

General Jourdan arrived at Schweinfurth, whither he had retreated by forced marches. Prince Charles reached Bamberg on the 31st of August, crossed the Maine on the 2d and 3d of September, and soon got possession of Wurtzburg, to which place General Jourdan used every exertion to arrive before the Austrians, and was only three leagues from it on the day it was taken possession of by General Hotze. Jourdan made a dreadful attack on the advanced guard of Gen. Hotze; but, instead of making any impression on their line, he was obliged to flee with precipitation towards Dusseldorf, with a scanty remnant of his army.

General Wartensleben was to pass the bridge at Dettolbach, and engage Jourdan's centre, while General Kray was charged with turning his left wing. The attack was begun by the troops under General Stzarray, but the republicans made him fall back, and deprived him of his first position. Wartensleben crossed the river with his cavalry, and came to action with the left wing of the French. Jourdan weakened his right wing, in order to strengthen his left, and thus enabled Stzarray to resume his former station. The left of Jourdan's army was repulsed by the Austrian cavalry, and obliged to take refuge behind the wood; his left wing was impetuously attacked by numbers superior to his own, and Jourdan again commenced a retreat, and again experienced misfortunes.

The retreat was committed to the youthful and gallant General Marceau, to be covered from the enemy, till the republicans were able to evacuate the defiles of Altenkirchen. While French chasseurs in a wood were firing upon Austrian hussars, Marceau arrived to reconnoitre the ground, with an officer and some artillery. A Tyrolean chasseur recognised his rank, and discharged a carbine at him, the contents of which passed through his body. The general descended from his horse, was taken to Altenkirchen, and carried through the columns by the grenadiers.

On the next day, September 4, Altenkirchen was occupied by the enemy's advanced guard; and when the Austrian general, Haddick, was told of the circumstance, he sent the wounded French general a guard of safety, accompanied by General Kray. Hopes of saving General Marceau were still kept up, and Prince Charles's principal surgeon exerted himself to the utmost in vain. In the morning the symptoms were more dangerous; the general was seized with a heaviness in his head, and expired about six o'clock. The Austrian regiments of Barco and Blankenstein, who knew him on the field of battle, disputed the honor of paying him the last offices; but they were prevented, as the French officers attending him prevailed upon Prince Charles to allow his remains to be given to his brethren in arms. The prince requested, that the Austrians might be acquainted with the moment of his interment, to join with the French in performing the last military honors; his body was interred in the fortified camp at Coblenz, under the discharge of the artillery of both armies.

The French having re-crossed the Rhine at three different places, the archduke detached a force towards Ukareth and the Sieg, taking the route towards the Maine, with the remainder of his forces, which river he crossed on the 28th of August, to commence hostilities against General Moreau, leaving a sufficient force between Mayence and Francfort. After the retreat of Jourdan, Moreau could not possibly penetrate farther into Bavaria, nor remain for any time in the places he then occupied; and Prince Charles could send larger reinforcements to General La Tour, in proportion as Jourdan retired from the Danube and the Maine. The hostile armies engaged on the 7th of September, near Mainburg; the Austrians were defeated by the centre of the republican army, and 500 of them taken prisoners. On the 11th, General Moreau commenced a retreat; he crossed the Lech, and gave orders to cut down all the bridges behind him; he then ascended along the banks of the Danube, and stationed his head-quarters at Ulm. Finding himself closely pursued by the Austrians, he united his forces in one body, and fell upon them with such fury, that he forced them to retire, and fall back by degrees towards the Rhine. A detachment from the Archduke, strengthened by troops from Mannheim and Philipsburg, attacked General Scherer on the 13th, who was stationed at Bruchsal, and obliged him to retreat to Kehl. Here the republicans were again attacked by all the forces the enemy could collect, who succeeded in getting as far as the head of the bridge over the Rhine, where they were checked by the batteries of that place, and were thrown into the utmost confusion. The works of importance remained with the republicans, who drove the Austrians from the town of Kehl by a tremendous fire. The national guards of Strasburg were ordered by General Moreau to secure Kehl, with the bridge and the forts on the isles of the Rhine, as of the utmost importance in his retreat.

October 1, General Moreau attacked General La Tour in his camp between Biberach and Buchau, and, after a long and sanguinary action, not only forced him to retire in confusion, but would probably have destroyed his army, had it not been for the emigrants, under Prince de Condé, who gallantly covered the retreat of the Austrians, and saved their baggage.

The Archduke Charles directed his march along the right bank of the Rhine, in order to cut off the retreat of General Moreau, and arrived at Radstadt on the 5th of October. To annoy the republican army in its retreat, a body of Austrians were stationed between the Necker and the Danube, as well as to cover all the passes of the Black Forest and mountains. General Moreau took the route of Stockach with the principal part of his army. All the defiles in his flank and rear were occupied by the Austrians, while the rapid movements of the archduke evinced a determination to destroy the bridges on the Rhine, prior to his arrival there.

It now remained for the republican army to force the passage of the Black Forest. The centre of the French army made a violent attack on the Austrians, stationed in the Val d'Enfer, a most terrific defile, narrowed by lofty mountains for several leagues, no more, in some places, than ten fathoms wide. The right and left wings soon cleared the defile, without any loss, and reached Fribourg on the 12th of October, taking possession of Waldkirch on the ensuing day, and ranging themselves along the heights on the right bank of the Eltz, while the convoys and baggage, under the protection of the right wing, passed by the way of the Forest towns. On finding that it was not practicable to prevent the retreat of General Moreau, La Tour proceeded to join Prince Charles near Hornberg, and the Prince de Condé and General Frolich pursued the French, while retreating through the Black Forest and mountains. The archduke, having united his forces, gave battle to the left wing and centre of the republican army. Wartensleben, with the centre division, was to force the heights behind Martinsell; and General Petrasch, with the left wing, was ordered to march to Emdingen. La Tour, who commanded the right, had a terrible opposition, being repeatedly repulsed in his attempts on Kendringen; till the archduke, with the grenadiers, made himself master of the village, October 18. Upon this occasion, General Wartensleben was dangerously wounded in the arm, while bringing the centre into action.

On the 19th the Austrians attacked Nymbourg, but without any important effect. The next day, General Moreau abandoned the Brigaw, and retired towards Huningen, where a large bridge was established. His position was formidable; his right wing touching the Rhine, his left at Kandern, and his centre division at Schliengen, where he meant to remain for some time, if the Austrians did not make him alter his resolution. The Imperial army moved, on the 23d, in four columns: those commanded by the Prince de Condé and the Prince of Furstenberg were to manoeuvre so as to prevent the republicans from sending troops from their left; the others, under La Tour and Nauendorff, were to attack the left wing, and endeavor to turn their flank. After an obstinate conflict, October 24, which lasted till night, the French retreated to Altingen, and passed the Rhine at Huningen, on the 26th, without any opposition. Thus General Moreau returned to Strasburg, the point whence he had set out, having effected a wonderful retreat.

In the Black Forest, the mountains rise in a bold manner, and so narrow was the defile through which Moreau had to force his way, that 50 men could scarcely march abreast. He succeeded, however, in repelling the constant attacks of a superior enemy, through a hostile country 300 miles in extent; and, when we consider that he turned upon his pursuers, defeated them in several engagements, and took many prisoners, cannon, &c. without sustaining any great loss, it is no wonder that this famous retreat became the ground of jealousy and envy to the other French generals, and particularly to Bonaparte.

General Jourdan being induced to resign the command, it was given to General Bournonville, commander-in-chief of the northern army.

The Austrians made many spirited efforts to gain possession of Kehl, and the bridge of Huningen, but were still repulsed; the archduke durst not leave the Brisgaw exposed to General Moreau, and the conquest of Kehl was of the greatest importance to secure his troops while in winter-quarters.

General Desaix, who was appointed governor of Fort Kehl, made a sally at the head of a body of troops, November 22, with a view of retarding the operations of the enemy, and obtained possession of the village of Suntheim, as well as of two redoubts in its neighbourhood; but he was at length repulsed by the archduke, and obliged to retire, having received a wound in the head. The archduke resolved on a regular siege; and, opening his trenches on the 25th of November, he commenced a cannonading, which lasted fifteen days without intermission. A second attack was made upon it, December 11, when its defence became doubly dangerous and difficult, the intercourse with Strasburg being cut off by breaking down the bridge, and rendering their boats totally useless. After finishing their second parallel, the Austrians attacked and carried the republican camp, and the battery which defended it. The French were again rallied by General Lacombe; and, that they might fight with determined valor, he destroyed the bridges to prevent their return. This had the desired effect, and hereupon the Austrians were defeated with some loss.

The artillery of the Austrians, however, was too dreadful for the republicans to withstand; they had no communication with the opposite bank, and no hope of any relief. General Desaix proposed a capitulation to the archduke, and he signed it, allowing the French twenty-four hours to carry off their artillery and stores.

After the evacuation of Fort Kehl, the republicans only possessed one post on the right bank of the Rhine; this consisted of the French position at Come, intended to cover the bridge of Huningen, which had been for some time masked by thirteen battalions and two squadrons under the Prince of Furstenburg. Being attacked suddenly, at ten o'clock at night, by the left wing of the Austrian army, which advanced in three columns, they forced the barriers of a half-moon, and entered by escalade; the French retired into the horn-work, where they were threatened with an assault. On this, General Abbattucci, placing himself at the head of a body of troops, sallied forth on the Imperialists, who were trying to make a lodgment, and forced them to retreat; but, having received a fatal wound, of which he died a few days after, General Sisce, who succeeded to the command, held out for a considerable time, but was at length obliged to surrender the post, having been allowed two days to withdraw the garrison and stores.

The long defence maintained by the garrison of Kehl diverted the attention of the Archduke Charles from the affairs of Italy, where he intended to follow Wurmser, to stop the career of Bonaparte. This gallant prince, however, by a laudable union of talents and courage, liberated Germany from the yoke of France; by which an excellent opportunity was afforded of sending succours to Italy.

BOOK II. IN the course of this year the trade of Great Britain received considerable injury from the successes of Bonaparte, notwithstanding the superior strength and admirable disposition of her navy. Although the Toulon fleet did not dare to put to sea, for fear of encountering the English, then cruising in the neighbourhood of Genoa, Admiral Richery found means to slip out with the following small squadron:

	Guns.		Guns.
La Victoire	80	Warwick	74
Jupiter	74	Duquesne	74
Barras	74	La Révolution	74

And the three following frigates: La Felicité, L'Embuscade, and La Friponne. After having captured several prizes in the Straits, he retired to Cadiz, where he remained some months blockaded up by a few ships under the command of Admiral Mann.

Genoa, no longer able to preserve even the appearance of neutrality, was obliged to shut her ports against the enemies of France; while, in Leghorn, the property appertaining to the coalesced powers was seized upon by the consul of that nation. Fortunately, however, all the vessels and most of the merchandise appertaining to Great Britain were removed; the former consisting of twenty-three sail of square-rigged vessels and fourteen Tartans, which were carried out to sea by Captain Freemantle, of the Inconstant. As the governor was supposed to have favoured the occasion, he was immediately arrested, and sent to Florence.

Hereupon it was determined, by the Viceroy of Corsica, to seize on some commodious station on the coast of Tuscany, as an arsenal for the English fleet; and the island of Elba being deemed proper for this purpose, a small squadron accordingly sailed from Bastia, with a body of troops, under Major Duncan, July 10. Commodore Nelson having joined the convoy, a landing was effected; and the Captain, of 74 guns, placed within half-pistol shot of the grand bastion. On this, the governor consented to a capitulation; and the town of Porto Ferrajo, with 100 pieces of cannon, was immediately surrendered.

On the 20th of October, however, the British evacuated the island of Corsica. The people of this island seemed to submit with satisfaction to the dominion of his Britannic Majesty, while Jacobinical rage was at its height in France; but as soon as a regular government was established in that country, they appeared to be extremely anxious to be re-united to that republic, and abandon their new allegiance. Sir Gilbert Elliot perceiving, during a tour into the interior of the island, which he accomplished not without personal danger, that an universal fermentation prevailed, and the Corsicans were assembled in great force, after being joined by a body of French troops under General Gentili, the viceroy intimated his determination to withdraw his troops. This was not accomplished, however, at Bastia and St. Fiorenzo without some bloodshed; and several of the magazines fell into the hands of the enemy. The people of Corsica, being formed into primary assemblies, sent a deputation to the commissioners of the French republic in Italy, solemnly to renounce the title of subjects of the King of Great Britain, and renew their oaths of fidelity and constancy to the French republic.

An armament had been long preparing in Brest harbour, designed to cover a descent upon Ireland, which at that time was in a very distracted situation; but, owing to certain unavoidable causes of delay, it was not ready to put to sea till the 10th of December. It consisted of eighteen sail of the line and thirteen frigates, commanded by Vice-admiral Bouvet, having a fleet of transports under convoy with 25,000 men, at the head of whom was the celebrated General Hoche. It having been given out that the squadron was intended against Portugal, and manifestoes actually procured, drawn up in that language, for the purpose of concealing the object of its destination, Hoche employed a native of Ireland (M. Shee) to compose and print proclamations; in which he endeavoured to seduce his countrymen by fallacious promises; but the principal dependance of

during the course of the summer and autumn of the preceding year; but a considerable interval elapsed before it reached its place of destination. At length, in 1796, the fleet arrived at the island of Barbadoes; and soon after, Lieutenant-general R. Abercromby determined to commence operations. On application to the admiral on that station, a naval force was procured, for an expedition against the Dutch settlements. This consisted of the Malabar, La Pique, and Babet frigates, under Capt. Parr; on board of which, the Grenada transport, and some smaller vessels, Major-general Whyte embarked, with the 39th, 93d, and 99th regiments, accompanied by a detachment of artillery. On the 15th of April, after a passage of seven days, this small squadron having arrived on the coasts of Demerary and Essequibo, Governor Beaujon and the council were summoned to surrender the colony. A capitulation was immediately agreed to, April 22, and the British troops took possession of Fort William Frederick. Major-general Whyte having left Lieutenant-colonel Hislop, and a small garrison behind, proceeded to the little colony of Berbice, which also surrendered May 2.

At the very time when Demerary and Essequibo were surrendered to Great Britain, the troops destined for the attack of St. Lucia sailed from Carlisle Bay, and anchored next morning at Martinico, under protection of a squadron commanded by Admiral Sir John Laforey. That officer having resigned his command to Rear-admiral Sir Hugh Christian, the expedition sailed for the place of its destination; and Major-general Campbell, with a body of 1700 men, effected a landing at Longueville's Bay, with very little opposition, consisting chiefly of a few shot from Pigeon Island, which was kept in check by a detachment of men of war. On the 26th of April they advanced to Choc Bay, and the centre division of the army disembarked near the village of Choc; upon which, about 500 of the enemy, stationed at Angier's plantation, retired to Morne Chabot, one of the strong out-posts in the neighbourhood of Morne Fortune.

As it seemed absolutely necessary to occupy Morne Chabot before Morne Fortune was invested, the brigadier-generals, Moore and Hope, were detached that very evening to attack it on two opposite sides. The troops, consisting of seven companies of the 53d regiment, commanded by Lieutenant-colonel Abercromby, 100 of Malcolm's, and 50 of Lewinstein's rangers, under General Moore, took a circuitous road; while General Hope, with 350 men of the 57th, 150 of Malcolm's, and 50 of Lewenstein's, marched by a nearer route. The complete success of the expedition depended greatly on their arrival at the same time; but, in consequence of some miscalculation, arising from the false information of the guides, General Moore's division fell in with the enemy's advanced picquet an hour and a half sooner than was expected. The general, finding he was discovered, resolved to risk an immediate attack, without waiting the approach of the other column; and, notwithstanding the strength of the post and the paucity of the assailants, such was the gallant conduct of the troops, that the place was soon carried.

On the following day, General Moore occupied Morne Duchassaux, in the rear of Morne Fortune. A body of 300 seamen was also landed, under Captain Lane, of the Astrée, and Captain Ryves, of the Bull-dog; while Major-general Morshead, after obtaining possession of the bar of the Grand Cul de Sac, assumed an appropriate position on the south side.

In conformity to the original plan for the investment of Morne Fortune, the commander-in-chief, being determined to drive the enemy from their batteries on the base of the mountain, on the side of the Grand Cul de Sac, in order to open the bay to the ships of war, a movement for that purpose was instantly made. Accordingly, on the 3d of May, Brigadier-general Hope carried the battery called Seche, within a short distance of the principal works. The loss on this occasion was by no means proportionate to the importance of the service, had it not been for the death of Lieutenant-colonel Malcolm, who unfortunately received a mortal wound, after the success was complete.

In the mean time, Colonel Riddle, with a column acting on the left, seized on, and for some time retained possession of the lower battery, called Chapuis; but another column, under an officer who commanded during the absence of Major-general Morshead, having omitted to cross the river at Cools, the two successful divisions were obliged to retire to their former position, while the ships of war, the Madras, Pelican, and Victorieuse, destined to enter the harbour, returned to their anchorage. Captains Wolley and Dilkes landed soon after, with a detachment of seamen, to assist in establishing batteries on the southern side of the Grand Cul de Sac; and the latter, with great labor and perseverance, succeeded in placing two 18-pounders and two carronades on the pinnacle of the hill.

In consequence of the difficulty of access to the Morne, the commander-in-chief was obliged to employ several bodies of soldiers and sailors, to form a road capable of admitting the transport of artillery from Choc Bay. Three hundred and twenty marines were sent ashore, whose conduct during this siege was truly gallant. On the 16th of May, batteries of 18-pounders were opened, and a second and third parallel completed; but a night attack on Vigie proved unsuccessful. A lodgment, however, was soon after made by the BOOK II. 27th regiment within 500 yards of the fort, and a sally from the works was, at the same time, repulsed by Brigadier-general Moore.

In the course of that evening, the enemy sent out a flag; and a suspension of arms being obtained, a capitulation followed, for the island of St. Lucia and its dependencies. Accordingly, May 25, the troops, consisting of about 2000 men, were made prisoners of war, the negroes disarmed, and the whole settlement put under the protection of Great Britain.

Efficacious measures were now adopted for the security of such of the English colonies as had been invaded by the enemy. As Dominica, by the gallantry of its own militia, had defeated the French, and subdued the rebellion of such of the planters of that nation as declared in their favor, preparations were made to suppress the spirit of revolt in other islands where it had proved more successful. For this purpose two separate expeditions were concerted, and, at the same time, prepared by General Abercromby and Major-general Nicolls. That destined for St. Vincent's having sailed for Kingston Bay, June 3, and disembarked on the 7th, the troops marched in one body as far as Stubbs; all the divisions being ordered to halt in the evening opposite to their respective points of attack. Next morning the enemy's flank was turned, and two 12 and two 6-pounders, with a couple of howitzers, were advanced within 600 yards of their works. Major-general Morshead proposed to carry the redoubt by assault, but the offer was declined, until Major-general Hunter's division, and some other troops on the right, availing themselves of the profile of the hill, had effected a lodgment within a short distance of the fort. The attack soon after commenced, and the enemy retiring in succession from their first, second, and third redoubts, rallied around the New Vigie, which was their principal post. Hereupon the Charibbs, and about 200 natives, who had joined the insurgents, made their escape into the woods; but Brigadier-general Knox and Lieutenant-colonel Dickens having soon after cut off all communication with the country, the French, to the amount of 700, were obliged to surrender on the 11th of June.

Equal success attended the expedition against Grenada. A body of troops disembarked at Palmiste, near Goyave, where the enemy had their principal posts; while Brigadier-general Campbell advanced in an opposite direction, from the windward side of the island, to attack the enemy's rear. Immediate preparations were made for the assault of two strong positions on Morne Quaquo and Foret Noire, or Aches Camp; while a small detachment of three companies of the colonial black troops, and the grenadiers of the 38th regiment, proceeded against a fortified station at the head of Beauséjour valley, June 19. By these spirited and judicious movements, the troops, nearly at the same time, obtained possession of every post occupied by the enemy in the island. Captain Jossey, who commanded the French troops, surrendered June 20; but Fedon and his followers, after having seized on about thirty whites, whom they cruelly butchered, made their escape into the woods.

In the mean time the war was carried on with various success in the island of St. Domingo, the command of which had devolved upon Lieutenant-general Williamson. That officer, on account of the extension of the British posts, was obliged to recur to a dangerous plan, by the establishment of negro battalions commanded by French royalists, and the introduction of foreign troops, such as the British legion and the Rohan and York hussars. Bodies of colonial cavalry were levied at the same time, and horses were imported from America, to remount the 14th, 18th, and 21st regiments. His successor, Major-general Forbes, found himself under the necessity of taking about 900 inhabitants of the Spanish part of St. Domingo into British pay.

A body of about 7000 men, which had arrived at the Mole in the spring, under the command of Brigadier-general Howe, after a long and disastrous passage, became a prey to the diseases of the climate; add to which, the negroes and men of color, after obtaining their freedom and franchises from the whites, acted in concert with the enemy; who, on the failure of an attempt by the English to obtain possession of Léogane, entertained the design of straitening, if not closely investing, the town of Port-au-Prince, by means of an insulated mountain in the neighbourhood of the English post of Morne Grenier, and also of opening a communication through the Cul de Sac to the north side of the island. Major-general Forbes, however, forced the garrison of Bombarde to surrender, June 8; and the mulatto general, Rigaud, was nearly at the same time obliged to raise the siege of Irois.

the commander-in-chief was on the society of United Irishmen, then formed, and who were professed admirers of French republicanism.

The season of the year rendered this expedition extremely hazardous, and it was attended with nothing but misfortunes. Some ships of war were either lost or materially damaged on its first departure; and, by means of a heavy gale, the commander-in-chief was separated from the body of the fleet, which anchored in Bantry-Bay in a very shattered condition. Waiting for some days to no purpose for the arrival of General Hoche, the only person who was in possession of the orders of government, Admiral Bouvet resolved to return to Brest, which he accomplished with difficulty, as a ship of the line and two frigates foundered at sea. The British captured one frigate, and a ship of the line was driven on the coast. The only consolation left to the French was, that their schemes were not defeated by the naval force of Britain, but by the dreadful fury of storms and tempests. Thus the daring project of invading Ireland was happily frustrated; and such appeared to be the steady patriotism of all ranks at this period, that, had the enemy effected a landing, they would have been gallantly resisted by the yeomanry, the volunteer corps, and even the peasantry.

By the indefatigable exertions of the British cruisers, the remaining commerce of France was exceedingly harrassed and diminished during this year. Sir John Borlase Warren, with only four frigates, the Pomona, Artois, Galatea, and Anson, gallantly attacked a squadron of seven sail of French vessels, consisting of one of forty-four guns, two of forty, one of thirty-two, and one of thirty, with two armed vessels. This took place not far from the Saintes; and, after dispersing their convoy, the English captured the Etoile of thirty guns.

In the Mediterranean, Captain Nelson, on board the Agamemnon, accompanied by the Meleager, Diadem, and Peterell, performed, on the 25th of April, a brilliant exploit at Loana, having boarded and cut out four French store-ships, by means of the boats of his squadron, under the fire of the batteries, and amidst an incessant discharge of musketry. This gallant officer also took possession, in the same manner, on the 31st of May, of several vessels laden with cotton and ordnance stores, destined for the siege of Mantua, in the neighbourhood of Oneglia, undauntedly boarding the enemy, amidst the fire of three 18-pounders stationed on shore, and a fourth mounted in a gun-boat. The same indefatigable commander, assisted by Captain Craufurd in the Blanche, soon after fought two stout Spanish frigates, captured the Sabina of forty guns, and would have carried both her and her consort into port, had they not been prevented by a superior squadron of the enemy.

On the 13th of October, Admiral Duncan blockaded the Texel, to prevent the sailing of the Dutch fleet, and captured a frigate and a sloop of war belonging to that nation. Captain Williams of the Unicorn, of thirty-two guns, and Captain Martin of the Santa Margarita, a ship of equal force, pursued and took two heavy frigates of forty and thirty-six guns; and also obtained possession of the Porcupine, of thirty, twenty-six of which were 18 pounders, after a chase of eight hours, and a gallant action of forty-five minutes.

Captain Bowen, of the Terpsichore, of thirty-two guns, also distinguished himself by the capture of the Mâhonesa, a Spanish frigate of thirty-four guns, near Gibraltar. He soon after forced the Vestale, a French ship, which carried the same number of guns as his own, to strike: she escaped, however, the next morning into Cadiz, under jury-masts, and was in vain demanded.

Captain Trollope certainly fought one of the most gallant actions during the war, in the Glatton of fifty-four guns, which was formerly an Indiaman, and at this time carried carronades of a large calibre. This brave commander having, on the 16th of July, fallen in with six frigates, accompanied by a brig and a cutter, off Helvoet, undismayed by either the number or the force of the enemy, bore down upon and came up with them late in the evening, and, notwithstanding he was surrounded in such a manner as to be attacked at once on the lee-quarter, the weather-bow, and the stern, so incessant and severe was the fire of his battery, that his adversaries thought proper to retire.

During this year the navy of Great Britain did not lose a single ship of any force, while, on the contrary, upwards of seventy sail of armed vessels belonging to the enemy were either detained or captured; among which were five line-of-battle ships, nine of forty-four guns, and three of forty.

The re-conquest of the Cape of Good Hope had been undertaken by the Dutch early in this year, but the attempt proved in the end abortive. A squadron was fitted out under Rear-admiral Lucas, who was also to command a small body of troops, which he carried along with him. The following is a list thereof:—

Lieutenant-colonel Henri embarked with the rank of adjutant-general, and M. Grandecourt, a French officer, acted as commandant of the artillery, the whole of which appears to have consisted of only four field-pieces; but as many of the ships' guns were of brass, they might easily have been landed and rendered fit for service.— In addition to this force, a small fleet was promised on the part of France, whose interest it obviously was, that this settlement should be restored to the Dutch.

Admiral Lucas's squadron sailed from the Texel in the month of March; and, as it was dangerous to pass through the English Channel, he shaped his course by the eastern coast of Scotland and the Orkneys, preferring a circuitous passage to a direct one. By these means the voyage was rendered extremely tedious, and the armament exposed to storms and disease; which not only diminished his men, but produced a discovery of his design. Admiral Pringle, who was then cruising in the North Sea with an inferior force, perceived the intention of the Dutch, and immediately returned to port, communicating the intelligence to the Admiralty. Unluckily for the Dutch, Captain Charles Brisbane, in the Moselle, descried the squadron some time after, and quickly altered his course for the purpose of giving timely notice to the commander-in-chief. This officer, for his conduct on this occasion, was made a post-captain.

If Admiral Lucas had reached the Cape after a short voyage, he would have met with only a single ship on that station, as Vice-admiral Elphinstone was then in the East Indies; and several men of war, the Tremendous, of 74, Trident, of 64, Jupiter, of 50, &c. arrived but a few days after himself. His tardy movements gave sufficient time for collecting a formidable fleet, which immediately proceeded on a cruise, for the express purpose of intercepting him.

On the 2d of August, General Craig having received intelligence that nine ships had anchored in Saldanah Bay, no less than five different vessels were dispatched in quest of the English admiral; while the commander-in-chief, leaving Major-general Doyle with about 4000 troops in the Cape Town and neighbourhood, proceeded through a country never before explored by an army, and arrived in the neighbourhood of the enemy, with an advanced guard, consisting of the light infantry, a body of Hottentots, and a few horse.— As these troops were descending towards the shore, they perceived the British fleet, which, after putting into False Bay for intelligence, had sailed during a violent gale, and was now advancing with a fair wind, directly for the mouth of the harbour. This squadron, under Sir G. Keith Elphinstone, K. B. consisted of the following ships:

About sun-set, the British fleet appeared off the bay; and the Crescent, which had been ordered a-head for information, gave notice by signal, that two sail of the line, three frigates, and other ships were moored there. The English squadron soon after dropped anchor within cannon-shot, when the admiral, fully aware of the enemy's inferiority, instead of commencing an immediate attack, transmitted a written summons to the Dutch commander; and, on receiving a positive assurance, that no damage should be done in the mean time to any of the vessels, hostilities were suspended until the morning. At the stipulated period, an officer repaired on board the flag-ship, and Rear-admiral Lucas capitulated for the surrender of the armament, which was accordingly effected, without firing a single gun, on the 17th of August. On his return to Holland, the Dutch admiral was imprisoned in the Hague, and died during the course of his trial.

At the beginning of the year, the remaining settlements of Holland in the East Indies were, without any difficulty, captured. Admiral Sir G. Keith Elphinstone having dispatched a small detachment of the king's, and eight of the East India Company's ships and vessels, under Capt. A. H. Gardner, with a body of troops commanded by Colonel James Stuart, the fort of Negombo surrendered Feb. 5, and Colombo capitulated on the 14th.

On the 15th of February, the island of Amboyna, and on the 8th of March that of Banda, with their several dependencies, were taken by Admiral Rainier, who found a considerable sum of money in the public treasury, and a large quantity of nutmegs, cloves, and mace, in the magazines.

The mortality that had occurred among the British troops in the West Indies, rendered a new army absolutely necessary in that quarter. A formidable expedition was accordingly prepared

CHAPTER IX.

Renewal of the Campaign in Italy.—The Austrian Commander reinforced.—Corona stormed.—Bonaparte's Measures.—St. Michael carried.—Obstinate Engagement at Rivoli.—The Austrians defeated.—General Provera forced to surrender.—Retreat of Alvinzy.—War with the Pope.—Letters on the Occasion.—The Austrians again take the field under the Archduke Charles.—Battles of Cainin and Lavis.—Capture of Gradisca.—Various Actions.—Peace of Leoben.

THE campaign in Italy, under General Bonaparte, terminated more favorably for the French than that in Germany, under the generals Jourdan and Moreau. Nothing but disasters had attended the Imperial commanders in their endeavors to defend the Italian possessions of the emperor; yet the power of the house of Austria was very conspicuous, from the rapid manner in which their losses were repaired; and the exterminated armies were almost instantly supplied by others. New levies were made through the hereditary states, after the battle of Arcole; and General Alvinzy received prodigious reinforcements with such expedition, that he found himself enabled once more to take the field with a numerous army. After passing the Brenta, and carrying the important post of Corona by assault, he forced General Joubert to fall back on Rivoli.

As soon as Bonaparte, who had been for some time at Bologna, became acquainted with this military irruption, he instantly ordered the column he had assembled to set out by a forced march to reinforce General Augereau's division, and oppose the enemy's enterprises on the Lower Adige. He himself set out for the blockade of Mantua, and after giving the necessary orders, proceeded from thence to Verona, where he arrived at the moment the Imperialists attacked in force the advanced guard of Massena's division, posted at St. Michael. The contest was severe, but in two hours the Austrians were repulsed.

In the mean time, the village of San Martino was repeatedly seized and retaken by both armies, and the event of the action still remained doubtful; when General Joubert, whose horse had been killed under him, rallying some battalions of infantry, which had given way, overtook the Austrians in the neighbourhood of Rivoli, while Berthier, making a charge with the cavalry, obliged them to retreat to the heights of Corona.

The Imperialists threw a bridge across the river at Anguiari, by which their advanced guard passed; and on the same day Bonaparte learned that General Joubert was forced to evacuate La Corona, to assume a position in front of Rivoli. The general had intelligence that the enemy commenced a lively cannonade on the Adige, between Ronco and Porto-Legnago. The forces in front of General Joubert left no doubt as to the intentions of the Austrians. It was evident that Alvinzy wished to penetrate by Rivoli with his principal forces, and in this direction to reach Mantua. Bonaparte formed his resolution, and put in motion a part of the division of General Massena. He ordered the troops under General Rey, at Desanzano, to advance in different columns to Rivoli, and set out in person, with all his état-majors, for that place, which he reached at midnight. General Bonaparte having assumed the command, directed Joubert to resume the position in front of the plateau of Rivoli, and particularly the post of San-Marco, which had been evacuated. This was the only point by which the enemy could advance their cavalry and artillery, between the Adige and the lake of Garda.

The commander-in-chief spent the night in viewing the ground, and the position of the Imperialists, who occupied a formidable line, nearly 20,000 strong, their right at Caprino, and their left behind San-Marco. Alvinzy had formed his plan of attack, when he hoped to surround General Joubert's division. This he now strove to execute, without a suspicion of the arrival of the French general in person, or of the reinforcements. The order to retake the small posts in front of the plateau of Rivoli, occasioned a fire of musketry between the advanced posts; but the re-capture of San-Marco by the French, at five in the morning, brought on a general battle, January 14, which gave uneasiness to Alvinzy, as it retarded his plan of attack. In this engagement, however, consummate skill and bravery were displayed on both sides.

One of the Austrian columns proceeded to the plateau of Rivoli, with an intent to carry it, and in this direction threatened to turn the right and centre. Bonaparte ordered General Leclerc to charge the Imperialists, if they carried the plateau; a detachment of dragoons was to flank the Austrian infantry, who attacked the French centre. Joubert sent some battalions from the heights of San-Marco, who threw themselves on the plateau, and the Imperialists were driven into the valley of the Adige, leaving a great number of dead, and part of their artillery. The Austrian column, which had been on its march to turn the French, and cut off their retreat, formed behind Rivoli, and covered all the heights between the Adige and the lake of Garda, so that the French line was completely turned. The Austrians, confident of success, advanced with fury to carry the entrenchments of Rivoli, but were repulsed in three different attacks; meanwhile, Bonaparte had planted four pieces of light artillery, that cannonaded the right of the Austrian line. The troops, under Generals Brune and Mounier, advanced in three columns, and attacked the right wing of the Austrian line. In an instant the whole Austrian column, consisting of 4000 men, were taken prisoners.

Bonaparte, having no intelligence of General Augereau, thought his communication with Verona might be intercepted. The Imperialists still had Corona; Joubert was to attack that place, and he directed the troops which Joubert could spare to proceed towards Verona and Castel Nuovo, and set out for the latter place, where he learned that the Austrian column, of 10,000 men, under General Provera, had crossed the Adige under the fire of a numerous artillery at Anguieri; and that General Guieux, who guarded the Adige in that quarter, was obliged to retire to Ronco. Having arrived at Villa Franca, he ordered four demi-brigades to advance from that place; and concluding that Augereau, if not defeated, was following General Provera, he proceeded to Roverbella, where he arrived with his reinforcements. General Provera, at the head of 10,000 men, had marched to the relief of Mantua, expecting the powerful co-operation of General Wurmser, who was apprised of the design.

Bonaparte hastened to St. Anthony, and gave orders to attack General Provera. This general, unable to make himself master of St. George by main force, and having no intelligence of Alvinzy's army, could not indulge a hope of engaging the French with advantage, when acting with a powerful sally of the garrison of Mantua. Bonaparte labored to prevent this, and surround the column of Provera. General Serrurier, with 1500 men, proceeded to La Favourita, whilst General Victor attacked and turned General Provera's troops; and General Miolis, who occupied St. George, made a sally so fortunately, that Provera found himself and his column completely surrounded; on which this gallant general, and the remainder of his column, surrendered at discretion.

While one wing of Alvinzy's army was thus forced to capitulate, the general himself was obliged to make a precipitate retreat. The division of General Augereau proceeded to Padua, and advanced to Citadella, from whence the Austrians fled at its approach. General Massena, who had left Vicenza to drive the Austrians from Bassano, learned, on the 26th of January, that they had evacuated that place in the night, and proceeded to Carpenedolo and Crespo; he therefore directed General Menard to file along the right bank of the Brenta to Carpenedolo, and ordered another party, with two pieces of artillery, to proceed to this village by the left bank of the Brenta; these troops came up with the Imperialists near Carpenedolo, when an action took place on the bridge; but the latter were forced to retreat, leaving 200 dead and 900 prisoners. General Joubert marched after the Austrians, who fled into the Tyrole, where he encountered their rear guard; and, at Avio, after a slight action, took 300 prisoners.

The Imperialists retired to Mori and Torbola, their right covered by the lake, and their left by the Adige. General Murat embarked with 200 men, and landed his troops at Torbola. General Vial, with the light infantry, after a severe march through the snow, turned the position of the Austrians, and obliged 450 men and twelve officers to surrender. General Joubert entered Roveredo; and the Austrians, having fortified the pass of Calliano, famous by the victory which the French gained there on entering the Tyrole, seemed to dispute their entrance into Trent. General Beliard strove to turn the right of the Austrians, while General Vial routed them, and arrived at Trent, where he found 2000 sick and wounded the Austrians had left behind them in their flight; several magazines were also taken at this place. General Massena ordered two demi-brigades to advance, and attack the castle of La Scala, but its defenders fled on the approach of the French, and left a part of their baggage behind them.

The gallant but unfortunate Wurmser had often sallied, but had always been overcome; yet his valor gained him the admiration of the enemy he fought with; the siege which he sustained is said to have cost the emperor 22,000 and the French 24,000 men, and at last was abandoned through the pressure of famine and disease. On the 2d of February a conference was held between Generals Wurmser and Serrurier, to settle the articles of capitulation, when it appeared that the hospitals were crowded with sick, and all the horses were devoured by that part of the garrison who had survived the dreadful conflicts without, and the horrors within, the walls.

The citadel was taken possession of on the 3d: the Austrians marched out with the honors of war, but became prisoners. General Wurmser was exempted with his whole suite, the general officers, the état-major, and whoever else the brave veteran thought proper to nominate. He was allowed 100 cavalry, six pieces of cannon and their waggons, and 500 persons of his own choosing; and the 700 men who accompanied him were not to act in a hostile manner against the French republic for three months.

General Bonaparte, who knew the value of a compliment in season, would not let this opportunity slip of paying his court to the army; he therefore addressed them in a proclamation, in which he detailed their exploits—told them that they had proved victorious in fourteen pitched battles and seventy engagements—had taken more than 100,000 prisoners, 500 field-pieces, and 2000 large cannon; that the countries they took had paid the army, and that they besides had sent home thirty millions. He added, that the kings of Sardinia and Naples, the Pope and the Duke of Parma, were now leagued with them; that the emperor alone was opposed to them, and that they were to seek for peace in the states of Austria; and concluded by telling them to remember that they were carrying liberty to the brave Hungarians.

From the recent measures adopted by the court of Rome, it appeared manifest, that the pope was determined on his own destruction. Not confining himself to a strict neutrality in relation to the belligerent powers, he exhibited an invincible hatred against the French republic, with which it was impossible for his feeble arm to contend. Cardinal Busca, secretary to his holiness, was informed by the first minister of the Grand-duke of Tuscany, Count Manfredini, that General Bonaparte did not wish to co-operate in the destruction of the papal see; but the pope, confiding in his own resources, and proud of being an ally of the emperor, despised the indirect overtures of the republican commander, and had made great preparations to assist General Alvinzy before the battle of Arcole, which, with the defeat at Rivoli, left his holiness at the mercy of his enemies.

General Bonaparte wrote to Cardinal Matthei, saying, that, as the court of Rome wished for war, she should have it; that to destroy the temporal power of the pope he had only to wish it. He told him to advise his holiness—the French government allowed him to receive proposals of peace, and all might be settled. The cardinal, in answer, said, that his holiness had always sought to maintain peace, and had suffered much from his wishes; that the success of his army in Italy had misled the French government; that they required of the pope to sacrifice his conscience, by the destruction of all that was the basis of religion and morality; that the court of Rome must prepare for war—his army was formidable but not invincible; that they wished also for peace, and would be happy to make one in the great affair of pacification.

On the 5th of January, 1797, Bonaparte recalled the French minister from Rome, and wrote the following letter; BOOK II.

CHAP. IX.

“The influence of foreigners at Rome will be its ruin: the words of peace which I charged you to carry to his holiness, were stifled by men to whom the glory of Rome is nothing. You are witness how much I desired to avoid the horrors of war; but the letter which I send you, and of which I have the original, will convince you of the perfidy, blindness, and obstinacy of the court of Rome. Whatever may happen, I intreat you to assure his holiness, that he may remain at Rome without any inquietude; as the first minister of religion, he shall find protection for himself and the Church. My great care shall be to introduce no change in the religion which is established. BONAPARTE.”

General Bonaparte published a manifesto on the 1st of February, declaring, that his holiness had violated the armistice, and charging him with having entered into hostile negotiations with the court of Vienna; with having put his troops in motion under the command of Austrian officers. The papal army was entrenched on the banks of the Senio, where General Victor, on the 3d of the same month, attacked them with his division, when the encounter became sharp, but of short duration. They were incapable of sustaining the shock of the bayonets, being driven from their entrenchments with the loss of 1500 men and fourteen pieces of cannon, whilst the loss sustained by the republicans did not exceed forty men in killed and wounded. General Bonaparte, leading the army in person, marched to Faenza, the gates of which were shut against him, but which he carried by assault. Romagna, the Duchy of Urbino, the towns of Cesana, Forlì, and Ravenna, and the whole marche of Ancona, surrendered to the French in the course of a few days.

A large magazine of arms and ammunition was found in Ancona, comprehending a train of artillery which the emperor had sent to the pope. A division of the French army likewise marched to Loreto, from which the greater part of the treasure had been removed before. What remained of that collection of wealth, which superstition had accumulated, was seized without any scruple, as well as the mysteries of the holy chapel, the sancta casa, &c. Even the celebrated image of the Virgin was packed up in a case, with the relics of her wardrobe and furniture, consisting of rags of coarse woollen cloth, earthen spoons, &c. and transmitted as trophies to the executive directory. Though these were mere trumpery, yet, as they belonged to the church which Bonaparte had promised to protect, the plunder of them cannot be vindicated.

General Colli, who had been posted in the vi-

BOOK II. cinity of Ancona with the pope's army, precipi-tately retreated as the republican army advanced;
CHAP. IX. and no where daring to make a stand, the French 1797. marched, without molestation, through Macerata to Tolentino, but a few day's march from the papal metropolis, when Bonaparte received a letter, in the hand-writing of his holiness, to the following purport:

POPE PIUS VI. TO GENERAL BONAPARTE.

"Dear son, health and apostolic benediction !

"Desiring to terminate amicably our differences with the French republic, by the retreat of the troops which you command, we send and depute to you, as our plenipotentiaries, two ecclesiastics, the Cardinal Matthei, who is perfectly known to you, and M. Galeppi; and two seculars, the Duke Louis Braschi, our nephew, and the Marquis Camillo Massimo; who are invested with our full powers to concert, promise, and subscribe such conditions as we hope will be just and reasonable, obliging ourselves, under our faith and word, to approve and ratify them in a special form, in order that they may be valid and inviolable in all future time. Assured of the sentiments of good-will which you have manifested, we have abstained from removing any thing from Rome, by which you will be persuaded of the entire confidence which we repose in you. We conclude by assuring you of our most perfect esteem, and presenting you with the paternal apostolic benediction. "Pius, P. P. VI."

Given at St. Peter, in Rome, the 12th February, 1797, the 22d year of our pontificate.

BONAPARTE, General-in-chief of the Army of Italy, to his Holiness the Pope.

Head-quarters at Tolentino, 1 Ventose, 5th year.

"MOST HOLY FATHER !

"I ought to thank your holiness for the obliging things contained in the letter which you have taken the trouble to write to me.

"The peace between the French republic and your holiness is just signed. I felicitate myself on being able to contribute to your personal safety.

"I entreat your holiness to guard against the persons now at Rome, who are sold to the courts, the enemies of peace, or who suffer themselves to be guided exclusively by the passion of hatred, which the loss of territory engenders.

"Europe knows the pacific inclinations and the virtue of your holiness. The French republic will be one of the truest friends of Rome.

"I send my aid-de camp, chief of brigade, to express to your holiness the perfect esteem and veneration which I have for your person, and to entreat you to confide in the desire which I have to give you, on every occasion, the respect and veneration, with which I have the honor to be,

"Your most obedient servant,

BONAPARTE."

The peace between the republic and the pope was ratified by the latter, and confirmed by the French government. It settled, that there should be peace, amity, and good-will between the republic and his holiness; and that the latter revoked all consent, by writing or promise, given to the coalition against the republic, and to every treaty of alliance, offensive or defensive, with any power or state whatever. It was agreed, that ships of war or corsairs of the powers armed against the republic, should not enter, during the present war, into the ports or roads of the ecclesiastical state. The republic should enjoy, as before the war, all the prerogatives which France had at Rome. The pope renounced all rights to the territory of Avignon, the Comtat-Venaissin and its dependencies, and gave the republic all his rights to the territories known by the names of the legations of Bologna, Ferrara, and Romagna; he engaged to pay to the treasurer of the French army, before the 5th of March, the sum of 15,000,000 of livres Tournois, 10,000,000 in specie, and five in diamonds and other precious articles, out of the sum of about 16,000,000 still remaining due on the 9th article of the armistice, signed at Bologna on the 21st of June last, and to furnish to the army 800 cavalry horses equipped, 800 draft horses, besides oxen, buffaloes, and other produce of the territory of the church. The article of the treaty of armistice, concerning the manuscripts and objects of the arts, was to be completed with all promptitude. The French army was to evacuate the whole of the territory left to the pope, when the articles relating to the payments should be accomplished. His holiness agreed to disavow, by his minister at Paris, the assassination of Basseville, secretary of legation, and to pay the sum of 300,000 livres to those who suffered by that deed. He engaged to set at liberty those in confinement for their political opinions. The general in chief was to suffer his holiness's troops, who were prisoners of war, to return home; and it was agreed, that sundry articles of minor consideration were to be obligatory for ever on his holiness and his successors.

The peace between his holiness and the republic had but just been ratified, when Bonaparte's attention was recalled to the north of Italy, where the Austrians were again assembled in great force. General Alvinzy was dismissed from the command of the army, and succeeded by the Archduke Charles, and the court of Vienna still hoped that the deliverer of the empire and vanquisher of Jourdan would dissolve the charm by which victory appeared to be attached to the arms of Bonaparte.

The French occupied the right side of the Piava, since the defeat of the brave but unfortunate Alvinzy. The Austrians collecting from all quarters, gradually formed on the opposite shore; and, previous to this, some skirmishes took place between the advanced posts, when Bonaparte returned from his victory over the pope, a conquest too trifling to add any thing to the martial fame of such a warrior. The divisions commanded by Generals Massena and Serrurier having passed the Piava, after a number of petty encounters, the Archduke thought proper to fall back on Belluno, February 24, and continued to retreat till he again crossed the Tagliamento, the banks of which were so fortified by the Austrians, from the mountains to the Adriatic, that the farther progress of the French army was extremely perilous. Even Bonaparte himself here deemed it necessary to make a pause, and to deliberate before he ventured to pass this terrific barrier of the Austrian dominions.

All necessary preparations being made, General Bonaparte resolved to make one of the boldest efforts of the Italian war, as he depended on the co-operation of General Joubert, and took advantage of the shallowness of the waters of the Tagliamento, the torrents from the Glaciers and Upper Alps being still arrested by the frost. General Duphoz was the first who threw himself into the river, at the head of a brigade of light infantry, being supported by Bernadotte and Murat; and, on gaining the opposite shore, the whole army formed in defiance of fierce charges which they had to encounter from the Austrian cavalry. The infantry of the Austrians made a very feeble opposition, as what they had witnessed filled them with astonishment, and completely disconcerted them.

The village Cainin, which then constituted the head-quarters of the Archduke, was vigorously assaulted, March 16, when he was forced to retire precipitately under cover of the night, continuing his march till he reached the gorges of the mountains by which the territory of Venice is bounded; leaving to the mercy of the victor the towns of Palma, Novova, Udina, all the Venetian territory, and a part of his artillery.

The expectations which Bonaparte had formed of the co-operation of Joubert were not disappointed. That young and brave officer had received instructions to penetrate to Carinthia through the Tyrole, ascending the Adige, the course of which river he was to follow to Brixen; after which he was to continue his route to the source of the Drave. He accordingly penetrated to the banks of the Arisio, where he engaged the Austrians; and, after a long and desperate battle at Lavis, March 21, during which he took about 3000 prisoners, he obtained possession of the bridge of Neumark, with the intention of cutting off the enemy's retreat towards Bolsana. A second battle, equally unfortunate, was fought at Tumes; but he met with opposition in his march from General Laudohn, (son to the celebrated marshal of that name,) who contrived, for some time, to arrest the progress of the invaders, at a pass of the Eisach, March 24; but, at length, the light infantry scaled a precipice, whence they rolled immense masses of rock on the opposing column, and their centre being pierced, and one of their flanks turned nearly at the same time, the whole of the artillery, which consisted of eight pieces, with 1500 soldiers, fell into the power of the republicans. After this, the invaders took possession of Brixen, where the Austrians had extensive magazines.

Another division, under the command of General Massena, likewise crossing the Tagliamento near its source, continued its march among the mountains, the nature of the country making it extremely difficult, to the sources of the Drave.

General Serrurier advanced to Gradisca, filing along the heights that command the town. To prevent the imperialists from finding out this manœuvre, General Bernadotte made the riflemen attack their entrenchments; but the French soldiers advanced to the walls of Gradisca, where they were received by a very heavy discharge of musketry and grape-shot. General Serrurier having gained the heights which commanded Gradisca, cut off every means of retreat to the garrison, who were also convinced of the inutility of defence. General Bernadotte summoned the Austrian commandant to surrender in ten minutes. He observed, that the governor had defended the town like a brave man, and gained the esteem of all military men by his conduct, and concluded by informing him, that the grenadiers and chasseurs demanded loudly the assault. The governor agreed to a capitulation, by which it was settled, that in a quarter of an hour after signing it the garrison should march out with all the honors of war, the officers keeping their swords, and to return home, on condition of not serving until exchanged. Three thousand prisoners, the flower of the army of the Archduke Charles, ten pieces of cannon, and eight standards, fell into the hands of the French. The taking of Gradisca had advantages of which the French general hastened to profit, and he issued a proclamation to the people of the province of Goritz, to prepare them for the expedition designed across their territory.

On the 21st of March the French entered Goritz, the Austrian army having retreated with such haste that they abandoned 1500 sick, and all their magazines, which were taken possession of by the French. In these magazines were 680

General Guieux fell in with the imperialists entrenched at Pufero, took two pieces of cannon and 100 prisoners, pursuing the rest into the defiles of Caporetto, as far as the Austrian La Chinse, leaving the field of battle covered with their dead. General Massena approached Tarvis with his division; and Bonaparte hoped that the 2000 men, whom General Guieux had pushed before him, would fall into this general's hands. The general of division, Dugua, entered Trieste on the night of the 23d. The French likewise got hold of the celebrated mines of Ydria, where they found much substance, and carried it off in waggons.

On gaining the top of the prodigious mountains which hang over the town of Tarvis in terrific grandeur, Massena was attacked, March 26, by an Austrian division from Clagenfurt, which had come to assist the division that was surrounded; but, after a hard conflict, he put them to the rout, taking a vast number of prisoners, among whom were three generals. Meanwhile General Guieux drove the column he had defeated at Pufero as far as Austrian La Chinse, a post well entrenched, but which was carried by assault. General Kables, in person, defended La Chinse with 500 grenadiers. The hostile column, on finding La Chinse taken, fell into the middle of the division of General Massena, who made the whole of them prisoners. Thirty pieces of cannon, 400 waggons, 5000 men, and four generals, fell into the hands of the French. The division of Massena now occupied the defiles of the Noric Alps. The battle of Tarvis was fought on a height which commands a view of Germany and Dalmatia. In many places to which the French line extended the snow was three feet deep; and the cavalry charging on the ice suffered many accidents.

General Joubert was still detained among the Tyrolean Alps; but, having given over his pursuit of Laudohn, he passed the top of the mountains that divide the Tyrole from the duchy of Carinthia, and, marching along the Drave, joined Bonaparte and Massena at Clagenfurt; from which place the Archduke Charles had retreated on the near approach of the republican army. The French were now masters of all the Austrian territory on the Italian side of the Alps; and of the Tyrole, the provinces of Carniola, Carinthia, and Istria, on the German side.

Bonaparte published a proclamation to the inhabitants of Carinthia, stating, that the French army did not enter their country to conquer it, or to make any change in their religion, manners, or customs; they were the friends of all nations, and particularly of the brave people of Germany.

During this campaign, Prince Charles lost nearly 20,000 men taken prisoners, and was now driven from the Venetian territories; from the Higher and Lower Carniola, Carinthia, the district of Trieste, and the whole of the Tyrolese. Near Villach the French found a magazine of cast iron, cartridges, and powder, and mines of lead, steel, iron, and copper; and near Clagenfurt they found manufactories of arms and cloth.

On the 31st of March, Bonaparte addressed the following insinuating letter to the Archduke:

"The General-in-chief of the army of Italy to His Royal Highness Prince Charles.

"11th Germinal, 5th year of the Republic.

"M. General-in-chief,

"Brave soldiers make war, but desire peace. Has not the war lasted six years? Have we not committed evils enough against suffering humanity? Europe, who had taken up arms against the French republic, has laid them down. Your nation alone remains, and yet blood is about to flow more than ever. The sixth campaign is announced under the most portentous auspices. Whatever may be the result, many thousands of gallant soldiers must still fall a sacrifice in the prosecution of the contest. At some period we must come to an understanding, since time will bring all things to a conclusion, and extinguish the most inveterate resentments.

"The executive directory of the French republic communicated to his imperial majesty its inclination to terminate a conflict which desolates the two countries. These pacific overtures were defeated by the intervention of the British cabinet. Is there no hope then of accommodation? Is it essential to the interests or gratifying to the passions of a nation, far removed from the theatre of war, that we should continue to murder each other? Are not you, who are so nearly allied to the throne, and who are above all the despicable passions which generally influence ministers and governments, ambitious to merit the appellations of the benefactor of the human race and the saviour of the German empire? Do not imagine, gallant general, that I wish to insinuate that you cannot save your country by force of arms; but, on the supposition that the chances of war were even to become favorable, Germany will not suffer less on that account. With respect to myself, if the overture which I have now the honor to make to you could be the means of sparing the life of a single man, I should prize more highly the civic crown, to which my interference would entitle me, than the melancholy glory which would result from the most brilliant military exploits.

"I beg of you to believe me to be, general-in-chief, with sentiments of the most profound respect and esteem, &c.

(Signed)

"BONAPARTE."

The following is the Archduke's manly reply to Bonaparte:

"From my head-quarters, 2d April, 1797.

"M. General,

"Though I make war, and obey the dictates of honor and duty, yet I desire, as well as yourself, peace, for the happiness of the people, and the interests of humanity.

"As, nevertheless, in the post with which I am entrusted, it does not belong to me to scrutinize or to terminate the quarrels of the belligerent powers; and, as I am not furnished, on the part of his imperial majesty, with any power to treat, you will see that it is natural, M. General, that I should not enter into any negotiation with you on that subject, but wait for superior orders, relative to an object of such high importance, and which is not fundamentally a part of my duty. But, whatever may be the future chance of the war, or the hopes of peace, I intreat you to be persuaded, M. General, of my distinguished esteem and consideration.

"CHARLES, Field-marshal."

The division of General Massena, forming an advanced guard, encountered the imperialists in the defiles between Treisach and Neumark, April 2; their rear-guard was pursued by the French so rapidly, that the Archduke was compelled to bring back from his line of battle eight battalions of grenadiers, those who had taken Kehl, and who were now the hope of the Austrian army. The combat, which was between the flower of the imperialists and the veteran troops of the army of Italy, was one of the most furious that had happened during the war. The imperialists had a grand position, crowded with cannon; but it protracted, for a short time, the defeat of their rear-guard; their grenadiers were totally routed, leaving the field of battle covered with their dead, and from five to six hundred prisoners. The Austrians defiled during the night, and the French entered Neumark on the 6th, their head-quarters having advanced the same day to Treisach. Here they found 4000 quintals of flour, and a quantity of brandy and oats; they found also about the same quantity of stores at Neumark.

While the French troops were on their march to Treisach, the Archduke, by an aid-de-camp, requested a suspension of arms for four hours; this was inadmissible; as in four hours he would have joined General Spork, to prevent which Bonaparte had hastened his march both night and day.

On Bonaparte's approach to Vienna, violent commotions took place. Many withdrew themselves from the horrors of a siege, and left the town; and though a number appeared ready to rally round the monarch, and unite to defend the country, he could not be much encouraged by an attachment which had been already so fatal to the noble volunteers of Vienna, who had faced the army of Italy to meet with death or surrender prisoners. In vain was Prince Charles at the head of the imperial armies; he had been still more unfortunate than his predecessors, and every thing expected from his talents had deceived their ultimate hopes.

Bonaparte had obtained very recent information, that the hardy Tyrolese peasantry had risen in a mass, and that General Laudohn had recovered Botsen and Brixen, from which the French troops, that were left for the defence of the Tyrole, had been driven with considerable loss. The army under Bonaparte still possessed its native spirit and courage, but was greatly diminished in point of numbers, destitute of such heavy artillery as sieges required, and incapable of retaining the numerous provinces it had already subdued. Bonaparte felt that he was in the midst of an enemy's country; and if he advanced, the peasantry of Carinthia and Carniola might follow the example of the Tyrolese. His communication with France, and even with Italy, must be given up. He had no well-grounded hope of assistance from any quarter whatever, and the army under his command, reduced as it certainly must have been by this time, was inadequate to the mighty task of subjugating the Austrian empire. Even admitting that he should have been so successful as to gain possession of Vienna, defended as it was by the lofty hills of Styria, and the army commanded by the gallant, the beloved Archduke, still he had before him an almost boundless length of territory; and after fighting long, without gaining any permanent advantage, he might finally have found it extremely difficult to retrace his steps to his native country.

The French general changed his head-quarters to Judenburg, and prepared for decisive measures; but Lieutenant-general the Count de Bellegarde, and Major-general Morveltdt wrote to him, and stated, that his imperial majesty wished to concur in terminating a war that desolated the two nations. From the overture made by the French general to Prince Charles, the emperor had deputed them to know the general's proposals on a matter of such importance. Persuaded of the desire and intentions of the two powers to end this disastrous war, his royal highness desired a suspension of arms for ten days, to facilitate the attainment of so desirable an object.

Bonaparte, in his reply to this application, stated, "that, viewing the position of the two armies, a suspension of arms was disadvantageous to the French; but if it opened a road to peace, so beneficial to the two nations, he would consent without hesitation to their request. The French republic had often evinced to his majesty her wish to put an end to this contest; she was still the same, and he did not doubt, from the conference he had with them, that peace would be at length re-established between the republic and his majesty."

Such, however, was Bonaparte's critical situation, that the application, no doubt, was joyfully received. It behoved him, indeed, to conceal his joy; as he had vauntingly informed the directory, "that he hoped, at the head of 20,000 grenadiers, to plant, in a few days, the standard of the French republic in the capital of his imperial majesty."

The condition of the armistice entered into by the French general and the Archduke on the 7th of April, provided, that there should be a suspension of arms between the French and imperial armies, calculating from the evening of the 7th to that of the 13th. By the second article, the French were to retain the following line:—The advanced posts of the right wing to keep possession of the position they then occupied between Fiume and Trieste, and this line to be extended as far as Rastadt and Lientz. It was also stipulated, that the suspension of arms should extend to the Tyrole; and that the generals commanding the troops in that quarter should regulate together the posts they were severally to occupy. Hostilities were not to take place in the Tyrole until twenty-four hours after the general-in-chief should have resolved on it, and in any case not within twenty-four hours after the generals commanding the French and imperial troops in the Tyrole should be informed of the circumstance.

A suspension of arms for nine days accordingly took place; and, within forty-eight hours after the expiration of that term, a pacification was agreed to and signed at the castle of Eckenwald, in Styria, April 18. In this contract, since known by the name of the treaty of Leoben, it was stipulated, that his imperial majesty should renounce, for himself and his successors, all right and title to the Austrian Netherlands, and acknowledge the Cisalpine republic; the Rhine was to be the common boundary between the two nations, and the navigation of that river was fully conceded to the French.

CHAPTER X.

Campaign in Germany.—Hoche and Moreau cross the Rhine.—A Suspension of Arms.—Disputes with Venice.—Bonaparte's Menaces, and Manifesto.—The French enter Venice.—Treaty of Campo Formio.—Attack on Genoa.—The Ligurian Republic.

It having been determined by the directory to make a new irruption into Germany, the French, two days before the signature of the preliminary articles of the peace of Leoben, resolved to cross the Rhine, and assail the hereditary dominions of the emperor on the side of Bavaria; while Bonaparte, in case of a new rupture, might advance to the walls of Vienna.

General Hoche was appointed to command the army of the Sambre and Meuse, in the place of Jourdan, who, in consequence of his ill success, was no longer a favorite with the directory. He accordingly repaired to head-quarters, and having cantoned his troops in such a manner as to be able to make a sudden movement, on receiving a courier from Paris, he dispatched a flag to the head-quarters of the enemy, informing General Werneck, that the armistice between the advanced posts was to cease on the 16th of April; a similar notice was given by General Moreau to the Austrian commander on the Upper Rhine. General Kray, who commanded the left wing of the Austrian army, on the idea that a convention was agreed on in Carinthia, requested permission to send an officer with powers to conclude an armistice. Hoche demanded the evacuation of the Lahn, and the cession of Ehrenbreitstein; but the imperial general thinking that the situation of the two armies did not authorise this, refused his assent.

The Austrian left occupied a position in front of the bridge of Neuwied, having its right supported by the village of Hotterdorf, and its left resting on Bendorf. The strength of the entrenchments presented a very formidable aspect, and did honor to the veteran abilities of General Kray. The imperialists began the action with a lively cannonade, but the French infantry carried the village and the line of redoubts with fixed bayonets. The cavalry decided the battle, and the imperialists, thrown into disorder, were forced to retreat, leaving all the cannon of their batteries, several field-pieces, and ammunition-waggons, besides the principal part of their baggage, three or four standards, and 4000 prisoners.

The Austrians had drawn a reinforcement of twenty or thirty thousand men from the Rhine, and sent them to Italy. This weakened the Swa-bian line, and assisted General Moreau, who effected the passage of the river by a coup de main. In the night of the nineteenth, a body of troops crossed to the right bank in boats, succeeded in re-establishing the bridges, by which the rest of the army passed the river, and commenced offensive operations. Several engagements took place during the day, but the imperialists were defeated, and pursued to Offenbourg; and in the evening the republican flag waved on the bastions of that Kehl, which a French garrison, the year before, defended against the Austrian army. The Austrians sustained a great loss; five French generals were wounded; and, from the resistance made by the imperialists, the loss of the republican army was also very considerable. The villages of Lients and Hobine were seized by another column of the French, while a third marched towards the banks of the Kentzie, and before night the Austrians, attacked on all sides with the bayonets, had dispersed in different directions.

After pursuing the discomfited imperialists during eight days, the French army of the Rhine and Moselle at length found themselves among the mountains of the Brisgau; and while the left wing, commanded by General St. Cyr, took possession of Helmbingen and Lichtenau, the centre, under General Vandamme, penetrated into the adjoining valley, and the right approached Fribourg. Field-marshal Latours, unable to stop the progress of the republicans, retired to the borders of the Danube; and at this time Moreau received a courier from Bonaparte, announcing the treaty of Leoben. Similar intelligence arrived at the head-quarters of the army of the Sambre and Meuse, at the critical time when General Werneck, unable to contend with superior numbers, had abandoned Frankfort to the French.

The respective commanders immediately agreed to a suspension of arms; the Mayne and the Nedda were to be considered as the line of separation between the Austrians and the French; the navigation of the Rhine and the Moselle was declared to be free; and it was stipulated, that the generals, Hoche and Moreau, should preserve all their conquests until a final adjustment should take place.

Peace, however, was not Bonaparte's wish; for he was still anxious to keep the revolutionary spirit alive. He began to complain of the Venetian government favoring the Austrians, and acting treacherously towards his troops. "What!" said he, in a letter to the Doge, "do you think I will tamely suffer the massacres excited by the Venetian government? The blood of our brethren in arms shall be avenged; and there is not a French battalion, charged with this mission, which does not feel three times the courage and strength necessary to punish you;—the republic of Venice has returned the blackest perfidy for the generous treatment she has received from France." BOOK II.

CHAP. X.
He informed his serenity, that if he did not instantly adopt measures to arrest and deliver up, within twenty-four hours, the persons who, it was said, had assassinated some French soldiers, war was declared. Though the French general endeavoured to write like a Christian, the sequel will show that he did not act like one.

The senate published a proclamation relative to these complaints; their conduct, they said, had always been, and still was so perfectly friendly towards the belligerent powers, that they did not think it necessary to pay any attention to the evil-disposed persons who questioned their sincerity; but as these enemies of the republic had spread the vilest slanders against the sincerity of the Venetian government, the senate declared, that their friendship with France was not in the least altered; the senate, therefore, had no doubt but the French nation would repose that confidence in the republic of Venice which it had merited by its irreproachable conduct.

Bonaparte prepared to put his menaces into execution; and he accordingly published the following manifesto against Venice.

"Head-quarters, Palma Nova,
"14 Florial, May 3.

"Whilst the French were engaged in the defiles of Styria, and left far behind them Italy and the principal establishments of the army, where only a small number of battalions remained, this was the conduct of the government of Venice:

1. "They profited of passion-week, to arm 40,000 peasantry; and uniting these with ten regiments of Slavonians, organised them into different corps, and sent them to different points, to intercept all kinds of communication between the French army and the places in its rear.

2. "Extraordinary commissaries, ammunition of all kinds, and a great quantity of cannon, were sent from Venice, to complete the organization of different corps.

3. "All persons in the Terra Firma, who had received us favorably, were arrested; benefits and the confidence of the government were conferred upon all those who possessed a furious hatred to the French name, and especially the fifteen conspirators of Verona, whom the proveditori Paoli had arrested three months ago, as having premeditated the massacre of the French.

4. "In the squares, coffee-houses, and other public places of Venice, all Frenchmen were insulted, mal-treated, and called by the names of jacobins, regicides, atheists. The French were ordered to leave Venice; and, a short time afterwards, they were prohibited from entering it.

5. "The people of Padua, Vicenza, and Verona, were ordered to take up arms to second the different corps of the army, and to begin the new Sicilian vespers. It belongs, said the Venetian officers, to the lion of St. Mark to verify the proverb—"that Italy is the tomb of the French."

6. "The priests in the pulpit preached up the crusade; and the priests in the state of Venice never speak any thing but the will of the government. Pamphlets, perfidious proclamations, anonymous letters, were printed in the different towns, and began to agitate the minds of all: in a state where the liberty of the press is not permitted, in a government as much feared as it is secretly detested, printers publish, and authors write, nothing but what the senate pleases.

7. "All smiled at first at the perfidious project of the government. The French blood flowed on every side. On all the roads, our convoys, our couriers, and every thing for the army, were intercepted.

8. "At Padua a chief of battalion, and two other Frenchmen were arrested. At Castiglione de Mori our soldiers were disarmed and assassinated. On all the great roads from Mantua to Legnano, and from Cassano to Verona, we had more than two hundred men assassinated.

9. "Two French battalions, wishing to join the army, met at Chiassi with a division of the Venetian troops, which attempted to oppose their passage; an obstinate conflict took place, our brave soldiers cut a way for themselves, by putting these perfidious enemies to the rout.

10. "At Valeggio there was another battle; at Dessengaro a third. The French every where were the weakest in numbers; but they know well that the number of the enemy's battalions is never counted, when they are composed only of assassins.

11. "At the second feast in Easter, on the ringing of the bell, all the French were assassinated at Verona. Neither the sick in the hospitals were respected, nor those who, in a state of convalescence, were walking in the streets; they were thrown into the Adige, where they died, pierced with a thousand wounds from stilettoes. More than 400 were assassinated.

12. "For a week the Venetian army besieged the three castles of Verona. The cannon which were placed in the battle were carried at the point of the bayonet. This town was set on fire, and the moveable column that arrived in the interim, put these cowards to complete rout, by taking 3000 of the enemy prisoners, among whom were several Venetian generals.

13. "The house of the French consul to Zante was burnt in Dalmatia.

14. "A Venetian ship of war took an Austrian convoy under its protection, and fired several shot at the corvette La Brune.

15. "The Liberateur d'Italie, a vessel of the republic, with only three or four small pieces of cannon, and a crew of forty men, was sunk in the very port of Venice, and by order of the senate. The young and intrepid Haugiers, lieutenant and commander of the said ship, as soon as he saw himself attacked by the fire of the fort and the admiral's galley, being from both not more than pistol-shot, ordered his crew to go below. He alone got upon the deck, in the midst of a storm of grape-shot; and endeavoured by his speeches to disarm the fury of his assassins; but he fell dead. His crew threw themselves into the sea, and were pursued by six challops, with troops on board, in the pay of Venice, who cut to pieces several that sought for safety in the water. One of the masters, with several wounds, and bleeding in every part, had the good fortune to reach the shore, near the castle of the port; but the commandant himself cut off his hand with an axe.

"On account of the above-mentioned grievances, authorised by the twenty-second title, article 328, of the constitution of the republic; and in consequence of the urgency of affairs, the general-in-chief requires the French minister to the republic of Venice in Lombardy, and the Venetian Terra Firma, to quit it in twenty-four hours; directs the generals of division to treat as enemies the troops of the republic of Venice; and to pull down, in the towns of Terra Firma, the lion of St. Mark. Every one will receive, in the orders of the day to-morrow, a particular instruction respecting ulterior operations.

"BONAPARTE."

Such was the contumelious language of Bonaparte, in a manifesto which requires a short digression for the sake of a few observations. Instead of being the weakest in numbers, the French frequently obtained their victories by the superiority of their forces: the assassination complained of was insignificant when compared to that which had been practised by the French, and which he so often allowed and ordered; and the liberty of the press, which he required, was to confine it entirely to the adulation of himself and of the republican government.

Twenty-five thousand Frenchmen, already encamped within sight of Venice, were prepared to carry the threats of their general into execution. Augereau entered the city, May 12, and seized on the arsenal and forts; demanding at the same time the three inquisitors, and ten principal members of the senate, accused of having instigated their countrymen to the assassination of the French. The Veronese were punished with the greatest severity; several thousands of armed peasantry, who contested the progress of the French divisions, were, for their patriotism, cut to pieces or dispersed. A body of Slavonians, who had joined them, retired to a large building or post where were deposited all their powder-waggons and ammunition. This was soon blown into the air, and 500 Slavonians literally annihilated! The French detachment reached Verona, which immediately surrendered.

The Venetian government was now humble and abject: it was resolved that the government should suspend all its functions, and that the republic should accept a provisional government from France. It was also decreed, that the magistrates of whom the French complained should be delivered up to be punished. A body of French troops took possession of the city, when a municipality was modelled, and every thing formed on the democratic regime. The liberty of the press (as it was styled) was established, by putting the press under severe restrictions; the catholic religion was unaltered, and persons and property unmolested; but the ships of war, and the stores in the arsenal, were taken possession of in the name of the French republic.

For similar reasons, Genoa was attacked. It was indeed impossible that that country, considering its vicinity to France, and the presence of the republican army, could escape a spirit of innovation which had alarmed all Europe. The French government pretended, that it did not punish the Genoese nobility for the aid they afforded the imperial army when in their neighbourhood, and their attention to the partisans of Austria. The people of Genoa had imbibed the principles of democratical liberty, and tumults had arisen between them and the adherents of the old government. This imbecile government, unable to stem the torrent, sent deputies to Bonaparte at Montebello, where a convention was concluded on the 6th of June.

The government of the Genoese republic acknowledged the sovereignty to reside in the body of the citizens of its territory. The legislative power was entrusted to two representative councils, and the executive delegated to a senate of ten members, to be nominated by the councils. Municipalities were established in the communes and districts, on the model of France, and a committee was charged with framing a constitution, and all the laws of the republic, with the reserve of doing nothing contrary to the catholic religion. The provisional government was to extinguish faction, grant a general amnesty, and unite the people in rallying round the public liberty. France agreed to give protection, and even the assistance of her armies, to the Genoese republic, to facilitate, if necessary, the execution of these articles, and maintain the integrity of the territory of the republic. This new-modelled constitution was called the Ligurian republic.

The negotiations did not proceed with the activity characterising Bonaparte's measures; but he was busily employed in consolidating the new republics which his victories had founded in Italy. The Bolognese, Ferrarese, Modenese, and Romagna, were incorporated with Lombardy, and the Cisalpine and Ligurian republics completely organized.

When Bonaparte had effected his grand designs, he left Italy, and returned to Paris, November 20. Many, however, of the Italians, and not a few of the French, were disgusted at the fate of Venice; as the people, instead of being liberated from their chains, were doomed to wear more heavy ones, and, by an exchange of masters, to endure a more grievous servitude.

Naval History.—Battle off Cape St. Vincent, by Sir John Jervis.—Battle off Camperdown, by Admiral Duncan.—Bombardments of Cadiz.—Expeditions against the Colonies of France and Spain.—Capture of Trinidad.—Attempts to carry Teneriffe.—War in Domingo.—Descent in Wales.

DURING this year, the fleets of Great Britain rode paramount, as usual, in every sea. Sir John Jervis, (afterwards Lord St. Vincent,) and Admiral Duncan, (afterwards Viscount Duncan,) obtained two brilliant victories; while Admiral Lord Bridport not only guarded the mouth of the channel, but completely shut up the port of Brest.

Sir John Jervis, who had for some time blockaded Cadiz, received intelligence from Captain Foote, of the Niger, stationed off Carthagena, that the fleet under Admiral Don Joseph De Cordova was at sea. He immediately sailed in quest of it, and at the dawn of the succeeding day, (February 13,) the Spanish fleet was descried; but as the weather happened to be extremely hazy, it was not until 10 o'clock that the frigate made the signal for twenty-five sail of the line.

The British squadron consisted of no more than the following fifteen ships:—

Notwithstanding the disparity of numbers, the veteran commander was resolved not to decline an action; and, sailing down in a close and compact order, he contrived to begin the engagement before the Spanish admiral was able to complete his line of battle, as a number of the ships had been separated from the main body.

During the critical moment of the enemy's disorder, the English, by carrying a press of sail, suddenly passed through the Spanish fleet; after which they tacked in so judicious a manner, as to cut off all that portion which had fallen to leeward. About 11 o'clock the signal was made from the Victory for close fight. The van, led by the Culloden, accordingly commenced the fight, the other ships engaging as they came up; and, after a partial cannonade, which continued for a considerable time, two ships of 112 guns, one of 84, and one of 74, were captured.

According to the admiral's letter, the Spanish fleet consisted of twenty-seven sail of the line, as already observed; previous, however, to the transmission of his dispatches, the names of twenty-two had been obtained: viz.,

In consequence of this brilliant victory, the British admiral acquired the appropriate title of Lord St. Vincent, with a pension of 3000*l.* per annum; Vice-admiral Thompson and Rear-admiral Parker were created baronets; Commodore Nelson was invested with the order of the Bath; and Captain R. Calder was knighted. The loss of the English, on this occasion, was trifling; only one seaman happened to be killed on board the ship carrying his flag; and although Commodore Nelson distinguished himself greatly, by boarding the San Nicolas and San Josef in succession, he lost only one officer, twenty seamen, and three soldiers. The Spanish admiral lost several officers, particularly Don Francisco Xavier Winthysen, and a great number of men: although assailed by no less than three men of war, Don Cordova made a bold resistance, and at length succeeded in escaping to Cadiz, with the remainder of his squadron. As soon as the intelligence of this victory arrived, great rejoicings took place throughout the nation, and the fleet was honored with the thanks of both houses of parliament.

Another naval victory, still more important, in respect to its consequences, was obtained in the month of October. The French, having a large army and a powerful party in Holland, determined to fit out an expedition against Ireland, which, in revenge for the succours afforded to the royalists on the coast of Brittany, was either to be wholly separated from the government of England, or at least subjected to all the miseries of a civil war: and, such was the distracted state of that nation, that great hopes were entertained, by the invading army, of their standards being readily joined by many inhabitants of consequence. The Dutch fleet, prepared for this purpose, was put under the command of Admiral De Winter, who was supposed to be well acquainted with naval affairs, and consisted of the following ships:

A body of troops embarked on board this fleet, under the command of Lieutenant-general Daendels, of whom frequent mention has been made before; and the directory plumed themselves with the hope of deriving great success from their romantic project.

On the first intelligence of these preparations the board of admiralty immediately sent a powerful squadron to the North Sea, in order to intercept the enemy; and Admiral Duncan, an officer of much experience, and well acquainted with the coast, was selected as commander for this purpose. The British fleet consisted of the following ships:

Admiral Duncan, who had blockaded the Texel the greater part of the summer, had assumed such a station as enabled him to discover all the motions of the enemy. No event of any importance took place at this time, in consequence of repeated procrastination; and the English admiral was obliged to quit his station, and repair to Yarmouth to refit. As soon as the news of his departure reached Amsterdam, the Dutch government, which, perhaps on account of the advanced season, had ordered the troops to be disembarked, issued peremptory orders for the fleet to put to sea.

Capt. Trollope, with a small squadron, having been left to watch the enemy, on the 9th of October a signal was made to Admiral Duncan, off Yarmouth Roads, that the enemy's fleet was at sea. The British fleet got under sail with astonishing rapidity. Captain Trollope's small squadron was perceived, on the morning of the 11th, with signals flying, to intimate that an enemy's fleet was to leeward.

Admiral Duncan gave the signal for engaging, and was obeyed with the utmost alacrity, Vice-admiral Onslow, in the Monarch, bearing down upon the rear of the enemy. Before one o'clock the battle commenced, when the British fleet broke the line of the enemy, and made it impracticable for them to reach the Texel, the land being about seven miles distant. Although all the masts of De Winter's ships went by the board, he only struck his colors when overpowered by numbers: it is said by some, that not an officer was left upon the quarter-deck of the Dutch flag-ship, but the admiral himself, the whole of them being either killed or wounded; and others accuse his officers of desertion. The Vice-admiral's ship lost all her masts about the same time, and accordingly struck to Admiral Onslow's division. Before three o'clock more of the enemy's fleet surrendered; but as Admiral Duncan found himself no more than five miles off the land, he was wholly employed in getting the disabled ships off the shore, and could not ascertain the number of prizes; and, as the wind blew strong on the land, the fleet was scattered, and some of the Dutch ships that had struck were enabled to effect their escape. The vessels which the enemy lost were the Vryheid, Jupiter, Haerlem, Devries, Gelykheid, Wasenaer, Hercules, Delft, Alkmaar, Munnikendaan, and Ambuscade; the Delft foundered in sight of the British coast, and a frigate also was lost.

A more sanguinary battle was never fought; for in nine ships of Admiral Duncan's fleet, the killed and wounded exceeded 700, and the loss of the cold, but intrepid Dutch, must have been very severe. The flag-ships of the enemy lost not less than 250 men each; and not a single ship among the prizes lost less than 100 men. The battle was fought so near the shore that thousands of spectators beheld the whole of it, without having it in their power to give the smallest relief.

Great and laudable was the gallantry of Admiral Duncan, but the most commendable part of his conduct was, his getting between the enemy and the land. This was a manœuvre which none who were before him had ever attempted, in circumstances so evidently critical. When he returned home he was created Baron Duncan, of Lundie, in the county of Perth, and Viscount Duncan, of Camperdown, from the place on the coast of Holland off which his lordship gained the memorable victory: Vice-admiral Onslow was created a baronet; and Captains Trollope and Fairfax were knighted. This glorious victory occasioned a general illumination throughout the kingdom: his majesty went in state to St. Paul's cathedral; the procession was attended by three waggons bearing flags that had been taken from the French, Spaniards, and Dutch, during the war, and these were severally borne to the altar by a flag-officer, who had been present when they were taken. A number of officers and seamen attended, and all ranks felt the obligation they were under to the brave defenders of their country.

In the course of the summer, Cadiz was twice bombarded by the fleet under Lord St. Vincent.

The first bombardment took place June 23. This enterprise was conducted by the intrepid Nelson, and the Thunderer bomb, stationed during the night under his management, within 2500 yards of the walls. Hereupon the Spaniards sent out a great number of mortar and gun-boats, and launches; but they were attacked, dispersed, and obliged to return. A remarkable combat took place on this occasion between Don Miguel Tyra-son, who led this armament, and Rear-admiral Nelson; the former laid the admiral's boat alongside, and the Spanish barge remained in this position until eighteen out of twenty-six of Tyra-son's crew were killed, and he himself and the remainder wounded. The British commander was not exempt from danger, for Captain Freemantle, who had accompanied him, was hurt, and his coxswain, (Sykes,) received a shot while defending the rear-admiral's person, during an engagement in which six Englishmen were killed and about two hundred wounded.

On the 5th of July a second bombardment took place, which produced considerable effect on the town, and must, in some degree, have annoyed the shipping, as ten sail of the line, among which were the flag-ships of the Admirals Mazzaredo and Gravina, were obliged to warp out of the range of the shells. Another operation of a similar kind was meditated soon after, but prevented by the weather.

This year was also remarkable for the reduction of Trinidad, taken by the British troops under Lieutenant-general Sir Ralph Abercrombie, who meditated the invasion of this large island soon after the surrender of St. Lucia. The troops intended for this expedition were embarked at Martinico, under the protection of a small squadron, consisting of the Prince of Wales, the flag-ship; the Bellona, Vengeance, Scipio, Favorite, Zephyr, Terror bomb, and some transports, commanded by Rear-admiral Henry Harvey. Having steered between Cariacou and Grenada, the armament sailed towards the gulph of Pavia, and on passing through the great Bocas channel, February 16, discovered a Spanish squadron at anchor in Shagaramus-bay, under cover of the island of Gaspargrande, which was well fortified. This squadron consisted of four ships of the line and a frigate; viz.

2. Gallasdo	Don Gabriel Sorando	74
3. Arrogante	Don Raphael Benasa	74

5. Santa Cecilia	Don Manuel Utresabe	36

The English commander anchored in order of battle, within random shot of the enemy's ships and batteries, to prevent the flight of the former during the night, which was now fast approaching; but, early in the morning of February 17, the squadron was discovered on fire, and all of them, except the San Damaso, were consumed to ashes. The 74-gun ship, which luckily escaped the conflagration, was towed out by the boats of the fleet.

This fortunate circumstance induced the general to hasten the attack of the town; and the troops having been landed about the distance of three miles from it, under the direction of Captain Woolley, of the royal navy, covered by the Favorite sloop, advanced against the port D'Espagne, which, together with two forts, was seized upon with little or no opposition, a lieutenant being the only person wounded. In the course of the following morning, February 18, the governor, Don Josef Maria Chacon, agreed to a capitulation, by which he delivered up the island to Great Britain, and surrendered himself and troops prisoners of war. On his return to Spain, the governor was disgraced, but the admiral experienced great attention from the court. The latter, on being asked by Admiral Harvey why he had burnt the greater part of the squadron, replied, that he had received instructions from his court to that purpose, and that a Spanish commander had been formerly put to death for neglect of duty in a similar situation.

Articles of Capitulation,

For the surrender of the island of Trinidad, between his excellency Sir Ralph Abercrombie, K. B. commander-in-chief of his Britannic majesty's land forces; his excellency Henry Harvey, Esq. rear-admiral of the red, and commander-in-chief of his Britannic majesty's ships and vessels of war; and his excellency Don Josef Maria Chacon, knight of the order of Calatrava, brigadier of the royal navy, governor and commander-in-chief of the island of Trinidad and its dependencies, inspector-general of the troops of its garrison, &c. &c.

RALPH ABERCROMBIE.

HENRY HARVEY.

JOSEF MARIA CHACON.

The other expeditions were far from being successful; and, in the opinion of many, the acquisition of Trinidad was no compensation for their failure, which must, however, be ascribed to the want of sufficient information and an adequate force. Conceiving that the large and valuable island of Porto Rico might be easily wrested from the dominion of Spain, Sir Ralph Abercrombie and Admiral Harvey determined to make the attempt. The squadron, which found no small difficulty in procuring pilots and guides, sailed from Martinico, and, after a short passage, anchored off Congrejos Point. Although the whole of the north side is bounded by a reef, a narrow channel was at length discovered about three leagues to the eastward of the town; through this the Beaver and Fury sloops, with other vessels of small draught, passed into a bay, on the shore of which the English troops effected a landing, on the 17th of April. After experiencing a slight opposition from about 100 of the enemy, who were concealed in the bushes, the detachment advanced in the afternoon of the same day, and seized a post extremely favorable to a small force, the two flanks being protected, one by the sea and the other by a lagoon. The artillery was then brought up, and the necessary preparations were made for an attack on the town, which is situated upon a small island. It was, however, soon discovered that, as the Moro castle commanded the passage into the harbour, the enemy could keep open a free communication with the southern and western parts of the settlement; and, as they were in possession of a number of gun-boats, they might greatly annoy the left flank of the invaders. Several other obstacles also presented themselves; for although the place might be assaulted with some probability of success on the eastern side, which, notwithstanding, was defended by the castle and lines of St. Christopher, yet it was first necessary for the English to force their way across the lagoon; and as the bridge, which connected the island with the main, was destroyed, and the pass defended by armed vessels and redoubts, the attempt was deemed hazardous, more especially as the Spaniards, from the number of their cannon, could open a fire far superior to that of the besiegers. The scheme was therefore relinquished, and the troops were embarked during the night of April 30, with the greatest order and regularity. The general, however, lost about 200 men in the attempt; and it was found necessary to abandon some iron guns, mortars, and howitzers; but, as these were considered unserviceable, four brass field-pieces, captured from the enemy, and which were transported on board the fleet, made ample compensation for them.

Another expedition, which took place in a different quarter, notwithstanding the gallantry of the parties, was likely to be attended with greater disasters than those which had happened. The commander-in-chief of the squadron stationed off Cadiz, having received intelligence that one of the Spanish islands on the coast of Africa was vulnerable, resolved on fitting out a squadron against Teneriffe. The distinguished Nelson was accordingly detached with the Theseus, Culloden, Zealous, Seahorse, Emerald, Terpsichore, and Fox cutter; the Leander soon after followed.

On the arrival of this armament, July 15, a body of men, including 1000 mariners, was landed under the direction of Captain Trowbridge, of the Culloden, assisted by the Captains Hood, Thompson, Freemantle, Bowen, Miller, and Waller, who volunteered their services on this occasion.

After a long and vigorous resistance, the English obtained possession of Santa Cruz, and then prepared to attack the neighbouring fort. The strength of this place not having been previously ascertained, an unexpected degree of opposition ensued; and, this being followed by ineffectual attempts to carry the batteries by assault, during the night of July 24, an immediate retreat became necessary. This, however, was rendered impracticable, by an unfortunate event; for, on repairing to the beach, the English found that the violence of the surf had destroyed the chief part of their boats.

All the force of the island having been assembled by the governor, the Spaniards came down in such numbers, that the English were obliged to take to their vessels in the best manner they could. The governor summoned them to surrender, but the British commander gallantly refused to capitulate; and the former is reported, not only to have entertained his unwelcome guests, but to have furnished them with the means of repairing on board their respective ships. The loss unfortunately sustained upon this occasion was great; 44 privates were killed, 105 wounded, 97 drowned, and 5 unaccounted for.

Rear-admiral Nelson lost his right arm by a cannon ball, and Captain Bowen, with his first lieutenant, and the whole of the boat's crew, went to the bottom, a shell falling into the boat while they were rowing to the shore. Captain Thompson, of the Leander, Captain Freemantle, of the Sea-horse, a lieutenant, and a midshipman, were wounded.

An alternate series of good and bad fortune attended the campaigns in St. Domingo; the English on one hand, and the negroes and mulattoes on the other, contending for superiority with an unexampled degree of animosity. The British ministry had been for some time in search of an officer, calculated by professional knowledge to defend the acquisitions in St. Domingo, and honest enough to restrain speculation and abuses. Such a man was at length found in General Simeoe, who landed under great disadvantages; as he had brought no reinforcement with him, and as the English name was becoming unpopular. He, however, found means to foil Toussaint before St. Mark, to re-capture Miraballais, to storm the forts of Le Boutilliere and St. Laurent, and to prevent Rigaud, a mulatto chief of notoriety, from obtaining possession of Irois.

This general, after a residence of five months, returned, and proposed to subjugate the whole island, provided he obtained a sufficient supply of men; but the negroes in arms were so numerous, and the expences required for such an undertaking so enormous, that the ministers prudently relinquished the project.

The negroes and gens de couleur were in actual possession of all the power and all the property of the island, and the former tyranny of the planters, so justly complained of, was now more inhumanly exercised by the slave, who, set loose at once from all restraint, felt a savage thirst for vengeance, which he gratified without control. Such was the fate of this fine country, once one of the principal sources of the wealth of France, but which precipitate humanity, mistaking the means for the end, and avaricious cruelty, opposing every alleviation of human misery, had nearly succeeded in bringing to utter ruin.

Toussaint de l'Ouverture, the French general of the negro race, (of whom we shall have occasion hereafter to speak,) was a man of great talents, and a principal leader in the revolts: his dependence upon the French government was manifestly little more than nominal, and he was suspected of harbouring lofty and aspiring views of establishing himself in the permanent possession of the island.

There can be no doubt, but that St. Domingo was intended by the court of London to constitute a part, at least, of the indemnity which was so much insisted upon at the commencement of the war. Lieutenant-colonel Whitelocke, who commanded the first expedition to this country, (see Book I. Chap. V.) in the proclamation published by him on his arrival (October 8, 1793) declared "that it was by persuasion, rather than by force, that he would conquer; that his majesty will only have subjects worthy of his protection, and of the favors and advantages which the British government secures to them. His majesty," added this commander, "is willing to preserve to you all your rights: I accordingly declare to you, in his royal name, that, as soon as peace shall be established, you will have a colonial assembly to regulate, establish, and enable you to exercise, those rights."

The attempts of reducing this island cost many lives: we are informed by Mr. Bryan Edwards, in his "History of the West Indies," (vol. iii.) that the number left alive, and fit for service, at the end of the year 1797, was not more than 3000 men. About 12,000 land forces and 500 seamen had, in the space of three years, fallen a sacrifice to that pestilential climate.

Much had been said, and in very pompous language, respecting an invasion of Britain by France; yet the first seeming attempt was such as to excite ridicule rather than terror. The coast of Devonshire was thrown into alarm on the 22d of February, by the appearance of three frigates, which entered the small harbour of Ilfracombe, scuttled some merchant ships, and attempted to destroy some other vessels. From this they soon departed, standing across the Channel towards Pembroke. They were found to consist of two frigates and two smaller vessels, steering from the British channel to turn St. David's Head, from whence they steered towards Fishguard, and came to an anchor in a small bay, where they hoisted French colors, and put out their boats.

Having effected a debarkation on the morning of the 23d, near Fishguard, numbers of them travelled the country in search of provisions, plundering the houses they found abandoned, but offering little molestation to the inhabitants who remained in their dwellings. The number of men who had landed were about 1500. The gentlemen in the neighbourhood made great exertions to repel this formidable invasion, and before night they had collected about 700 men, consisting of militia, fencibles, or yeomen cavalry, who were joined by a number of peasants armed with scithes and pitchforks. Lord Cawdor assumed the command of these troops; but, on BOOK II. approaching the enemy, he received the following letter.

CHAP. XI.

1797.

Cardigan Bay, 5th of Ventose, 5th year of the Republic.

SIR,

"The circumstances, under which the body of French troops commanded by me were landed at this place, render it unnecessary to attempt any military operations, as they would tend only to bloodshed and pillage.

"The officers of the whole corps have therefore intimated their desire of entering into a negotiation, upon principles of humanity, for a surrender.

"If you are influenced by similar considerations, you may signify the same by the bearer; and, in the mean time, hostilities shall cease.

"Health and respect. "TATE,

"Chef de Brigade."

"To the officer commanding his Britannic Majesty's troops."

A capitulation having been agreed to, about noon on the ensuing day they laid down their arms, and surrendered themselves as prisoners of war.

When the frigates had completed the debarkation, they sailed for the coast of France, but were captured, on the 9th of the ensuing month, by the St. Fiorenzo and Nymphé frigates. They proved to be La Resistance of 48 guns, and La Constance of 24. The men landed were thought by some to be insurgents from La Vendée, whose principles made it dangerous to place confidence in them. Others supposed them to be galley-slaves, and criminals collected from the prisons of Brest, and landed by way of insult, as if the French government meant to billet them on the enemy.

CHAPTER 1.

State of France and of Great Britain.—Anxiety of the English for Peace.—His British Majesty insulted.—Failure of Lord Malmesbury's Negotiations.—Mutinies on board the Channel Fleet and North Sea Fleet.—Petition from the City of Westminster to His Majesty for the Dismission of his Ministers.—Arrogance of the French Government.—Another unsuccessful Negotiation.—His Majesty's Declaration on the Continuance of the War.

DURING some of the military and naval operations recorded in our preceding book, certain events occurred, both in France and in England, which demand the reader's attention. It has been the practice of late historians, and even of some of the present day, to give the pith of their narratives in notes, which, being reckoned extraneous matter, are generally, if not always, overlooked by ordinary readers. We shall, however, devote a chapter to those occurrences, which could not have been united with the former without breaking the chain, and grossly deviating from the scene of action.

Although, on the first establishment of the new constitution of France, the persons who composed the executive government seemed inclined to favor the faction of the Jacobins, conceiving it expedient to adopt measures of severity with respect to those concerned in the insurrection of Vendemaire, who were regarded as adverse to the Jacobins, it was soon apparent that the bulk of this dangerous faction would never peaceably acquiesce in the present, nor indeed any permanent order of things. The greater part of the Jacobins, who had been placed in offices immediately under government, were gradually dismissed; the police and municipality of Paris, where they possessed a decided superiority, underwent a severe examination; the military force of that great city was reformed; and the alarm excited by these different measures was at length wrought up to purposes of vengeance, when their assemblies were dispersed by order of government, and their places of meeting shut up. For the space of six weeks, confused rumours prevailed of a projected insurrection of the Jacobins. On the evening of the 9th of May, 1796, considerable bodies of cavalry were stationed in the vicinity of the Luxemburg and the Thuilleries, by order of the directory; and the Pont Neuf was strongly guarded. On the morning of the 10th, the guard of the directory and the legislative bodies were tripled, the streets were patrolled, and the gardens of the Luxemburg were shut. On the same day the council of five hundred received a message from the executive directory, informing them that a horrible conspiracy was prepared to burst forth the following morning at break of day; that the design of the conspirators was to murder the executive directory, the members of the two councils, the constituted authorities of Paris, and to deliver up the city to pillage and massacre; and that the leading conspirators were actually seized. Among these persons were Drouet, remarkable as the man who had arrested the king in his flight to Varennes; Laignelot, an ex-deputy of the national convention, and a member of the infamous committee of public safety; Charles Ricard; and Babeuf, (styling himself Gracchus Babeuf,) once the associate of Marat, of infamous memory, who had fallen under the virtuous dagger of a modern Judith; Rossignol, ex-general of La Vendée; Amar, a notorious Terrorist, &c. were also of the number; but Vadier, Robert Lindet, and Pache, effected their escape. Judging from the papers transmitted by the directory to the council, none of the various conspiracies which had convulsed the republic was more daring than the present, or had been more completely organized; a national convention, committees of general and public safety, and a municipality of Paris, were to be immediately formed, and to administer in a revolutionary manner till the establishment of the constitution of 1793. No doubt the aim of the directory was to make the present conspiracy BOOK III. appear as black and atrocious as possible; and there is, indeed, reason to believe, that the foundations of it were both deeply laid and widely extended; but the timely discovery of this plot occasioned the public alarm to subside almost as soon as it was excited. Babeuf, and numbers of his accomplices, were tried by the high criminal court at Vendomme, convicted, and put to death. Insurrections and disturbances in different parts of the country, excited by the Jacobins, were quickly suppressed, the authority of the new government being, as usual in such cases, more firmly established by this abortive attempt to subvert it. But the Jacobins and royalists throughout France joined in exclaiming against the tyranny of the directory, and in representing this plot, popularly styled the conspiracy of Floreal, as having no real existence.

The affairs of finance at this period very much engaged the attention of the French government. So much depreciated was the credit of the assignats, that this paper was become entirely useless. An order was of course made to dispose of the remainder of the national domains at a low value, for which a new paper, called mandats, was to be received as money; but this also fell to a greater degree of depreciation than the assignats. A forced loan was the next measure to which they had recourse, but this was very unproductive; and the hopes of the British minister were again cherished by the loud complaints of the directory, respecting the impoverished state of the public revenue.

The great expences and severe hardships which the war with France occasioned, induced many in Great Britain to wish for peace, and consequently to deprecate the measures of government. The city of London presented the following petition to parliament.

"Your petitioners conceive, that none of the ends proposed by the present war either have been, or appear likely to be obtained, although it has been carried on at an unprecedented expence to this country. Your petitioners, from their present view of public measures, presume humbly, but firmly, to express to this honorable house, their decided conviction, that the principle upon which the war appears now to be carried on, neither is nor can be essential to the prosperity, the liberty, or the glory of the British empire. Your petitioners, therefore, humbly pray that this honorable house, disclaiming all right of interfering in the internal concerns of France, will be pleased to take such measures as they in their wisdom shall think proper, for the purpose of promoting a speedy peace."

This example of London was followed by York, Norwich, and some other cities; but they were not so general as to be productive of any effect; and the friends of administration found means to procure a number of counter petitions, which fully relied on the wisdom of government to treat for the restoration of peace at the most proper period.

The next British parliament was summoned to assemble on the 29th of October, 1795, which was during the mournful period that every article of consumption was extravagantly high-priced; and the idea prevailed universally among the lower classes of the community, that ministers would never listen to any rational terms of peace, which created and cherished a spirit of discontent; and, without the blessings of peace, they had small hopes of enjoying those of plenty. At the usual hour on the day appointed, his majesty went from the palace of St. James's to the parliament-house. An immense concourse of people met in the Park, whether from accident or design it is difficult to determine, but they very soon discovered symptoms of bad humour and dissatisfaction. As his majesty's coach passed along the Mall, the multitude vehemently exclaimed, "Peace! Peace! Bread! No Pitt! No war!" After this, stones were thrown at the carriage of the sovereign as it went past the Horse-guards, and through the streets of Westminster; and from a house in Margaret-street a bullet was discharged, conjectured to be from an air-gun, as it was not attended with any noise, while something made its way with great velocity through the glass of the coach.

When the king returned from the house of peers, no additional force was ordered for his protection; and the multitude repeated their audacious attacks. His majesty having gone into his private carriage, to join the royal family at the palace of the queen, a part of the mob nearly demolished the state-coach on its return to the Mews, while the rest even attempted to stop the king's private coach, and force open the doors. The sovereign, at this last attack, appeared to have been deprived of his characteristic firmness, and fell a prey to consternation and amazement. A party of the life-guards arrived at this critical juncture, by whose exertions the multitude were dispersed, and the king reached the house of her majesty, not without both difficulty and danger.

Immediately after these daring outrages, a proclamation was issued, which offered a reward of a thousand pounds, to be given on the conviction of any person concerned in the assault; yet it is most astonishing, that not an individual could ever be found who was proved to have had any hand in this disgraceful transaction. A journeyman printer, indeed, of the name of Kidd Wake, together with some others, were found guilty of hissing and disturbing his majesty's peace, and were punished with just severity. This business being disposed of, his majesty's speech was taken into consideration, in which he declared, "That it was a great satisfaction to him to reflect, that, notwithstanding the many events unfavorable to the common cause, the prospect resulting from the general situation of affairs had in many important respects been materially improved in the course of the present year. That the distraction and anarchy which had so long prevailed in France had now led to a crisis, of which it was as yet impossible to see the issue. Should this crisis terminate in any order of things compatible with the tranquillity of other countries, and afford a reasonable expectation of security and permanence in any treaty which might be concluded, the appearance of a disposition to negotiate for a general peace, on just and suitable terms, would not fail to be met on his part with an earnest desire to give it the speediest effect." At the conclusion of his speech, the king mentioned the anxiety and uneasiness he felt at the extremely high price of grain, recommending it to the parliament to adopt such measures as might be the means of alleviating the present distress.

Mr. Fox moved an amendment to the address; and, after enumerating the different disasters of the campaign, and experimentally stating that the French were capable of maintaining the accustomed relations of amity and peace with other countries, "prayed his majesty that such terms of peace should be offered to the French republic as should be consistent with the honor of the crown, and with the security and interests of the people." This amendment was opposed by Mr. Pitt, who considered the finances of France as in a state absolutely undone, since 720,000,000 of assignats were then in circulation. They were not in a condition for carrying on war during another campaign, which led him to think that the situation of things was very much improved. He extolled the new constitution of France, when contrasted with those forms which preceded it; and allowed that every objection to the form and principles of that government, considered as obstacles to negotiation, would be entirely at an end: but he contended that the manifestation of any premature desire for peace, would, in present circumstances, be the most fatal event that could possibly happen. The Duke of Bedford proposed an amendment to the address in the house of Peers, similar to Mr. Fox in the lower house; but both of them were negatived by great majorities.

A number of expedients were pointed out in the early part of the session, in order to alleviate the distresses of the poor, by diminishing the price of bread-corn. Bills were brought in for changing the existing laws respecting the assize of bread; to prevent the manufacture of starch from wheat, distillation from any articles of grain, &c.—In so far as these laws had any operation, they were admitted to be beneficial.

On the 8th of December, Mr. Pitt delivered a message from his majesty to the house of commons, making mention of "the establishment of such a form of government in France as appeared capable of maintaining the relations of peace and amity, and expressive of his readiness to meet any negotiation on the part of the enemy, with a desire to give it the speediest effect in producing a peace. Next day, Mr. Pitt moved an address in reply, which gave rise to a debate, when an amendment was proposed by Mr. Sheridan, denying that any change in the French government could affect the principle of negotiation, and requesting that the treaty might be entered on immediately. The amendment was declared to be "perfectly consistent with the spirit of the message, which admitted that Great Britain might now safely treat. Where, then, could be the objection to declare that she would treat with France? It was a vulgar, and indeed the most vulgar of opinions, to suppose that it was disadvantageous to a power at war to be the first to offer terms of peace. The experience of history proved the reverse. Were peace now offered on reasonable terms, it would not be possible for the French government to refuse their assent." Mr. Pitt, however, insisted that he should be left unfettered, and the amendment was of course negatived without a division.

As the British government seemed to adopt no measures towards a pacification, Mr. Grey moved, on the 15th of February, 1796, for an address to his majesty, beseeching him to communicate to the executive government of France, his willingness to meet any disposition to negotiate, with an ardent desire to give it the speediest effect. If ministers intended to prove themselves sincere in their desire for peace, they should make direct proposals, and acknowledge the republic without reserve. It might perhaps be said, that this was humiliating to such as were in the habit of employing the language of disdain; but ministers ought to learn humility from misfortune, and submit to an alternative which had been rendered unavoidable from their own folly. Mr. Pitt recommended confidence in ministers, and said, that if it was improper to confide in such a manner, it would be proper to apply to his majesty to have them removed. After putting the question, the motion of Mr. Grey was negatived by a great majority.

The Earl of Guildford in the house of peers, and Mr. Fox in the house of commons, moved an address to his majesty on the 10th of May, which declared, "That the duty incumbent upon parliament no longer permitted them to dissemble their deliberate opinion, that the distress, difficulty, and peril, to which this country is now subjected, have arisen from the misconduct of the king's ministers, and are likely to subsist and increase as long as the same principles which have hitherto guided these ministers, shall continue to prevail in the councils

BOOK III. of Great Britain.—It is painful to us to remind your majesty of the situation of your dominions at the beginning of the war, and of the high degree of prosperity to which the skill and industry of your majesty's subjects had, under the safeguard of a free constitution, raised the British empire, since it can only fill your mind with the melancholy recollection of prosperity abused, and of opportunities of securing permanent advantages wantonly rejected. Nor shall we presume to wound your majesty's benevolence, by dwelling on the fortunate consequences which might have arisen from the mediation of Great Britain between the powers then at war, which might have insured the permanence of our prosperity, while it preserved all Europe from the calamities which it has since endured,—a mediation which the kingdom was so well fitted to carry on with vigor and dignity, by its power, its character, and the nature of its government, happily removed at an equal distance from the contending extremes of licentiousness and tyranny.—From this neutral and impartial system of policy your majesty's ministers were induced to depart by certain measures of the French government, of which they complained as injurious and hostile to this country. With what justice those complaints were made, we are not now called upon to determine, since it cannot be pretended that the measures of France were of such a nature as to preclude the possibility of adjustment by negotiation; and it is impossible to deny that the power which shuts up the channel of accommodation must be the real aggressor in war. To reject negotiation is to determine on hostilities; and, whatever may have been the nature of the points at question between us and France, we cannot but pronounce the refusal of such an authorised communication with that country, as might have terminated the dispute, to be the true and immediate cause of the rupture which followed.

"Nor can we forbear to remark, that the pretences under which your majesty's ministers then haughtily refused such authorised communications, have been sufficiently exposed by their own conduct in since submitting to a similar intercourse with the same government.

"The misguided policy which thus rendered the war inevitable, appears to have actuated your majesty's ministers in their determination to continue it at all hazards. At the same time we cannot but observe, that the obstinacy with which they have adhered to their desperate system, is not more remarkable than their versatility in the pretexts upon which they have justified it. At one period the strength, at another the weakness of the enemy, have been urged as motives for continuing the war; the success as well as the defeats of the allies have contributed only to prolong the contest; and hope and despair have equally served to involve us still deeper in the horrors of war, and to entail upon us an endless train of calamities.

"After the original professed objects had been obtained by the expulsion of the French armies from the territories of Holland and the Austrian Netherlands, we find your majesty's ministers, influenced either by arrogance or by infatuated ambition and the vain hope of conquests, which, if realized, could never compensate to the nation for the blood and treasure by which they must be obtained, rejecting, unheard, the overtures made by the executive council of France, at a period when circumstances were so eminently favorable to your majesty and your allies, that there is every reason to suppose, that a negotiation, commenced at such a juncture, must have terminated in an honorable and advantageous peace; to the prospects arising from such an opportunity, they preferred a blind and obstinate perseverance in a war which could scarce have any remaining object, but the unjustifiable purpose of imposing upon France a government disapproved of by the inhabitants of that country; and such was the infatuation of these ministers, that, far from being able to frame a wise and comprehensive system of policy, they even rejected the few advantages that belonged to their unfortunate scheme. The general existence of a design to interpose in the internal government, was too manifest not to rouse into actual hostility the national zeal of that people; but their particular projects were too equivocal to attract the confidence, or procure the co-operation of those Frenchmen who were disaffected to the government of their country. The nature of these plans was too clear not to provoke formidable enemies, but their extent was too ambiguous to conciliate useful friends.

"We beg leave farther to represent to your majesty, that, at subsequent periods, your ministers have suffered the most favorable opportunities to escape of obtaining an honorable and advantageous pacification. They did not avail themselves, as it was their duty to have done, of the unbroken strength of the general confederacy which had been formed against France, for the purpose of giving effect to overtures for negotiation. They saw the secession of several powerful states from that confederacy; they suffered it to dissolve without an effort for the attainment of a general pacification. They loaded their country with the odium of having engaged in a combination, charged with the most questionable and unjustifiable views, without availing themselves of that combination for procuring favorable conditions of peace. That, from this fatal neglect, the progress of hostilities has only served to establish the evils which might certainly have been avoided by negotiation, but which are now confirmed by the events of the war. We have felt, that the unjustifiable and impracticable attempt to establish royalty in France by force, has only proved fatal to its unfortunate supporters. We have seen with regret the subjugation of Holland, and the aggrandizement of the French republic; and we have to lament the alteration in the state of Europe, not only from the successes of the French, but from the formidable acquisitions of some of the allied powers on the side of Poland,—acquisitions alarming from their magnitude, but still more so from the manner in which they have been made: thus fatally learning that the war hastened alone to establish the very evils for the prevention of which it was avowedly undertaken.

“On a review of so many instances of gross and flagrant misconduct, proceeding from the same pernicious principles, and directed with incorrigible obstinacy to the same mischievous ends, we deem ourselves bound, in duty to your majesty and to our constituents, to declare that we see no rational hope of redeeming the affairs of the kingdom, but by the adoption of a system radically and fundamentally different from that which has produced our present calamities.

“Unless your majesty’s ministers shall, from a real conviction of past errors, appear inclined to regulate their conduct upon such a system, we can neither give any credit to the sincerity of their professions of a wish for peace, nor repose any confidence in them for conducting a negotiation to a prosperous issue. Odious as they are to an enemy, who will still believe them secretly to cherish those unprincipled and chimerical projects which they have been compelled in public to disavow, contemptible in the eyes of all Europe from the display of insincerity which has marked their conduct, our only hopes rest on your majesty’s royal wisdom and unquestioned affection for your people; that you will be graciously pleased to adopt maxims of policy more suitable to the circumstances of the times, than those by which your majesty’s ministers appeared to have been governed, and to direct your servants to take measures which, by differing essentially, as well in their tendency as in the principles upon which they are founded, from those which have hitherto marked their conduct, may give this country some reasonable hope, at no very distant period, of the establishment of a peace suitable to the interests of Great Britain, and likely to preserve the tranquillity of Europe.”

This address gave rise to much interesting debate in both houses of parliament. At length the English ministry condescended to enter into a negotiation, and two unsuccessful attempts were made during the spring and winter; the first by means of Mr. Wickham, ambassador to the Helvetic states, and the next through the medium of Lord Malmesbury, who repaired to Paris expressly for that purpose. On the 24th of October, his lordship presented a memorial, stating, “that in the opinion of his Britannic majesty, the principle of compensation would best serve as a basis for the definitive arrangements of peace. Great Britain, from the uninterrupted success of her naval war, finds herself in a situation to have no restitution to demand of France, from which, on the contrary, she has taken establishments and colonies of the highest importance, and of value almost incalculable. But, on the other hand, France has made, on the continent of Europe, conquests to which his majesty can be the less indifferent, as the most important interests of his people, and the most sacred engagements of his crown, are essentially implicated therein. The magnanimity of the king, his inviolable good faith, and his desire to restore repose to so many nations, induced him to consider this situation of affairs as affording the means of procuring for all the belligerent powers just and equitable terms of peace, and such as are calculated to ensure for the time to come the general tranquillity. It is on this footing, then, that he purposes to negotiate, by offering to make compensation to France, by proportionable restitutions, for those arrangements to which she will be called upon to consent, in order to satisfy the just demands of the king’s allies, and to preserve the political balance of Europe.”

The executive directory, through the medium of M. de la Croix, the minister for foreign affairs, returned the following answer, which was extremely embarrassing. They said, “that if Lord Malmesbury would have agreed to treat separately, as he was formally authorised by the tenor of his credentials, the negotiation might have been considerably abridged; that the necessity of balancing with the interests of the two powers, those of the allies of Great Britain, multiplies the combinations, increases the difficulties, tends to the formation of a congress, the forms of which, it is known, are always tardy, and requires the accession of powers which hitherto have displayed no desire of accommodation, and have not given to Lord Malmesbury himself, according to his own declaration, any power to stipulate for them. Nevertheless, the executive directory, animated with an ardent desire of putting a stop to the scourge of war, and to prove that they will not reject any means of reconciliation, declares, that, as soon as Lord Malmesbury shall exhibit to the minister for foreign affairs sufficient powers from the allies of Great Britain, for stipulating for their respective interests, accompanied by a promise on their part to subscribe to whatever shall be concluded in their names, the executive directory will hasten to give an answer to the specific propositions which shall be submitted to them; and

The directory seem to have imagined, that the court of London did not seriously intend to accede to the basis of pacification which M. Barthelemy had stated to Mr. Wickham; and in their reply to the memorial of Lord Malmesbury, they plainly indicated their suspicions, "that the British government had a double object in view;—to prevent by general propositions the partial propositions of other powers, and to obtain from the people of England the means of continuing the war, by throwing an odium upon the republic;" and they declared without any mental reservation, "that they could not but perceive, that the proposition of Lord Malmesbury is nothing more than a renewal, under more amicable forms, of the former proposal of Mr. Wickham."

Lord Malmesbury transmitted a second note on the 12th of November to the directory, in which, conformably to the orders he had received during the interval, his lordship protested, "that, with regard to the offensive and injurious insinuations contained in that paper, the king had deemed it far beneath his dignity to permit an answer to be made to them on his part in any manner whatsoever. As to the difficulty stated by the directory, it is justly said, that there could be no question but of a negotiation, which shall combine the interests and pretensions of all the powers who make a common cause with the king in the present war. In the course of such a negotiation, the intervention, or, at least, the participation, of these powers will doubtless become absolutely necessary; but it appears, that the waiting for a formal and definitive authority on the part of the allies of the king, before Great Britain and France begin to discuss even provisionally the principles of the negotiation, would be to create a very useless delay." The same day, M. de la Croix, in a note to Lord Malmesbury, declared himself "charged by the executive directory to invite him to point out, without the smallest delay, and expressly, the objects of reciprocal compensation which he had to propose." To this Lord Malmesbury made answer, "that, before the formal acceptance of this principle, or the proposal on the part of the executive directory of some other principle, which might equally serve as the basis of a negotiation for a general peace, he could not be authorised to designate the objects of reciprocal compensation."

After some sharp but fruitless altercation, M. de la Croix informed Lord Malmesbury on the 27th of November, "that the proposal, contained in his note of the 12th of November, involved in it an acknowledgement of the principle of compensation; and that principle being now formally recognized, he was again invited to give a speedy and categorical answer to the proposal." But it now appeared, that Lord Malmesbury came totally unfurnished with any plan or projet of peace. To the astonishment of the directory, the ambassador, who had been expressly required to bring with him full powers to conclude a peace definitively with the republic, was obliged again to consult his court, and the negotiation was totally at a stand till the 17th of December, when Lord Malmesbury stated, in a formal and confidential memorial, the terms agreeably to which it was conceived that a treaty might be concluded on the basis of mutual compensation.

These terms imported, 1st, that France should restore all her conquests made in any of the dominions of the emperor or in Italy, and that Great Britain should render back all her acquisitions gained from that power in the East and West Indies. The second article of the projet nevertheless stipulated for "the re-establishment of peace between the Germanic empire and France, by a suitable arrangement, conformable to the respective interests and general safety of Europe." The projet proceeded to state, that if, in addition to the entire restitution of the French colonies by Great Britain, his majesty were to waive the right given him, by the express stipulations of the treaty of Utrecht, of opposing the cession of the Spanish part of St. Domingo to France, his majesty would then demand, in return for this concession, a compensation which might secure, at least in some degree, the maintenance of the balance of the respective possessions in that part of the world." It was added, that "restitutions of any kind in favor of Holland, unless France would on her part reinstate that republic in all respects in the same political situation in which it stood before the war," as Lord Malmesbury expressly declared, in a second memorial delivered at the same time, "could be admitted in so far only as they shall be compensated by arrangements calculated to contribute to the security of the Austrian Netherlands."

Lord Malmesbury had a long conference with M. de la Croix on the subject of these memorials, of which his lordship transmitted a minute account to the court of St. James's. The following are the most important particulars. The French minister said, "that the plan of pacification proposed appeared to him to be liable to insurmountable objections, as requiring much more than it conceded, and, in the event, not leaving France in a situation of proportional greatness to the other powers of Europe. He said, the act of their constitution made it impossible for the republic to do what was required. The Austrian Netherlands were annexed to it; they could not be disposed of without throwing the nation into all the confusion which must follow a convocation of the primary assemblies; and that he was surprised at the demand, since he had in some of the late conversations fully explained the nature of their constitution." In return to this, Lord Malmesbury strongly urged, that there existed a droit public in Europe, paramount to any droit public they might think proper to establish within their own dominions; and that an obligation, at least equally binding, and equally public, existed between the king and the emperor, obliging them not to lay down their arms without the restitution of all the territories belonging to either before the war; that, in case of necessity, arising from losses and misfortunes, the power of cession must inhere in the executive government; and if in that case, it equally existed in all others.

As M. de la Croix was rather perplexed in his attempts to refute this reasoning, he changed his ground, and affirmed, "that, from the relative situation of the adjacent countries, the present government of France would be reprehensible in the extreme, and deserve impeachment, if they ever suffered the Netherlands to be separated from their dominions; that Russia, Austria, and Prussia, by the partition of Poland, had increased their power to a most formidable degree; that England, by its conquests, and by the activity and judgement with which it governed its colonies, had redoubled its strength. Your Indian empire alone," said M. de la Croix, vehemently, "has enabled you to subsidize all the powers of Europe against us, and your monopoly of trade has put you in possession of a fund of inexhaustible wealth." He farther declared, "that Belgium, by belonging to France, would remove what had been the source of all wars for two centuries past; and the Rhine, being the natural boundary of France, would ensure the tranquillity of Europe for two centuries to come." He at last intimated, "that an equivalent might be found for the emperor in the secularization of the three ecclesiastical electorates, and several bishoprics in Germany and Italy." He spoke of appointing new electors, and named the Stadtholder, and the Dukes of Wirtemberg and Brunswick as proper persons to replace the three ecclesiastical electors. Lord Malmesbury maintained, that such ideas were totally incompatible with the principle laid down by the emperor and king, as the basis of the peace; intimating, at the same time, that if France agreed to the proposals made on all the other points, it would not be impossible that some increase of territory might be ceded to her on the Germanic side of her frontiers; and that this, in addition to the duchy of Savoy, Nice, and Avignon, would be a great acquisition of strength and power. M. de la Croix here again reverted to the constitution, and said, that these countries were already annexed to France. Lord Malmesbury replied, "that it was impossible, in the negotiation which they were beginning, for the other powers to take it up from any period but that which immediately preceded the war; and that any acquisition or diminution of territory which had taken place among the belligerent powers, since it first broke out, must necessarily become subject-matter for negotiation, and be balanced against each other in the final arrangements of a general peace."—"You then persist," said M. de la Croix, "in applying this principle to Belgium?" His lordship answered, "most certainly; and I should not deal fairly with you if I hesitated to declare, in the outset of our negotiation, that on this point you must entertain no expectation that his majesty will relax, or ever consent to see the Netherlands remain a part of France:" to which M. de la Croix made answer, that "he saw no prospect, in this case, of their ideas ever meeting, and he despaired of the success of the negotiation."

During this time, Mr. Burke, who was no longer a member of the house of commons, but had retired with a pension of 4000*l.* a year, published his "Thoughts on a Regicide Peace." Falling into a lingering illness, he died, July 8, 1797, whose biography we shall, in a distant book, unite with that of Mr. Fox. Much about the same time, the King of Sweden came of age, and that extraordinary woman, the Empress of Russia, paid the debt of nature.

The new parliament of Great Britain was assembled at a season of the year uncommonly early, viz. the 6th of October, 1796. The speech from the throne gave great satisfaction, as it afforded the prospect of returning peace. "I have omitted no endeavours," said the king, "for setting on foot negotiations to restore peace to Europe, and to secure for the future the general tranquillity. The steps which I have taken for this purpose have at length opened the way to an immediate and direct negotiation, the issue of which must either produce the desirable end of a just, honorable, and solid peace, for us and for our allies, or must prove beyond dispute to what cause alone the prolongation of the calamities of war must be ascribed. The fortune of the war on the continent has been various, and the progress of the French armies threatened, at one period, the utmost danger to all Europe; but, from the honorable and dignified perseverance of my ally the emperor, and from the intrepidity, discipline, and invincible spirit of the Austrian forces, under the auspicious conduct of the Archduke Charles, such a turn has lately been given to the course of the war, as may inspire a well-grounded confidence that the final result of the campaign will prove more disastrous to the enemy than its commencement and progress for a time were favorable to their hopes."

CHAP. I.

Evident symptoms of disaffection appeared on board the Channel fleet, in the month of February, 1797; and Lord Howe, the seaman's friend, received some anonymous letters, the composition of which was by no means despicable. To his lordship the seamen stated their grievances, and requested his interest in obtaining redress. Their complaint had chiefly a reference to the indifferent quality of their provisions, and their very short allowance, although the expenditure of the public money, by the navy and victualling offices, was truly enormous. These just complaints were unhappily neglected; in consequence of which, when the fleet returned to port on the 31st of March, the sailors of all the ships corresponded by letter, and unanimously agreed never to weigh anchor again till their grievances were redressed.

Lord Bridport, on the 14th of April, made the signal for putting to sea, not being suspicious of a mutiny, when the sailors on board his own ship ran up the shrouds, and gave three cheers, which the crews of the other ships instantly returned.—Each ship then appointed delegates to represent the whole fleet, who held their meetings in the admiral's cabin; and having drawn up petitions, expressive of their grievances, these were presented to the admirals then on the spot. They sought only an increase of wages and the establishment of some regulations respecting their provisions; and they expressed a hope that a favorable answer would be given to their petitions before they received orders again to put to sea, unless the enemy should be understood to be at sea likewise. On the 17th of the month all the men were publicly sworn to be true to the cause in which they had embarked.

On the following day, a committee of the admiralty, with Earl Spencer at their head, arrived at Portsmouth, making several propositions, for the purpose of reducing the men to obedience.—They next went on board the Queen Charlotte, holding a conference with the delegates from the fleet, who hesitated not to declare, that no arrangement would be final which had not the sanction of the king and parliament, guaranteed by a proclamation for a general pardon. The admiral returned to his ship on the 23d of the month, hoisted his flag again, and, having delivered a short address to the crew, he assured them that he had in his possession a redress of all their grievances, with his majesty's pardon for the whole of the offenders. These offers were accepted after some deliberation, and the whole returned with cheerfulness to the performance of their duty. But unpardonable folly on the part of those in power having neglected to bring this business in time before parliament, the spirit of mutiny became again apparent; and when, on the 7th of May, Lord Bridport once more made the signal for putting to sea, every ship at St. Helen's refused to obey him. Admiral Colpoys, who employed his efforts to restore discipline and subordination, was put under arrest; and in a skirmish, which took place between the seamen and marines, several lives were lost.

When the news of this alarming disobedience reached the metropolis, Mr. Pitt moved, on the 8th of May, for the sum of 372,000*l.* as an increase of pay and allowance of provision for nine months, calculated from the 1st of April, and begged that the motion might pass the house by a silent vote, to avoid every species of misrepresentation. To this Mr. Fox said, "that it was by silence and the want of discussion the mischief had happened. If, when it was first known that the seamen were dissatisfied, the house had been considered as entitled to the confidence of ministers, and the business had been properly discussed, the events of Easter would not have taken place. But the delay which had intervened seemed purposely meant to give scope for misrepresentation." After a very angry debate, the resolution was fortunately, though not quickly, carried.

Lord Howe was immediately sent to Portsmouth with the pleasing intelligence, carrying along with him the act of parliament, and his majesty's plenary pardon for all those who should return to their duty without farther delay. This celebrated commander was received with every demonstration of affection and applause; the officers received their former commands, the flag of mutiny and disaffection was instantly struck, and the fleet went to sea, for the purpose of engaging the enemy.

Although this mutiny was thus happily suppressed, the example was unfortunately followed by the North Sea fleet, of eleven sail of the line, then lying at the Nore, the commander of which was Admiral Buckner. These mutineers, copying the example of those at Portsmouth, made choice of delegates from every ship, and a man of the name of Parker became their president. Having confined their principal officers, or sent them on shore, they transmitted certain conditions to the admiralty, declaring that they would not return to obedience if they were not unconditionally complied with. Many of them were totally different from those which were insisted on at Portsmouth, and wholly inconsistent with the discipline of the navy. A red flag was hoisted by the mutineers on board the Sandwich, the flag-ship of the admiral, on the 23d of May, and dropped down to the Great Nore, when the mutiny arose to a most alarming height, and a deputation of the lords of the admiralty, headed by Earl Spencer, went to Sheerness, making a tender of the same terms which had been gratefully accepted by the fleet at Portsmouth. These delegates, however, insisted that their terms should be complied with unconditionally before they would submit to have any intercourse whatever with the committee from the admiralty; in consequence of which the lords departed, but not till they maintained, with great firmness, "that the seamen were to expect no concessions whatever, further than what had been already made by the legislature."

In order to obtain their demands, the mutineers attempted to block up the Thames, thus putting an entire stop to the London trade; and, from the ships which were detained by them, they procured water and provisions for themselves. Government now adopted measures for enforcing submission, by strictly prohibiting all intercourse with the shore; by constructing batteries, with furnaces for red-hot balls; by preparing gun-boats; and by removing all the buoys from the mouth of the Thames, by which the mutineers were very much perplexed. The council of delegates seemed rather inclined to relent, in consequence of such terrific preparations; and Lord Northesk, who commanded the Monmouth, being released from his confinement, was trusted with a message by Parker to the king, wherever he might be, which contained the ultimatum of their resolutions. His lordship went along with Earl Spencer into the presence of his majesty, and delivered the message, after which a privy-council was held, when the requisitions of the mutineers were again positively refused. These discovered evident symptoms of apprehension when the determination of government was made known to them; and several of the ships struck the red flag on the 10th of June, and hoisted the union; but no overtures were made them. Three ships separated from the fleet on the 13th, which overwhelmed the remainder with despair; and they formed the resolution of submitting to the king's mercy. Parker was arrested, by an order from Admiral Buckner, and immediately brought to trial before a court-martial of captains in the navy, and executed on board the Sandwich in the course of a few days. Wallace, another of the mutineers, when apprehended by the soldiers, shot himself dead upon the spot with heroic desperation, which, from such a man as Parker, might have been more reasonably expected. Numbers were capitally convicted during the sitting of the court-martial, some of whom were publicly executed; and a general pardon was at last granted, from the benefit of which, however, many were excluded.

Several popular meetings were held during the spring of 1797, the object of which was to petition his majesty for the dismissal of his ministers. The petition from the city of Westminster attracted no small degree of notice, and was as follows:—

"We humbly represent to your majesty, that in the hands of these ministers nothing has succeeded. Instead of restoring monarchy in France, they have been compelled to recognize the republic there established, and to offer proposals of peace to it. Instead of dismembering their territories, they have suffered it to add to them the Netherlands, Holland, and great part of Italy and Germany: and even a part of these kingdoms, which the fleets of that republic have insulted, has only been preserved from the calamities of an invasion by the accidents of the seasons."

"In their negotiations for peace they have been equally unsuccessful. It was to be expected. When they asked for peace they were abject, but not sincere; they acknowledged their impotence, but not their errors. They discovered the most hostile dispositions towards France, at the very time they proved their utter inability to contend with her."

"When they wanted to obtain our consent to the war, they assured us it was necessary for the safety of our commerce. At this moment most of the ports of Europe are shut against us; goods, to an immense amount, are lying upon the hands of our merchants, and the manufacturing poor are starving by thousands."

"They assured us the war was necessary for the preservation of property and public credit. They have rendered every man's property subject to an order of the privy-council, and the Bank of England has stopped payment."

"They assured us that the war was necessary for the preservation of the constitution. They have destroyed its best part, which is its liberty, by oppressive restrictions upon the right of petitioning, and upon the freedom of the press; by prosecuting innocent men under false pretences; by sending money to foreign princes without the consent of parliament; while, by erecting barracks throughout the kingdom, they gave us reason to suspect their intention of finally subjecting the people to military despotism."

"They assured us that the war was necessary for the preservation of the unity of our empire. But they have so conducted, and are still conducting, themselves in Ireland, as to alienate the affections of that brave, loyal, but oppressed and persecuted nation, and to expose the most flourishing of its provinces to all the horrors of lawless military violence."

"These are no common errors; they are great crimes, and of these crimes, before God and our country, we accuse your ministers.—They have tarnished the national honor and glory; they have oppressed the poor with almost intolerable burdens; they have poisoned the intercourse of private life; they have given a fatal blow to public credit; they have divided the empire, and they have subverted the constitution."

CHAP. I.

By such petitions were the opposition members in both houses of parliament encouraged to bring forward motions of a similar nature and tendency. The Earl of Suffolk, on the 27th of March, took notice of the alarming situation of the country, and animadverted on the character of Mr. Pitt, whom he branded as in all respects incapable but in the mean arts of deluding: and declared, "that he considered it as a duty which he owed to himself, his king, and his country, to move, that an address might be presented to his majesty, humbly requesting him to dismiss from his councils his minister, the first lord of the treasury, whose pernicious measures had deprived him of the confidence of the country." Lord Grenville vindicated the character of Mr. Pitt, and said, "the failure of any of whose measures, he was certain, could be justly attributed only to those errors to which human nature was at all times liable, to those accidents which no human wisdom could prevent, or to those dispensations of Providence which no human power could control;" and he complained that the charges against him were not substantiated by proofs.

The victories which the French had obtained were occasionally made the themes of exultation by the directory. Citizen Marmont, aid-de-camp of General Bonaparte, conveyed to Paris twenty-two standards taken from the Imperialists; he was presented to the directory by the minister of war, in presence of a crowd of citizens, whom the ceremony had attracted. Marmont then addressed the directory by observing, that the twenty-two standards he presented were taken in fourteen days. The victories of the army of Italy were a sure pledge of its affection for the republic; it knew how to defend the laws and how to obey them, as well as to combat external enemies. "Deign," added he, "to consider it as one of the firmest columns of liberty; and believe, that while the soldiers composing it exist, the government will have intrepid defenders." Reyellière Lepaux, president of the directory, made an impressive reply, and presented him with a pair of pistols.

In a sitting at Bologna, called by the French, it was decided, that the senate, as well as its individual members, should receive and give only the title of Citizen. On the 16th of October, 1796, the tree of liberty was planted in the grand square, amidst the joyous acclamations of Viva la République Française, and a grand illumination took place. Some persons, however, occasioned a tumult, during which there were several excesses; but Bonaparte, having arrived, published a proclamation, in which he stated, that the constitution and the national guard would forthwith be organised. He declared himself the enemy of tyrants, but above all, the sworn foe of villains, plunderers, and anarchists; and that he was determined to order those to be shot who violated social order.

The standards taken at Arcole arrived, and were received by the Executive Directory in a public sitting. The minister of war presented Lamarois, chief of battalion, and aid-de-camp of General Bonaparte; who, after a long harangue, filled with encomiums on his commander, and his brothers in arms, was answered in the same style. "Return," said the president, "to those brave warriors, tell them the marble of the Pantheon awaits their names, and that they are already engraven on the hearts of all true Frenchmen."

Enraged at the victory obtained over Admiral De Winter by Viscount Camperdown, the Executive Directory decreed, October 26, 1797, that there should be assembled, without delay, an army, to be called the Army of England, and to be under the command of Citizen General Bonaparte. On the same day, the directory issued a proclamation to the French people, to the following purport.

"It is at London that the calamities of Europe are fabricated; it is there that we must put an end to them. Crown at length your exploits by an invasion of the island, whither your ancestors carried slavery, under William the Conqueror, and bring back thither the genius of liberty, which must land there at the same moment with the French. A lawless enemy has repelled, in fact, all the overtures which could only tend to pacification. You know this enemy; your indignation fixes on and points him out by name—it is the cabinet of St. James's—it is the most corrupting, and the most corrupted, of the governments of Europe,—it is the English government. The great nation will avenge the universe; and for that purpose, Frenchmen! more means than one present themselves to you; the most worthy, and the quickest, is a descent upon England. Thus let the Army of England go and dictate terms of peace in London! Go, gallant republicans! second the unanimous wish of the nation; go, and restore the liberty of the seas. And since the British government looks at this present moment with a ferocious smile on the calamities which have befallen the continent, and glories in its wealth, force it to pay its quota towards the expenses of the war. What a resplendent glory is held forth to the Army of England! it is sufficient to point it out."

In an address to General Bonaparte, the president of the directory made these observations. "Peace restores order; but, above all, it will procure us the inexpressible advantage of being able to consolidate the republican government, and to enable you to give a blow to the insolence of England, to the conquest of which you are called. Go then, Citizen General! crown so glorious a life by a conquest which the Great Nation owes to its insulted dignity. Let the conquerors of the Rhine, the Po, and the Tiber, follow your steps, the ocean will be proud of conveying them. He is an untamed slave who blushes at his chains; he invokes by his roarings the vengeance of the earth on the tyrant that oppresses his waves. He will combat on your side; the elements themselves submit to the man who is free. Pompey did not disdain to crush the pirates; go ye, greater than that Roman! and chain up that gigantic buccaneer, who tyrannizes over the sea; go, and punish in London outrages which have been too long unpunished."

A deputation of the merchants of Paris addressed the directory in a style of gasconade quite in unison with the bombastic professions of that government. This deputation was introduced by the minister of finance, who in his speech told the directory, "that the traders of Paris came to request the legislative body to open a loan, of which the premium should be hypothetized upon our victories. The loan may be called an English loan." The address of the deputation concluded with these words:—

"Citizen directors! the merchants of Paris, of whom we believe ourselves to be the organ, are anxious that you should transmit to the executive body a message, to invite them to open a loan, which will assure a sure and ready means to effectuate a descent upon England. This loan may be mortgaged upon an indirect imposition."

In a message, communicating this offer to the council of five hundred, the president, Barras, observed, that the fund of 40,000,000, to be raised in this manner, would be "secured on the success of the grand operation which the directory is now preparing." And, in the council, Jean de Brie observed, that the standard of victory would soon "proceed to punish Albion for its long catalogue of crimes against humanity."

Such was the arrogance of France at this period, and such her enmity against England, that she seized every opportunity of indulging her rancour.

In the course of the summer of 1797, a third attempt was made, by the British ministry, to negotiate with the French directory, and Lord Malmesbury was again nominated ambassador; but neither this, nor a similar negotiation on the part of Portugal, proved successful. The King of Great Britain was therefore pleased to publish a declaration, dated from Westminster, October 25, in which he detailed "his benevolent endeavours to restore to his people the blessings of a secure and honorable peace." After enumerating the obstacles constantly interposed by those who directed the councils of France, it stated, that "his minister had repaired to the Continent, furnished with the most ample powers, and instructed to communicate at once an explicit and detailed proposal and plan of peace, reduced into the shape of a regular treaty; just and moderate in its principles, embracing all the interests concerned, and extending to every object connected with the restoration of public tranquillity. To this proceeding, open and liberal beyond example, the conduct of his majesty's enemies opposed the most striking contrast; no counter-project has ever yet been received, and no statement of the extent and nature of the conditions on which they would conclude any peace with these kingdoms could be obtained. The points which, in pursuance of this system, the enemy proposed for separate discussion, in their first conferences with his majesty's ministers, were at once frivolous and offensive; none of them productive of any solid advantage to France, but all calculated to raise new obstacles in the way of peace. And to these demands were soon added another, in its form unprecedented, in its substance extravagant, and such as could originate only in the most determined and inveterate hostility. The principle of mutual compensation, before expressly admitted by common consent as the just and equitable basis of negotiation, was now disclaimed; every idea of moderation or reason, every appearance of justice was disregarded; and a concession was required from his majesty's plenipotentiary, as a preliminary and indispensable condition, which must at once have superseded all the objects, and precluded all the means of treating. France, after incorporating with her own dominions so large a portion of her conquests, and affecting to have deprived herself, by her own internal regulations, of the power of alienating these valuable additions of territory, did not scruple to demand from his majesty the absolute and unconditional surrender of all that the energy of his people, and the valor of his fleets and armies, had conquered in the present war, either from France or her allies. She required, that the power of Great Britain should be confined within its former limits, at the very moment when her own dominion was extended to a degree almost unparalleled in history. She insisted that, in proportion to the increase of danger, the means of resistance should be diminished; and that his majesty should give up, without compensation, and into the hands of his enemies, the necessary defences of his possessions, and the future safeguards of his empire. Nor even was this demand brought forward as constituting the terms of peace, but the price of negotiation; as the condition on which alone his majesty was to be allowed to learn what further unexplained demands were still reserved, and to what greater sacrifices these unprecedented concessions of honor and safety were to lead."

After enumerating the outrages and insults

BOOK III. committed in respect to the king's plenipotentiary, towards the conclusion of the conferences, the declaration thus concludes :

CHAP. I.

" To France, to Europe, and to the world, it must be manifest, that the French government (while they persist in their present sentiments) leave his majesty without an alternative, unless he were prepared to surrender and sacrifice to the undisguised ambition of his enemies, the honor of his crown, and the safety of his dominions. It must be manifest, that, instead of showing, on their part, any inclination to meet his majesty's pacific overtures on any moderate terms, they have never brought themselves to state any terms (however exorbitant) on which they were ready to conclude peace. They have asked, as a preliminary, (and in a form the most arrogant and offensive,) concessions which the comparative situation of the two countries would have rendered extravagant in any stage of negotiation; which were directly contrary to their own repeated professions; and which, nevertheless, they peremptorily requested to be complied with in the very outset, reserving an unlimited power of afterwards accumulating, from time to time, fresh demands, increasing in proportion to every new concession.

" On the other hand, the terms proposed by his majesty have been stated in the most clear, open, and unequivocal manner. The discussion of all the points to which they relate, or of any others which the enemy might bring forward as the terms of peace, has been, on his majesty's part, repeatedly called for, and as often promised by the French plenipotentiaries, but to this day has never yet been obtained. The rupture of the negotiation is not therefore to be ascribed to any pretensions, however inadmissible, urged as the price of peace; nor to any ultimate difference on terms however exorbitant; but to the evident and fixed determination of the enemy to prolong the contest, and to persevere, at all hazards, in their hostile designs against the prosperity and safety of these kingdoms.

" While this determination continues to prevail, his majesty's earnest wishes and endeavors to restore peace to his subjects must be fruitless. But his sentiments remain unaltered. He looks with anxious expectation to the moment when the government of France may show a disposition and spirit in any degree corresponding to his own. And he renews, even now, and before all Europe, the solemn determination, that, in spite of repeated provocations, and at the very moment when his claims have been strengthened and confirmed by that fresh success which, by the blessing of Providence, has recently attended his arms, (alluding to Admiral Duncan's victory,) he is yet ready (if the calamities of war can now be closed) to conclude peace on the same moderate and equitable principles and terms which he has before proposed: the rejection of such terms must now, more than ever, demonstrate the implacable animosity and insatiable ambition of those with whom he has to contend, and to them alone must the future consequences of the prolongation of the war be ascribed.

" If such unhappily is the spirit by which they are still actuated, his majesty can neither hesitate as to the principles of his own conduct, nor doubt the sentiments and determination of his people. He will not be wanting to them, and he is confident they will not be wanting to themselves. He has an anxious but a sacred and indispensable duty to fulfil; he will discharge it with resolution, constancy, and firmness. Deeply as he must regret the continuance of a war, so destructive in its progress, and so burthensome even in its success, he knows the character of the brave people whose interests and honor are entrusted to him. These are the first objects of his life to maintain; and he is convinced, that neither the resources nor the spirit of his kingdom will be found inadequate to this arduous contest, or unequal to the importance or value of the objects which are at stake. He trusts, that the favor of Providence, by which they have always hitherto been supported against all their enemies, will be still extended to them; and that, under this protection, his faithful subjects, by a resolute and vigorous application of the means which they possess, will be enabled to vindicate the independence of their country, and to resist, with just indignation, the assumed superiority of the enemy, against whom they have fought with the courage, success, and glory of their ancestors, and who aims at nothing less than to destroy, at once, whatever has contributed to the prosperity and greatness of the British empire—all the channels of its industry, and all the sources of its power; its security from abroad, its tranquillity at home, and, above all, that constitution, on which alone depends the undisturbed enjoyment of its religion, laws, and liberties."

CHAPTER X.

Captivity of Sir Sidney Smith.—Rancor of the French Government.—Ill-treatment of English Prisoners.—Curious and interesting Anecdotes of Sir Sidney, and his wonderful Escape.

NOTHING can more evince the malevolence of the French government towards the English nation at this period, than the ungenerous detention of Sir Sidney Smith, who was taken prisoner. This British officer, being stationed off Havre de Grace, went with the boats of his squadron on a reconnoitering expedition, and on the 18th of April captured a French lugger privateer, which, by the strong setting of the tide into the harbour, was driven above the forts. In this situation he remained the whole night, and at the dawn of day the French discovering the French lugger in tow of the English boats, an alarm was instantly given, and another lugger of superior force was warped out against the prize. This vessel he engaged for a considerable time, but her metal was so much heavier, as to render all resistance unavailing, and he had the mortification to be obliged to surrender with nineteen of his companions. The Diamond was meanwhile prevented from affording any assistance to her brave commander, by the dead calm which prevailed during the whole of the unfortunate transaction. The officers immediately sent a flag of truce to enquire whether Sir Sidney was wounded, and to request that he might be treated with kindness. The governor replied, that Sir Sidney was well, and that he should experience the utmost humanity and attention.

This promise, however, the French government was very far from ratifying. The mischief to their marine, of which he had been the instrument at Toulon, and his subsequent activity in annoying their coast, had rendered Sir Sidney particularly obnoxious to the rulers of France, who obstinately refused to exchange their prisoner.

They set up a pretence that Sir Sidney could not be considered as an ordinary prisoner of war, and should not be admitted into the ordinary exchanges. No doubt remained with the directory but that this was an act of injustice, and they therefore directly apprehended, that the English government would take revenge, by ill-treating the French prisoners in their country. The anxious eye of the directory was constantly upon the motions of the English administration; their agent was ordered to look out, and, as he did not complain, he was suspected of neglecting his duty.

M. Chareté, the French agent, had constant access to his unfortunate countrymen, and received every information as often as he wished; he was in general satisfied; and no ground of complaint arose that the government did not correct to his satisfaction. It was, however, discovered, that at Falmouth the contractor had supplied the prisoners with bread inferior to the price government paid; a circumstance that buoyed up the reputation of M. Chareté, by giving him a tale to send over to his government, of which the directory made the most ungenerous use. When the conduct of the contractor was represented, he was punished, and means taken to prevent a repetition of the same fraud; yet the directory trumpeted the story forth in their gazettes and placards, to justify the wretched manner in which they had treated the English prisoners, even before they had any such excuse to make. A Frenchman, on arriving at Nantes from an English prison, saw it stuck against the walls, that the French prisoners were fed upon dead dogs and cats, and were sometimes brought out, in great numbers, and shot to amuse the people; he declared that it was false, and that he was treated with extreme kindness; but he was told to be silent, and not dare to contradict the government.

As the French sent an agent to look over their prisoners in England, so the British government appointed Mr. Swinburne, agent, to attend to their prisoners in France; but Mr. Swinburne was not allowed access to the prisons, nor to receive any information concerning them directly, but such as the French commissaries thought proper to give.

A committee having been appointed by the English government, several persons were examined as to their treatment while prisoners in France; it appeared that little attention was paid to the comfort of those unfortunate people held in France, that their places of confinement were small, crowded, and filthy, and their allowances poor and scanty, while every article was cheap and plentiful near where they were confined. On their marches from where they were taken to the places appointed for their residence, while they were detained, they were obliged to support the soldiers, who conducted them, out of their scanty pittance, and at night were lodged in a church on wet straw, and when their release was ordered, they were marched back, paying their own expenses. When this was reported to the marine minister at Brest, by some English officers, he said, he believed all they told him, but that it was

 1797. in London, for the difference of the deficiency in what they ought to have received. Not only were the provisions curtailed for those who were ill, but even for those who were lame.

The French commissary for prisoners was examined before a committee held in London, as to the state in which he saw the different prisons in England, and he gave the highest credit to the government for the allowances they made to support the prisoners, and said, that whatever faults there were, they doubtless arose with the contractors ; at some places, he did see articles supplied not by any means equal to the price that government paid for them ; but that, on stating this to the transport-board, under whose care the prisoners were, every attention was paid to his remonstrances. It appeared, however, from the minutes of the committee, that Monsieur Chareté had written to the directory that the prison at Norman Cross was crowded to excess, and many irregularities occurred. This, however, he denied to the committee ; and it appeared, from the evidence of the medical officers who attended, and two French medical men who also assisted, that this was not the case. A great deal of cruelty and jealousy existed relative to the prisoners of war in France, which was the occasion of many unpleasant circumstances between the two nations ; but the committee resolved there was no fault to be found with those in England.

The directory well knew, that a general exchange of prisoners would free the English government from all blame ; and it was unjustly insisted upon, that the British should give up all claim to the number of prisoners that they had a right to demand in exchange for Frenchmen liberated on parole, amounting to 7019, and also give up 4000 more, above what they expected to receive any exchange for, before they could change Sir Sidney Smith for an officer of equal rank.

When Sir Sidney was taken at sea, he was accompanied by his secretary and M. de Tr——, a French gentleman, who had emigrated from his country, and who, it had been agreed, was to pass for Sir Sidney's servant, in the hope of saving his life in that disguise. Nor were their expectations frustrated ; for John, as he was called, was lucky enough to escape all suspicion.

On Sir Sidney's arrival in France, he was treated at first with unexampled rigor, and was told that he ought to be tried under a military commission, and shot as a spy. The government, however, gave orders for his removal to Paris, where he was sent to the Abbaye, and, together with his two companions in misfortune, was kept a close prisoner.

Meanwhile, the means of escape were the constant objects on which they employed their minds.

The window of their prison was toward the street, and from this circumstance they derived a hope sooner or later to effect their object.

One day, our British hero observed that a lady, who lived in an upper apartment on the opposite side of the street, seemed frequently to look towards that part of the prison where he was confined. As often as he observed her he played some tender air upon his flute, by which, and by imitating every motion that she made, he at length succeeded in fixing her attention upon him, and had the happiness of remarking, that she occasionally observed him with a glass. One morning when he saw that she was looking attentively upon him in this manner, he tore a blank leaf from an old mass-book, which was lying in his cell, and with the soot of the chimney contrived, by his finger, to describe upon it, in a large character, the letter A, which he held to the window, to be viewed by this fair sympathizing observer. After gazing upon it some little time, she nodded, to shew that she understood what it meant. Sir Sidney then touched the top of the first bar of the grating of his window, which he wished her to consider as the representative of the letter A, the second B, and so on, until he had formed from the top of the bars a corresponding number of letters ; and by touching the middle and bottom parts of them, upon a line with each other, he easily, after having inculcated the first impression of his wishes, completed a telegraphic alphabet. The process of communication was, from its nature, very slow ; but Sir Sidney had the happiness of observing, upon forming the first word, that this excellent being, who beamed before him like a guardian angel, seemed completely to comprehend it, which she expressed by an assenting movement of the head.

Frequently obliged to desist from this tacit and tedious intercourse, from the dread of exciting the curiosity of the gaolers or his fellow-prisoners, who were permitted to walk before his window, Sir Sidney occupied several days in communicating to his unknown friend his name and quality, and imploring her to procure some unknown royalist of consequence and address, sufficient for the undertaking, to effect his escape ; in the achievement of which he assured her, upon his word of honor, that, whatever cost might be incurred, would be amply reimbursed, and that the bounty and gratitude of his country would nobly remunerate those who had the talent and bravery to accomplish it. By the same means he enabled her to draw confidential and accredited bills for considerable sums of money, for the promotion of the scheme, which she applied with perfect integrity.

Other ladies endeavoured to assist our hero, with whom, under borrowed names, he used to correspond, theirs being taken from the ancient mythology; so that he had now a direct communication with Thalia, Melpomene, and Clio.

At length Sir Sidney Smith was removed to the Temple, where his three muses soon contrived means of intelligence, and every day offered him new schemes of effecting his escape. At first he eagerly accepted them all, though reflection soon destroyed the hopes to which the love of liberty had given birth. He was resolved not to leave his secretary in prison, and still less poor John, whose safety was more dear to him than his own emancipation.

In the Temple, John was allowed to enjoy a considerable degree of liberty. He was lightly dressed as an English jockey, and knew how to assume the manners that correspond with that character. Every one was fond of John, who drank and fraternized with the turnkeys, and made love to the keeper's daughter, who was persuaded he would marry her; and, as the little English jockey was not supposed to have received a very brilliant education, he had learned, by means of study, sufficiently to mutilate his native tongue. John appeared very attentive and eager in Sir Sidney's service, and always spoke to his master in a very respectful manner. Sir Sidney scolded him from time to time with much gravity; and he played his part so well, that our hero frequently found himself forgetting his friend, and seriously giving orders to the valet. At length, John's wife, Madame de Tr——, a very interesting lady, arrived at Paris, and made the most uncommon exertion to liberate them from their captivity. She dared not come, however, to the Temple, for fear of discovery; but from a neighbouring house she daily beheld her husband, who, as he walked to and fro, enjoyed alike, in secret, the pleasure of contemplating the friend of his bosom. Madame de Tr—— now communicated a plan for delivering them from prison to a sensible and courageous young man of her acquaintance, who immediately acceded to it without hesitation. This Frenchman, who was sincerely attached to his country, said to Madame de Tr——, "I will serve Sir Sidney Smith with pleasure, because I believe the English government intend to restore Louis XVIII. to the throne; but, if the commodore is to fight against France, and not for the King of France, heaven forbid that I should assist him."

Ch. L'Oiseau (for that was the name this young friend assumed) was connected with the agents of the king, then confined in the Temple, and with whom he was always contriving means of escape. It was intended they should all get off together. M. la Vilheurnois, being condemned only to a year's imprisonment, was resolved not to quit his present situation; but his brother and Duverne de Presle were to follow their example. Every thing was prepared for the execution of their project. The means proposed by Ch. L'Oiseau appeared practicable, and they resolved to adopt them. A hole, twelve feet long, was to be made in a cellar adjoining to the prison, and the apartments to which the cellar belonged were at their disposal. Mademoiselle D——, rejecting every prudential consideration, generously came to reside there for a week, and, being young, the other lodgers attributed to her alone the frequent visits of Ch. L'Oiseau. Thus every thing seemed to favor their wishes. No one in the house in question seemed to have any suspicions; and the amiable little child Mademoiselle D—— had with her, and who was only seven years old, was so far from betraying their secret, that she, always beat a little drum and made a noise while the work was going on in the cellar.

Meanwhile L'Oiseau had continued his labors a considerable time without any appearance of day-light, and he was apprehensive he had attempted the opening considerably too low. It was necessary, therefore, that the wall should be sounded; and for this purpose a mason was required. Madame de Tr—— recommended one, and Ch. L'Oiseau undertook to bring him, and to detain him in the cellar till they had escaped, which was to take place that very day. The worthy mason perceived the object was to save some of the victims of misfortune, and came without hesitation. He only said, "If I am arrested, take care of my poor children."

A dreadful misfortune now frustrated all their hopes! Though the wall was sounded with the greatest precaution, the last stone fell out, and rolled into the garden of the Temple. The sentinel perceived it—the alarm was given—the guard arrived—and all was discovered. Fortunately, however, their friends had time to make their escape, and none of them were known. They had, indeed, taken their measures with the greatest care; and when the commissioners of the Bureau Central came to examine the cellar and apartment, they found only a few pieces of furniture, trunks filled with logs of wood and hay, and the hats with tri-colored cockades, provided for their flight, as those they wore were black.

This first attempt, though extremely well conducted, having failed, Sir Sidney wrote to Madame de Tr——, both to console her and their young friend, who was miserable at having foundered just as he was going into port. They were so far, however, from suffering themselves to be discouraged, that they still continued to form new schemes for their deliverance. The keeper perceived it, and Sir Sidney was frequently so open as to acknowledge the fact. "Commodore," said he, "your friends are desirous of liberating you, and they only discharge their duty. I also am doing mine, in watching you still more narrowly." Though this keeper was a man of unparalleled severity, yet he never departed from the rules of civility and politeness. He treated all the prisoners with kindness, and even piqued himself on his generosity. Various proposals were made to him, but he rejected them all, watched them the more closely, and preserved the profoundest silence.

One day, when our hero dined with him, he perceived that Sir Sidney fixed his attention on a window then partly open, and which looked into the street. Sir Sidney saw his uneasiness, and it amused him: however, to put an end to it, he said to him, laughing, "I know what you are thinking of, but fear not. It is now three o'clock. I will make a truce with you till midnight; and I give you my word of honor, that, till that time, even were the doors open, I would not escape. When that hour is past, my promise is at an end, and we are enemies again."—"Sir," replied he, "your word is a safer bond than my bars and bolts: till midnight, therefore, I am perfectly easy." When they rose from the table, the keeper took him aside, and, speaking with warmth, said, "Commodore, the Boulevard is not far. If you are inclined to take the air there, I will conduct you." Sir Sidney's astonishment was extreme; nor could he conceive how this man, who appeared so severe, and so steady, should thus suddenly make him such a proposal. He accepted it, however, and in the evening they went out.

From that time forward this confidence always continued. Whenever Sir Sidney was desirous to enjoy perfect liberty, he offered him a suspension of arms till a certain hour. This his generous enemy never refused: but when the armistice was at an end his vigilance was unbounded. Every post was examined; and if the government ordered that Sir Sidney Smith should be kept close, the order was enforced with the greatest care. Thus our hero was again free to contrive and prepare for his escape, and the keeper to treat him with the utmost rigor. This man had a very accurate idea of the obligations of honor. He often said to Sir Sidney, "Were you even under sentence of death, I would permit you to go out on your parole, because I should be certain of your return. Many very honest prisoners, and I myself among the rest, would not return in the like case; but an officer, and especially an officer of distinction, holds his honor dearer than his life. I know it to be a fact, commodore; and therefore I should be less uneasy, if you desired the gates to be always open." The keeper was right. While Sir Sidney enjoyed his liberty, he endeavoured even to lose sight of the idea of his escape; and he would have been averse to employ for that object means that had occurred to his imagination during his hours of liberty. One day he received a letter containing matter of the greatest importance, which he had the strongest desire to read; but as its contents related to his intended deliverance, he asked to return to his room, and break off the truce. The keeper, however, refused, saying, with a laugh, that he wanted to take some sleep. Accordingly he lay down, and Sir Sidney postponed the perusal of his letter till the evening. Meanwhile no opportunity of flight offered; on the contrary, the directory ordered him to be treated with rigor. The keeper punctually obeyed all the orders he received; and he who the preceding evening had granted Sir Sidney the greatest liberty, now doubled his guard, in order to exercise a more perfect vigilance.

Among the prisoners was a man condemned for certain political offences to ten years confinement, and whom all the other prisoners suspected of the detestable capacity of a spy upon his companions. Their suspicions, indeed, appeared to have some foundation, and Sir Sidney felt the greater anxiety on account of his friend John. He was, however, fortunate enough soon after to obtain his liberty. An exchange of prisoners being about to take place, Sir Sidney applied to have his servant included in the cartel; and though this request might easily have been refused, fortunately no difficulty arose, and it was granted. When the day of his departure arrived, this kind and affectionate friend could scarcely be prevailed upon to leave Sir Sidney; till at length he yielded to his most earnest entreaties. They parted with tears in their eyes, which to our hero were the tears of pleasure, because his friend was leaving a situation of the greatest danger. The amiable jockey was regretted by every one: the turnkeys drank a good journey to him; nor could the girl he had courted help weeping for his departure; whilst her mother, who thought John a very good youth, hoped she should one day call him her son-in-law. Sir Sidney was soon informed of his arrival in London; and this circumstance rendered his confinement less painful.

On the 4th of September, 1797, (18th Fructidor) the rigor of Sir Sidney's confinement was still further increased. The keeper, whose name was Lasne, was displaced; our hero was again kept close prisoner; and, together with his liberty, lost the hopes of a peace, which he thought approaching. At this time a proposal was made to Sir Sidney for his escape, which he adopted as his last resource. The plan was to have forged orders drawn up for his removal to another prison, and thus to carry him off. A French gentleman, M. de Phelipeaux, a man of equal intrepidity and generosity, offered to execute this enterprize. The order then being accurately imitated, and, by means of a bribe, the real stamp of the minister's signature procured, nothing remained but to find men bold enough to put this plan into execution.

Phelipeaux and Ch. L'Oiseau would have eagerly undertaken it; but both being known, and even notorious at the temple, it was absolutely necessary to employ others. Messrs. B—— and L——, therefore, both men of tried courage, accepted the office with pleasure and alacrity. With this order, then, they came to the temple; Mr. B—— in the dress of an adjutant, and Mr. L—— as an officer. The keeper having perused the order, and attentively examined the minister's signature, went into another room, leaving Sir Sidney's friends for some time in the most cruel uncertainty and suspense. At length he returned, accompanied by the registrar (or greffier) of the prison, and ordered our hero to be called. When the registrar informed him of the orders of the directory, Sir Sidney Smith pretended to be very much concerned at it; but the adjutant assured him, in the most serious manner, "that the government were very far from intending to aggravate his misfortune, and that he should be very comfortable at the place whither he was ordered to conduct him." Sir Sidney expressed his gratitude to all the servants employed about the prison, and was not long in packing up his clothes.

At his return, the registrar observed, that at least six men from the guard must accompany him; and the adjutant, without being the least confounded, acquiesced in the justice of the remark, and gave orders for them to be called out; but on reflection, and remembering, as it were, the laws of chivalry, and of honor, he addressed Sir Sidney, saying, "Commodore, you are an officer; I am an officer also. Your parole will be enough. Give me that, and I have no need of an escort."—"Sir," replied Sir Sidney, "if that is sufficient, I swear, upon the faith of an officer, to accompany you wherever you choose to conduct me." The keeper now asked for a discharge, and the registrar gave the book to Mr. B——, who boldly signed it with a proper flourish, L'Oger, adjutant-general. Meanwhile Sir Sidney employed the attention of the turnkeys, and loaded them with favors, to prevent them from having time to reflect; nor indeed did they seem to have any other thought than their own advantage. The registrar and keeper accompanied them as far as the second court; and at length the last gate was opened, and they left them after a long interchange of ceremony and politeness.

They instantly entered a hackney-coach, and the adjutant ordered the coachman to drive to the Fauxbourg of St. Germain. But the stupid fellow had not gone a hundred paces before he broke his wheel against a post, and hurt an unfortunate passenger; and this unlucky incident brought a crowd around them. They quitted the coach, took their portmanteaus in their hands, and went off in an instant. Though the people observed them much, they did not say a word to them, only abusing the coachman; and when the driver demanded his fare, Mr. L——, through an inadvertence that might have caused them to be arrested, gave him a double louis d'or.

Having separated when they quitted the carriage, Sir S. Smith arrived at the appointed rendezvous with only his secretary and M. de Phelipeaux, who had joined them near the prison; and though he was very desirous of waiting for his two friends, to thank and take his leave of them, M. de Phelipeaux observed, there was not a moment to be lost. Our hero therefore postponed, till another opportunity, his expressions of gratitude to his deliverers; and they immediately set off for Rouen, where M. R—— had made every preparation for their reception.

At Rouen they were obliged to stay several days; and as their passports were perfectly regular, they did not take much care to conceal themselves, but in the evening they walked about the town, or took the air on the banks of the Seine. At length, every thing being ready for them to cross the channel, they quitted Rouen in an open boat, and were soon afterwards discovered by an English cruising frigate. Thus our hero arrived in London, together with his secretary and his friend M. de Phelipeaux, who could not prevail on himself to leave them.

Sir Sidney was received by his countrymen with that acclamation which a meritorious officer never fails to obtain. His escape was considered as a miracle, which most who heard of it scarcely knew how to credit. His sovereign treated him with the warmest affection, and not only conferred on him marked attention at his public presentation, but honored him with an immediate private interview at Buckingham-house.

CHAPTER III.

THE distracted state of Ireland at this period, which was the occasion of general alarm, demands our present attention; particularly as the views of that immense body of French forces, arrogantly stiled the "army of England," were entirely defeated by the timely suppression of an insurrection, in some degree similar to the Vendéan rebellion which agitated France, but destitute of such honorable motives. Britain was equally alarmed at the preparations for a civil war in her sister kingdom, but very fortunately prevented the mischiefs which were intended.

The Irish catholics, it must be confessed, met with repeated disappointments, some years before the union of England and Ireland; and although the impolicy of the English government, in raising their hopes to the highest pitch, by the appointment of Lord Fitzwilliam for their viceroy, and then dashing the cup of expectation from their lips by his sudden recall, admitted of no extenuation; still the revolt of the Irish catholics could not be vindicated, particularly as the present reign was to them a reign of concession and indulgence. By the last act of toleration, they wanted, comparatively, but little of being restored to the perfect enjoyment of civil liberty; and as the current, upon the whole, ran in their favor, notwithstanding some occasional and temporary disappointments, there is good ground to believe, that, had they conducted themselves with temper and moderation, they would ultimately have succeeded in their attempts to be restored to their rights as men and citizens in their fullest extent; to their political, as well as civil existence. Obedience to the magistrate is the general rule of duty, not to be departed from but on extraordinary and cogent occasions, such as can never be pleaded in defence of the Irish revolt of 1798.

In another light, this transaction may be deemed no less rash and imprudent, than it was immoral and unjust. The number of those who had entered into the association of United Irishmen, who had sworn fidelity to the rules of the institution, and who had been led on, step by step, to engage in this conspiracy against the government, was indeed prodigious; but still the power of the sword, and, what is still more potent, of the purse, was in the hands of the protestants; and, in case of necessity, the government of Ireland would doubtless have been supported by the mighty force of Britain. The Irish catholics must, therefore, have been reduced to an absolute dependence upon France, in order to establish their visionary independency. But what scenes of horror and carnage the wretched inhabitants of Ireland must have witnessed, before the existing government could have been subverted by the assistance of such an ally! And, supposing the object attained, Ireland would have dearly repented of the wild and romantic project of separating herself from Great Britain; for France would have treated her as she had Belgium, Lombardy, and Venice. Even Holland, the only country where the French had appeared to observe any degree of moderation, was degraded to the rank of a dependent province.

For the purpose of acquiring intelligence, the French government had employed one Jackson, a native of Ireland, of the clerical profession, who came to England, recommended, as it appears, to no other person than a Mr. Stone, merchant, at Old Ford, near London, whose brother, a violent democrat, had a few years before made Paris his habitation. Mr. Stone received this dangerous friend with much hospitality; but Jackson, being at length convinced that the invasion of England was impracticable, repaired to Ireland, where he still continued his correspondence with Stone. The correspondence being intercepted by government, both Jackson and Stone were in a short time apprehended, on a charge of high-treason. The former was convicted on the most decisive evidence; but when brought up for sentence, he fell down suddenly and expired, before it could be pronounced. Stone, after a long confinement, was also tried, but acquitted, and suffered to follow his brother to France.

Immediately on the conviction of Jackson, Mr. Theobald Wolfe Tone, a protestant and barrister, who had been educated at Trinity College, and who was accounted the original founder of the society of United Irishmen; Mr. Hamilton Rowan, and some other distinguished members of that association, who had formed, at this period, deep designs against the existing government, thought it necessary to abscond.

On the departure of Lord Fitzwilliam, affairs began to wear a most serious aspect, and the society of United Irishmen received an important accession of men of parts and influence. A regular communication was opened between the French directory (through the medium of Mr. T. W. Tone and other Irish refugees) and the representatives of provinces, which were four in number; Leinster, Munster, Connaught, and Ulster: these again communicated with the representatives of baronies, who also communicated with the representatives of every hundred men associated in each barony; and the representatives of hundreds communicated with the representatives of tens; which last held the office of corporal in the malcontent army. Thus an immense population could be called into action by an invisible agency; and the attempts of government to suppress this insurrection could not be very successful, unless it could secure the directing power.

In the month of February a military commission was appointed by the executive council, and instructions issued to the adjutant-general. Nocturnal assemblies were held in all parts of the country, where the people were trained to the use of arms. The boldest depredations were made, the most unqualified menaces thrown out, and every thing seemed to presage the near approach of a dreadful explosion. On the other hand, where the king's troops and the orange volunteer corps prevailed, the most horrid barbarities were practised upon the persons, and the most shocking ravages committed upon the properties of the associated Irishmen. By means of one Reynolds, a loyal traitor, who had been sworn a United Irishman, for the purpose of discovering secrets, and who was afterwards appointed treasurer to the county, and also a colonel in the army of the insurgents, a partisan of government, of the name of Cope, became acquainted with the nature and whole extent of the conspiracy. The police were thus enabled to seize, in Dublin, fourteen delegates and three members of the directory, with all their papers, plans, lists of names, &c. A fourth member soon after died of the wounds which he received in his own defence. The Irish leaders were evidently imitators of the French. The supreme power was lodged in a directory, consisting of five men; and they considered all persons attached to the established government as rebels, whose estates should be confiscated for the good of their new republic! The five directors were, Lord Edward Fitzgerald, brother to the Duke of Leinster; Mr. Arthur O'Connor, a descendant from Roderic O'Connor, king of Connaught; Mr. Oliver Bond; Counsellor Emmet; and Dr. M'Nevin. Mr. O'Connor was taken, with James O'Coigley, an Irish priest, on the coast of Kent. O'Coigley assumed the air of a man of business: he affected to have forgotten to put some letters of the very first importance into the post, and sent off to the next post two letters, one directed to Manchester and one to Amsterdam. This circumstance, intended to shew the people that they had something to do, put them upon inquiring what that something could be; and the very sound of Amsterdam made the comptroller of the customs transmit the letters to the secretary of state, who had the travellers conducted to London instead of Paris. The letter to Manchester was addressed to a manufacturer there, who had shewn some kindness to O'Coigley, from a letter of recommendation which he had presented on his arrival from Dundalk, where he was an officiating priest; and it was resolved to set a watch upon the manufacturer and his friends, to try if some circumstances could not be discovered that would afford a pretext for arresting them as traitors. One of the Manchester magistrates selected a man to act as a spy upon the occasion, for which he was qualified, by having acted as a sort of valet-du-place to O'Coigley at Manchester. This man collected some few persons in the town, chiefly Irish, and persuaded them to get the bath printed, which the United Men in Ireland used to administer to each other. The manufacturer above-mentioned, a tailor, and a printer who had printed the Irish oath, were consequently arrested.

The principal power, however, remained; for Lord Edward Fitzgerald possessed great military talents, and was beloved by the Irish. The vacancies in the directory were filled up; yet, as it was unknown how government obtained information, they could not prevent it getting intelligence of all the movements that were adopted. The new directory were arrested; and Lord Edward only escaped by the peculiar disguise he assumed, and the care he took to avoid attending any of the meetings in person.

Both parties laid the highest importance on the services of Lord Edward Fitzgerald, and were equally of opinion, that the success or miscarriage of the rebellion might depend upon his being able to place himself at the head of the United Irishmen. The moment at last arrived; and nothing remained but to give the final instructions to those who were to lead the different bands against the king's forces. Lord Edward Fitzgerald went to meet them at a cabaret in the neighbourhood of Dublin; and though, according to French republicanism, titles had been abolished, this nobleman was suddenly accosted by BOOK III. one of the Irish members as Lord Edward, which was overheard by a servant girl, and notice given to the police. Government consequently traced out his residence, and arrested the principal persons, particularly Mr. Bond, McNiven, and Counsellor Emmet, who were to act under him. Having made such use of their information as was thought necessary previous to securing Lord Edward Fitzgerald, government ordered him to be taken into custody on the 21st of May. A general attack was intended by the insurgents on the 23d of May, and Lord Edward continued in Dublin, to head those corps which were to seize the castle, and alarm the whole country, in getting possession of the metropolis by a coup-de-main. An idea may be formed of what he would have done at the head of an army, from his having resisted three officers who attempted to take him, one of whom he wounded, after having killed another, and defended himself against the third, till he received two wounds, of which he died in a few days.

Besides Reynolds, government had another secret friend in Captain Armstrong, a man of great art and address, and who, as desired, had obtained an introduction to the new executive directory, appointed by the provincial delegates, amongst whom were two brothers of the name of Sheares, by profession barristers. Armstrong, of course, became acquainted with the proposed project; which was to seize the camp of Loughlins-town, the artillery at Chapelizod, and the castle of Dublin, in one night. It was also planned, that a great insurrection should take place in Cork at the same period. Before the time appointed, however, Henry and John Sheares, and some others of the principal conspirators, were apprehended; the city and county of Dublin were proclaimed by the lord-lieutenant (Lord Camden) and council to be in a state of insurrection; the guards at the castle and all the great objects of attack were trebled; and the whole city was, in fact, converted into a garrison. Martial law was proclaimed, and persons were prohibited from being out after a particular hour.

On the day prefixed, great numbers of the insurgents appeared in arms in different parts of the country. At half-past two on the morning of May 24, a regular attack had been made by a force, consisting of about 1000 men, armed with musquets and pikes, upon the town of Naas, fourteen miles only from the city of Dublin. These rebels were gallantly repulsed by the Armagh militia, 4th dragoon guards, and Ancient British fencibles, commanded by Lord Gosford.

Three of the prisoners taken were immediately hanged in the public streets, by way of example. About the same time, General Dundas came up with and defeated a large party of the rebels, posted on the north side of the Liffey, near the hills of Kilcullen. On the 25th, a body of about 400 rebels, which had ventured to enter Rathfarnham, a village in the vicinity of Dublin, was encountered by a small party of dragoons, and dispersed with loss: their two leaders being taken, were immediately tried by a court-martial, and executed.

Another and much larger division of the rebel force was defeated at Tallagh-hill, about thirteen miles from the metropolis, May 26; and nearly at the same time they were repulsed in two different attacks on the towns of Carlow and Kildare: in all these actions losing not less than eleven or twelve hundred men in a very few days after the commencement of hostilities. But their chief effort was made in the county of Wexford, where they assembled in great force between the towns of Wexford and Enniscorthy, situated on the river Slaney; the latter of which places they carried sword in hand, on the 28th of the same month. It was impossible for Wexford long to hold out; and, on the 30th, the white flag was displayed, and the garrison surrendered at discretion. A scene of horrid disorder and outrage ensued on the entrance of the rebels into the town. The houses of the protestants were ransacked, and great numbers of the inhabitants committed to prison. Three gentlemen, of large property, members of the society of United Irishmen, who had been for some time past in custody, on a charge of high-treason, were at the same time liberated, and one of them, Beauchamp Bagnal Harvey, nominated to the chief command of the rebel army, though in no respect qualified for so arduous an office.

The rebels, flushed with this success, marched under the conduct of their new general, June the 5th, to the attack of New Ross, where General Johnson, an excellent officer, commanded. With a view to disorder the king's troops, who did not amount to 3000 men, posted without the town, the rebels drove before them with their pikes a vast number of horses and oxen. They had also some field-pieces and howitzers. The weight of the rebel column, after a brave resistance, forced the troops into the town, fortified only by an old ruinous wall. Here the battle re-commenced, and, after a dreadful carnage, the rebels were at length compelled to retreat with great loss; though the military were prevented by extreme fatigue, the action having lasted eight hours, from attempting a pursuit. The gallant Lord Mountjoy was killed early in this engagement, fighting at the head of his own regiment. In revenge for this disappointment, and by way of retaliation for the numerous executions by martial law which had been inflicted upon their deluded adherents in different places, the rebel chiefs condemned a great number of the loyalists of Wexford and Enniscorthy to death—and this sentence was carried into effect a few days after, with circumstances of excessive cruelty.

June 9, the rebels made an attempt upon Arklow, with as little success as the former upon Ross. Their circumstances now became critical,—General Lake advancing towards the seat of the southern rebellion with large reinforcements. The main body of the rebels, to the amount of 18 or 20,000 men, had taken an uncommonly strong position within a mile of Enniscorthy, upon an eminence called Vinegar-hill, from which, had they possessed any share of military skill, it would have been difficult, if not impracticable, to dislodge them. A cordon of troops was gradually collected from different quarters, which almost surrounded the rebel station. The 21st of June was destined for the grand attack. A column, under General Johnson, began the fight by an assault upon the town of Enniscorthy, situated upon the right bank of the Slaney, immediately under the hill, at the base of which that beautiful stream flows in a winding channel. Three other columns, under the Generals Dundas, Duff, and Needham, ascended the mountain in different directions. The rebels maintained their ground obstinately for an hour and a half; but, on perceiving the danger of being surrounded, they fled with great precipitation, part of them retreating to the mountains of Wicklow, and part to the chain of hills separating the counties of Carlow and Wexford. Being vigorously pursued, and no quarter given, they sustained immense loss; while, of the king's troops, the whole number of killed, wounded, and prisoners, was something less than a hundred; a surprising proof of the superiority of skill and discipline over mere unenlightened courage. The only person of any note who fell on the rebel side, upon this occasion, was Father Clinch, a priest of Enniscorthy, who was singled out on account of his large white horse, huge scymitar, and broad cross-belts. Two priests, of the name of Murphy, (Michael and John,) and a third, called Roche, reached the Three Rocks, and, having held a council of war there, marched across the mountains to the county of Kilkenny.

Wexford was evacuated June 22. General Moore had entered the place so opportunely as to prevent it from being laid in ashes; and, which was still more interesting, to render impracticable the premeditated massacre of the remaining prisoners, eighty-six persons having been murdered by them the preceding day, military music attending and playing a dead march, and their bodies, pierced with pikes, thrown over the bridge. Other horrible cruelties were also committed by the rebels on the protestants of that vicinity; and, upon their flight from New Ross, it is affirmed, that, exasperated by the intelligence of the refusal of the royalists to grant quarter, orders were issued by one of the rebel commanders, Father Murphy, to set fire to a large barn at Scollobogue, near the foot of Carrickburn-mountain, some miles distant, where upwards of 200 of their prisoners, including women and children, were confined under a guard when the rebel army marched to Enniscorthy, and all perished, amidst surrounding shouts of savage exultation.

The rebel general, Harvey, who had expressed some disapprobation of these enormities, was divested of his command after the battle of Ross; and their leaders were chosen from the most barbarous and bigotted of their own sect. Having been suffered to abscond, this unhappy man, who saw and acknowledged his error when too late, sought to conceal himself in a cave upon one of the rocky islands which lie near the entrance of Wexford-harbour. But, being discovered, he was immediately tried by a court-martial, and convicted; and, with divers other persons, executed, June the 26th, on the bridge of Wexford. On the same day, a large body of the rebels, with the sanguinary bigot, Father Murphy, at their head, who had escaped from Vinegar-hill, were defeated by General Sir Charles Asgill, at Kilconnel, considerably more than a thousand men being killed on the spot, with trifling loss on the part of the king's troops. Murphy was soon after taken in his flight, and most deservedly hanged. After this his body was burnt, and his head placed, with indiscreet zeal, on the market-house—a savage deed, more calculated to incense than to intimidate a courageous though mistaken enemy!

Whatever might be the fond and delusive hopes, entertained by the comparatively very small number of rebel chieftains, who, uninfected by the contagion of religious frenzy, had embraced the new doctrines of liberty, equality, and universal fraternization, it immediately appeared, upon the breaking out of this sanguinary rebellion, how utterly unable they were to inspire the bulk of their ignorant, ferocious, and brutal followers with sentiments even of common humanity, and much less to restrain them within the limits of law, equity, or justice. The generality of the priests, who appeared openly in this rebellion, took the utmost pains to diffuse, as widely as possible, the malignant spirit of religious bigotry and inveterate animosity against the protestants, very few of whom were found in the ranks of the rebel army. Those who had been imprudent enough to enter, were either obliged carefully to conceal their religion, or submit to be re-baptized by the priests, who were continually preaching up, that, in destroying heretics, they were performing a duty to heaven. Murphy, one of the most popular and profligate of this class, in a sermon delivered by him after the defeat at Ross, declared, "that those who were killed in that battle had fallen in consequence of their want of faith; that this general rising of the catholics was visibly the work of the Almighty, who had determined that the heretics, after having reigned so many years, should be now extirpated, and the true catholic religion established." At the successful attack at Three-Rocks, previous to the surrender of Wexford, the same Murphy marched at their head, telling them "not to fear, for, if they took up the dust from the roads, and threw it at the king's troops, they would fall dead before them." Many of the priests pretended to give charms to prevent the balls of the soldiery from doing hurt; and Father Roche, one of the number, did (as was believed by these poor credulous wretches) constantly catch the bullets that came from his majesty's army in his hand. Such were the base materials with which the rash and presumptuous leaders of this rebellion hoped to construct, in the room of the existing government, a pure and perfect fabric of uncontaminated democracy! Certainly, a more crude, wild, and visionary project, never entered into the head or heart of man. It must not, however, be supposed, that the higher descriptions of catholics, whether ecclesiastical or civil, were in any degree implicated in this atrocious revolt, and much less that they approved of the mode of conducting it. On the contrary, the whole body of the catholic prelacy, comprehending the twenty-two titular bishops and archbishops, with the Lords Fingal, Southwell, Gormanstown, and Kenmare, Sir Edward Bellew, Sir Thomas Burk, &c. &c., signed and published a paper, containing a very strong dissuasive from joining in the rebellion, and exhortation to all who were concerned in it to return to their allegiance, declaring, "that, by refusing to relinquish the treasonable plans in which they are engaged, they will not only subject themselves to the loss of life and property, but throw on the religion, of which they profess to be advocates, the most indelible stain."

After the great defeat at Enniscorthy, the rebels were never able to rally, or to appear again in any considerable force in the southern parts of the kingdom. In the north, where General Nugent commanded, the insurrection became general throughout the counties of Down and Antrim. The town of Antrim was, for a short time, in the possession of the rebels; but they were, on the 7th of June, driven out of that place, after a sharp engagement and cannonade. In this action Lord O'Neil received a dangerous wound, of which he afterwards died. On the 12th of the same month, their main force, amounting at most to 6 or 7000 men, was attacked and totally defeated at Ballynahinch. A party of the rebels also were repulsed at Carrick-fergus; and, in a short time, the generality of the insurgents laid down their arms, and the tranquillity of the province of Ulster was restored.

The state of Ireland was, at this period, the grand topic of debate in both the English and Irish houses of parliament. At an early period of the session, the Earl of Moira, whose property, influence, and popularity, were very great, renewed a motion formerly made by him, for an address to the king respecting the situation of Ireland. He said, that "he had unavailingly called the attention of the house last year to the state of that country, and had in vain predicted the consequences which the system of government established there must inevitably produce. The necessity of interposition was now become more urgent. All confidence, all security, were taken away. No one could say who would be the next victim of the oppression and cruelty which he saw others endure. The greatest and most wanton barbarities had been committed; but he wished, from prudential motives, to draw a veil over these aggravated enormities. He entreated the house to take into serious consideration the tendency of the present measures, which, instead of removing discontents, had increased the number of the discontented. The moment of conciliation was not yet past; but if the system were not changed, he feared that Ireland would be lost to this country for ever."

Though this benevolent motion was opposed by Lord Grenville, in the house of peers, yet the affairs of Ireland became so truly alarming, as to force themselves on the notice of parliament before the termination of the session. The Earl of Moira once more drew the attention of the house, March 26, by stating, "that he had the affidavits of a hundred persons in his possession, to prove that torture had been employed in forcing confessions from individuals, against themselves and against their neighbours; that horrible devastations had been made on the houses and property of persons accused of disaffection. The deponents were ready to come forward at the bar of the house with their testimonies; but he wished to avoid whatever might tend to exasperate; he should therefore content himself with placing his affidavits in the hands of the noble lord on the wool-sack."

When Ireland became a scene of carnage and horror, the Duke of Leinster delivered a speech, June 15, during which he appeared to be very much agitated; and at the close of it he moved an address to his majesty, humbly requesting, "that his majesty would deign to direct the proper officer to lay before this house a full and ample statement of the facts and circumstances which had led to the disastrous affairs of Ireland, and of the measures which had hitherto been pursued for the purpose of averting such momentous evils: that, however alarming the discontents now prevailing in the sister kingdom were, we should not despair; but that the result of such discussion would enable us to assist his majesty, according to our constitutional duty, with some well-adapted remedy, such as might restore, in that distracted part of the British empire, confidence in the laws by the due administration of them, obedience to his majesty's government by a temperate use of its powers, and union amongst all descriptions of persons in that kingdom." This motion, though ably supported by the most distinguished members of the house, was finally rejected by a majority of 33; but a strong protest was signed by the dissentient peers.

Lord George Cavendish, in the house of commons, on the same day introduced a series of admirable resolutions relative to the distracted state of Ireland, and was ably supported by Lord John Russell; but these were destined to share the same fate as the motion of the Earl of Moira in the upper house. This nobleman, while in Ireland, moved, in the Irish house of peers, on the 19th of February, an address to the lord-lieutenant, beseeching his excellency "to pursue such conciliatory measures as might allay the apprehensions, and extinguish the discontents unhappily prevalent in the country." The Lord Chancellor Fitzgibbon, afterwards Earl of Clare, boldly asserted, "that the system of government had been a system of conciliation; that in no place had the experiment been so fairly tried as in Ireland, and in none had it so completely failed. The object of the United Society of Irishmen was to overthrow the government and dissolve the British connection. He did not justify the proceedings of the Orange-men, but he asserted that they were not enemies to their country. He did not approve the tortures, burnings, assassinations, and murderings, of which the noble lord had spoken; but he was compelled to observe, that when treason and rebellion made it necessary to call out the military, it is not always possible to restrain their resentments."

Though government, in many respects, was regarded as rather severe in its measures respecting Ireland, it must be confessed, that there were many in that country who looked much farther than to a reform in parliament and catholic emancipation. And though no dissatisfaction was expressed at the conduct of Lord Camden, it was deemed proper by the English cabinet, that, in the existing circumstances, Ireland should be placed under the government of a military lord-lieutenant, who might, nevertheless, be of a temper less obdurate than the present viceroy; and a happy choice was made in the person of the Marquis Cornwallis, who arrived in Dublin on the 20th of June; and under his auspices the general system of government immediately changed to that of moderation and lenity. Some severe examples were, however, deemed absolutely necessary; and a special commission was, in a short time, opened in Dublin, for the trial of the principal delinquents. At the bar of this court the brothers, John and Henry Sheares; M'Can, secretary to the provincial meeting; and O'Byrne, a noted member of the United Association, were all tried, and soon after executed. Mr. Oliver Bond was likewise tried, on the 23d of July, convicted and condemned; and in his fate the other conspirators now began to read and foresee their own.

By this time the rebellion was apparently quelled; the people were everywhere returning to their allegiance, and delivering up their arms. Their hopes from France had been miserably disappointed, and nothing appeared before their eyes but individual destruction, without having effected any one purpose for which they had associated. In these circumstances, it was intimated on the part of government, that if Mr. Bond would consent to give to administration all the information of which he was possessed, relative to the late conspiracy and rebellion, his sentence might be commuted for that of banishment. This proposition was nobly rejected by Bond, if his information or evidence should endanger the life of any man with whom he was connected. The mercy of government was then extended to all the state prisoners, including O'Connor, Emmet, and M'Nevin; who acceded to the terms offered, on condition they should be at liberty voluntarily to transport themselves to any country not at war with his majesty, and that no further prosecution should be carried on, except against actual murderers, or such rebels as should be hereafter taken in arms. A general amnesty, with a few exceptions, was soon after granted by the chief governor, and confirmed in parliament. The system of moderation and mercy adopted by this respectable nobleman was peculiarly seasonable, and attended with the happiest effects. Most of the rebel corps, who had retreated to the mountainous parts of Wexford and Wicklow, took the benefit of the amnesty, and laid down their arms. Those who still resisted were rather banditti, who confined themselves to nocturnal depredations, than troops in arms against the government.

Contrary to the spirit of moderation lately adopted, a bill was brought into parliament, late in the summer of 1798, for the confiscation of the property of Lord Edward Fitzgerald, Bagnal Harvey, and Cornelius Grojan, a man of great estates, who had suffered in this rebellion, and it finally passed into an act. The case of Lord Edward, who had neither been tried nor convicted, was justly deemed hard in the extreme. That great ornament of the Irish bar, Mr. Curran, pleaded with consummate eloquence against the bill of attainder, at the bar of the house, when he made use of these memorable expressions: "Often have I, of late years, gone to the dungeon of the captive, but never yet to the grave of the deceased, to receive instructions for his defence: Never have I, till now, been called upon to plead at the trial of the dead! What might, perhaps, have admitted of easy explanation, during the life-time of the accused, must now be for ever buried with him in silence. The present bill convicts where proof is impossible, and punishes where guilt cannot exist; it confiscates the property of the widow, and robs the orphan's cradle. A state must be reduced to the lowest degradation, when it is driven to seek protection in the abandonment of the law, in that melancholy avowal of its weakness and its fears."

Notwithstanding France had pledged herself to assist the Irish insurgents, they were left to the fatal consequences of their temerity; and only a trifling portion of that aid, which the directory had promised them in the month of May, reached the coast of Connaught not before the 22d of August, when, lo! only 1100 men left the bay of Killala, and marched for Castlebar, which General Humbert reached on the 27th, being joined by numbers of disaffected Irish, who could scarcely be restrained from the commission of the most dreadful excesses. The real strength, or rather weakness, of the enemy being not as yet ascertained, the British forces were attacked by surprise, and, after a feeble resistance, were obliged to retreat, with the loss of 800 men and ten pieces of cannon. Castlebar instantly surrendered, and the French were very much strengthened by numerous deserters from the different regiments of militia. Cornwallis having taken the field in person, with a large army, resolved to surround the French, which obliged General Humbert to retreat; and, as that officer from the beginning entertained no hopes of ultimate success, he humanely took a circuitous route, that the natives who had joined him might thus have an opportunity of effecting their escape. On the 8th of September the van-guard of the British army came up with the rear of the French, at Ballinamuck, and, after a short resistance, the French being summoned to lay down their arms, surrendered at discretion.

Another expedition, equally ridiculous, was soon after undertaken by France against Ireland; the squadron then employed consisted of the Hoche, of eighty guns, and eight frigates, six of the latter being captured by Sir John Borlase Warren, then on the station; the Hoche struck her flag, in which ship was found the celebrated Theobald Wolfe Tone. When brought to Dublin and tried, he most heroically avowed the part which he had acted, and gloried in the treason for which he was condemned. "Into the service of the French republic I originally entered with the view of serving my country. From that motive I have encountered the toils and terrors of the field of battle; I have braved the dangers of the sea, covered with the triumphant fleets of the power I opposed; I have sacrificed my prospects in life; I have courted poverty; I have left my wife unprotected, and my children fatherless. After doing this, for what I thought a good cause, it is but little that I die for it. In such a cause as this success is every thing. I have attempted that in which Washington succeeded, and Kosciusko failed. What awaits me I am aware of, but I scorn to supplicate or to complain. Whatever I have written, spoken, or acted, in relation to this country, and its connection with Great Britain, which I conceived to be the bane of its prosperity, I here avow; I am now ready to meet the consequence. Having attained a high rank in the French service, I only wish, if the court possesses such a discretionary power, that they will award me the death of a soldier." Being informed, after a long pause, that this was entirely at the option of his excellency, and dreading that there was no probability of success in such an application, he finished his career in prison by an act of suicide. Being justly regarded as the original author, his trial appeared to be the concluding scene of this short but bloody rebellion, in which at least 20,000 lives were lost.

We have already stated that no one in Dublin, during these disturbances, was suffered to be abroad after a certain hour. This consequently occasioned a suspension of public amusements; and, when the theatre was allowed to be open, it was only in the day-time. Many persons in England had also imbibed the dangerous principles of French republicanism, and were no doubt ready to join their friends in Ireland, had their endeavors been attended with any promising degree of success. The tumultuous applause which, at this period, certain speeches in Otway's play of "Venice Preserved" excited in London, was the occasion of a temporary prohibition of that tragedy, by the lord-chamberlain—a circumstance not noticed by any modern historian.

Foreign Affairs.—Congress of Radstadt.—Assassination of Duphot.—Renewal of War in Italy.—Critical Situation of the Pope.—Triumph of Berthier.—Deposition of the Pontiff.—The Directory sends an Army to Switzerland.—War with the Swiss.—Capture of Dornoch and of Berne.—Battle of Standtz.—The Federal States changed into an united Republic.

THOUGH, by the conclusion of the treaty of Campo Formio, France indulged the hope of acquiring a solid and advantageous peace, this fond expectation was completely blasted by the disputes which arose in the directorial cabinet, owing to the exile of two of its popular members, (Carnot and Barthelemy,) and by the incapacity of those who were at the head of public affairs. Appearances, at first, seemed to augur a final adjustment; and a short respite from war, on the continent of Europe, took place.

This eventful year was ushered in by the congress of Radstadt, in which it was proposed to discuss and settle all the disputes between the French republic and the German empire. The emperor, as the head of the Germanic body, in his capacity of King of Hungary and Bohemia, had already acceded to the demands of the directory, to render the Rhine the boundary of the commonwealth, and surrender Ehrenbreitstein and Mentz, and it was imagined that the system of sacrifices and indemnities might be speedily adjusted. While this assembly was coldly discussing the terms of a pacification, so intimately connected with the prosperity of the continent, the theocracy, which had governed a considerable part of Italy, and for ages regulated the creed of a considerable portion of mankind, ceased to exist. The assassination of Duphot, an adjutant-general and chef de brigade in the service of the French republic, served to rekindle that spirit of hostility which the treaty of Tolentino was supposed to have extinguished.

Duphot, having repaired to Rome, towards the end of the year 1797, expressly for the purpose of espousing that sister of Bonaparte who was afterwards married to General Murat, became one of the victims of the commotions which took place on the 28th of December. On that day an outrageous mob assembled at the palace of the French ambassador, Joseph Bonaparte, and demanded the assistance of France, for the purpose of overthrowing the papal tyranny, and establishing a republic in its stead. Joseph Bonaparte being altogether indisposed to countenance so hopeless a project, dispatched Duphot, with a body of the military, to disperse the insurgents, and to prevail upon the papal troops to retire from the precincts of the ambassador's court; but, while the general was engaged in this service, he was shot by a Roman fusileer; and his body, having been dragged into the streets, was treated with savage cruelty by the populace. Joseph Bonaparte, after a lapse of fourteen hours, finding that no measures had been taken to avenge the late outrage, or to provide for the future security of his own person, retired into Tuscany.

The murder of the French minister, Basseville, in the capital, and almost under the eyes of Pius VI., had, at a former period, excited the indignation of the convention; and the additional murder of Duphot tended to renew the disputes between the pope and the directory. The Cisalpine republic took the lead on this occasion, and a body of troops marched into the disputed territory, and obtained possession of Santo Leone by storm.

As soon as the murder of Duphot and the retreat of Joseph Bonaparte were made public at Milan, the people exclaimed—"Death to the assassin pontiff! Vengeance for our deliverers!" Troops were immediately levied, artillery prepared, and a declaration published, in which the fall of Rome was truly and confidently predicted, and the late events not only detailed, but so far aggravated, that the odium of the murder of the French general was cast upon the pope and his counsellors. Every part of his conduct, however, evinced that this disastrous event produced the deepest disquietude in the breast of his holiness, and that the only crime of his officers consisted in the remissness of the general who had the command of the Roman troops, and whose duty it unquestionably was to protect the French ambassador and his suite from the excesses of the military, and the presence of a lawless mob.

In the declaration, above mentioned, it was stated, "Soon shall that Tiber, which is stained with the blood of our brethren—that capital, inhabited by murderous priests—that field of Mars, which blushes while trodden by a nation of slaves—be purified from the accumulated crimes and ignominy of twenty centuries of servitude."

Thus the directory feeling, or affecting to feel, a high degree of indignation at the insult offered to their ambassador, and at the loss of their general, transmitted instructions to General Berthier, to march to the Roman capital. This general had collected a body of French troops; and, being joined by a column of Cisalpines, advanced to Ancona. His further progress was retarded for a while by the snows of the Appenines; but on the 10th of February the French army entered Rome, and the castle of St. Angelo, containing the pope and the greater part of his cardinals, surrendered on the first summons.

The inhabitants, freed from restraint by the captivity of their rulers, and encouraged by the presence of the French army, assembled in the Campo Vaccino, the ancient Roman Forum, and at the instigation of two of the nobles, and an advocate of some reputation, planted the tree of liberty in the front of the capitol, proclaimed their independence, and instituted the Roman republic.

A manifesto was issued on the 15th, detailing the reasons that induced them to change the form of their government. Berthier, who had just refused to receive a deputation from his holiness, under pretence that the ancient government no longer existed, announced to the pope, by means of General Cervoni, that the people had resumed the sovereignty. He then entered the city, preceded by the music and grenadiers of his army, and pronounced an harangue, in which he invoked the manes of the Catos, the Pompeys, the Ciceros, and all the great men of antiquity, to attest the solemn scene exhibited in that spot. "The descendants of the Gauls," said he, "have come with the olive of peace in their hands, to rebuild the altars of liberty erected by the first Brutus. And you, people of Rome, who have recovered your ancient rights, recollect that blood which flows in your veins; survey these monuments of glory by which you are surrounded; resume your pristine greatness, and emulate the virtues of your ancestors!"

All the splendor and magnificence of which the catholic worship is susceptible were employed to celebrate this memorable victory over the head of its faith; every church in Rome resounded with thanks to the supreme disposer of events, for the glorious revolution that had taken place; and while the dome of St. Peter was illuminated without, fourteen cardinals, dressed in the gorgeous apparel appertaining to functions they were fated soon after to abdicate, presided at a solemn Te Deum within the walls of that superb basilic. The deposed pontiff, exiled from his country, was conveyed, by order of the directory, first to Brainçon, and afterwards to Valence in France.

At the very moment when the French plenipotentiaries at Radstadt were giving the most solemn assurances that their government panted for tranquillity, a war was suddenly declared against Switzerland, the thirteen federal republics of which, after a peace that had lasted for ages, were now condemned to experience all the horrors of the most rancorous hostility. The Swiss, attached from habit and interest to monarchical, were decidedly averse to republican France; and some of the cantons, Berne in particular, had not only refused, during a considerable interval, to recognize the French republic, but had countenanced the assembling of the emigrant army; obliged the French minister to quit Soleure; and notoriously violated the principles of neutrality. Towards the latter end of the year 1797, certain menacing demands had been made by the French directory on the Swiss cantons in general, but for the cause just stated, it was expected that the thunder would spend its rage on Berne; and the Helvetic diet, chiefly at the instance of that state, immediately determined on a levy of 26,000 men, while the armed force of two cantons, under the command of Colonel de Weiss, was sent, on the 14th of January, into the Pays de Vaud, to suppress a popular tumult, which had for its object the establishment of a democratic government. No sooner did the French executive learn that Berne and Friburg had dispatched a body of soldiers, and a train of artillery into the Pays de Vaud, than a division of French troops, which had just returned from Italy, was put in motion; and General Menard sent an aide-camp to the head-quarters at Yverdun, with an intimation, "that the inhabitants of the bailiwick must be permitted to organize a government for themselves; and in case any violence was offered to them, force would be repelled by force." But this officer and his escort, being probably mistaken for an advanced guard, were either killed or wounded, and the minds of both armies became more inflamed against each other.

The Vaudois in the mean time adopted a democratical form of government, and assumed the appellation of the republic of Leman. The cantons of Basle, Zurich, and Soleure, wisely determining to yield to necessity, restored to their subjects all their rights and franchises, and thus insured the continuance of their fidelity; but the senates of Berne and Friburg, imagining themselves still able to maintain their ancient tyranny, did not think fit to exhibit an equal degree of condescension. The management of the war being now confided to the French general Brune, he entered the territories of Berne on the 25th of February, and published a proclamation, containing professions but too little attended to in the sequel.

"Citizens," said the general, "the French soldiers, who penetrate into your valleys, are your friends and brethren; they carry arms for no other purpose than to annihilate tyranny; their sole aim is, to restore that liberty which you cherish.

"From the commencement of the revolution, those who rule the aristocratical cantons of Switzerland have secretly aided the powers leagued against France; and they have not failed to assert, that we intended to subjugate Helvetia: but neither ambition nor avarice shall ever dishonor the steps I now take in the name of the republic.

"Friends to the generous descendants of William Tell, it is only to punish the criminal invasion of your rights, that we now appear in arms among you. Banish from your minds all uneasiness relative to the political independence and integrity of your territories! The government of which I am the organ, will guarantee these to you; its intentions shall be religiously seconded by my companions in arms. Be free—France invites, nature commands it; and to enjoy this precious advantage you have only to express the wish."

Some unsuccessful attempts were now made to obtain a truce, but a body of the invaders having advanced against the castle of Dornoch, seized without any difficulty on that little fortress, March 2, while 13,000 troops summoned Soleure, which immediately opened its gates. Eriburg, better prepared for resistance, determined to oppose the French; but Brune having advanced at the head of a column, notwithstanding the gallant resistance of the garrison, headed by Verrer, the avoyer, who perished upon this occasion, took it by assault.

On the 4th of March, General Brune sent a large detachment against and carried Guinene, a post defended by numerous batteries, while another column, under General Pigeon, forced the pass of Neveneck on the succeeding morning, after an engagement of five hours, during which both sides displayed considerable valor.

The advances of the French army were seconded by a spirit of disaffection, too apparent in the army of General d'Erlach, and a proclamation was made by the council of Berne, that the levy of the Landsturm (rising in a mass) was ready for action; but it was a measure productive of pernicious effects. When possessed of arms, the people soon dissolved their own government; established a pro tempore regency, stated their proceedings to General Brune, and ordered the army to be dismissed, on condition that the French troops did not advance beyond their present positions. These concessions, however, met not the views of the republican commander; for he demanded that the town should be garrisoned by the soldiers of France. Mutiny broke out in the army of Switzerland, which put to death a number of their officers, who were unfriendly to their views; it appears that no fewer than 11,500 men had abandoned this army. About 8000 of the regular troops were stationed at Newenegg, while 6,400 maintained their station at Frauenbronn, to carry which General Schawenburg marched from Soleure with 18,000 men.

Both places were attacked by the French on the 5th of March, when the glorious resistance of the Swiss troops, stationed at Newenegg, seemed to portend a future victory; but those at Frauenbronn were under the necessity of retreating. General d'Erlach rallied his troops at Uterer, four miles and a half south of Frauenbronn, when another action took place, which also terminated in favor of the republicans. The Swiss again faced the enemy at Grauholtz, about five miles north-east of Berne, but were driven to the very gates of the metropolis, and totally defeated. In this engagement the Swiss are computed to have lost 2000 men killed and wounded, and the French not less than 1800.

On the evening of March 6, the city of Berne capitulated, and was entered in triumph. The Swiss troops at Newenegg and Guminen were forced to retreat; the soldiers, at the latter place, put their officers to death in a fit of despair, and the unfortunate General d'Erlach was murdered by his own men, in escaping from the field of battle. This noble general, on being summoned by Brune to deliver up Morat, where some of his progenitors had fallen in a battle that proved fatal to the invaders, transmitted the following gallant reply:—"My ancestors never surrendered, and were I such a coward as to think of it, the bones of the Burgundians, now before my eyes, would preclude the possibility of such an humiliation." The conquest of Berne led to the surrender of almost all Switzerland; though many parts of that free country seemed determined to resist to the last extremity.

The French were now determined to triumph over the Bernese, as the following menacing demands, which had been made on the Swiss cantons in general, had not been complied with:—

1. The free navigation of the lake of Lugano for the Cisalpine republic.

2. A passage for 25,000 troops; (which would have completely violated the neutrality of the cantons.)

3. The dismissal of Mr. Wickam, the English minister; (which must have involved them in disputes with Great Britain.)

And certain other pretended grievances were required to be immediately redressed; particularly the countenance "notoriously afforded to emigrants of distinction; who, not content with enjoying the rights of hospitality, were perpetually plotting and intriguing against the new form of government adopted by their native country."

Now triumphant, the French exacted a bloody retaliation for the insults offered to themselves, as well as for the assistance afforded by the aristocracy of Berne against them. After displacing the ruling families, and sending the most violent of their opponents into exile, the directory, actuated by a selfish policy, determined on the subjugation of Switzerland, and, accordingly, changed the form of government, from a federal into an united republic; which, by means of a close and intimate union with France, might be held in continual dependence, and be advantageous to the latter, in case of a renewal of hostilities.

The cantons of Berne, Zurich, Soleure, and Friburg, intimidated by recent events, willingly acceded to the proposition; deeming themselves fortunate in escaping complete subjection, and conscious, that in consequence of their wealth and numbers, they would still retain great influence in this general diet. The smaller states of Uri, Schwitz, Unterwalden, Glaris, and Appenzel, attached to that system of government which had so long guaranteed their liberty and secured their happiness, were not desirous of change, anticipating, perhaps, the superior consequence of their more wealthy neighbours. Instead therefore of sending deputies to the meeting assembled at Arau, their commissioners met at Brennen, and transmitted a memorial to the French general, in which they stated:—

“That there was only one objection in the government of their cantons, relative to which the republic, in conformity to her own principles, could desire a change: this has been obviated, and we no longer recognise any portion of the people as subjects; all are henceforth to enjoy equal franchises. A nation which, amidst its native mountains, possesses no other property than its flocks, religion, and liberty; solemnly promises every mark of attachment, not incompatible with its independence.

“We are ready to enter into a secret engagement never to take up arms against France; and we demand, in return, the maintenance of a constitution which recognises, for its basis, the sovereignty of the people, and has conferred upon us ages of happiness.”

These exalted sentiments had no effect, either in disarming the inflexible severity of the directory, or even meeting with the assent of such of the inhabitants of the greater cantons as had determined on a complete revolution throughout the whole of Switzerland. The latter having chosen a legislature, Arau was appointed to be the scene of its deliberations; and one of the first operations that took place was the nomination of an executive, consisting of five members, who were to be entrusted with the government of the whole of Helvetia, the country of the Grisons alone excepted, the inhabitants having determined to admit of no kind of innovation.

The democratical cantons refused to send deputies to the new assembly, or to acknowledge its authority, and the assembly consequently invoked the assistance of France, to enforce obedience to its decrees, while the malcontents entered into a mutual league for the preservation of their ancient franchises. The latter accordingly assembled in arms, and, having appointed Paravicini their leader, they seized on Lucerne, and menaced Zurich. Finding it impossible to awaken the slumbering spirit of resistance among their countrymen, and by one grand patriotic effort expel the invaders, they thought proper to retire to the fastnesses of their native mountains, and took post near the lake of Zug.

A great force, commanded by General Schawenburg, immediately marched against them, and commenced an attack. The leaders of the confederates, perceiving that valor alone could be of no avail against superior numbers, had recourse to stratagem, and, by a feigned retreat, expressly calculated to punish the characteristic impetuosity of the foe, enticed the assailants into an ambuscade, in consequence of which a complete defeat ensued. The career of the French was now, for the first time, stopped in Switzerland by a hardy peasantry, warmed with the love of liberty. The battle was sanguinary, and several thousands perished. The loss of General Schawenburg was 3000 men.

Soon after, a treaty was proposed and assented to, in which, although it was agreed to accept the new constitution as a bond of general union, yet an express stipulation was entered into, that the internal government of the smaller cantons should continue as before, and they were at the same time exempted from any contribution whatever. Had the superior cantons been inspired with that laudable spirit which their inferior neighbours evinced, the selfish views of the French government would, in all probability, have been entirely baffled.

This treaty, however, which was dictated partly from policy and partly from necessity, was neither agreeable to the Helvetic nor the French directory; and, unfortunately, a pretext was soon found for the renewal of hostilities, as Unterwalden, exhibiting a fastidious perseverance, obstinately refused to accede to any conditions whatever.

The French accordingly, in the beginning of September, marched a large body of troops, accompanied by artillery, to Standtz; and, after a violent battle of two days' duration, (September 8 and 9,) during which clubs and spears were in vain opposed to muskets and bayonets, and fragments from the rock to a regular artillery, the hardy mountaineers were overcome, the town of Standtz taken by assault, the houses in its beautiful valleys destroyed by fire, the inhabitants nearly exterminated, and neither age nor sex spared by a furious and implacable enemy.

All the Swiss now subscribed to the new constitution, which was styled the "Helvetic Republic." Lucerne was chosen as the seat of government, and an alliance, offensive and defensive, entered into between the Gallic and Helvetic republics. This circumstance, however, did not prevent the rapacity of the French directory, for they still continued to levy contributions and impose exactions with a most unpardonable severity; and those once happy regions, instead of enjoying some consolation from the conciliating manners of their diplomatic agents, experienced a new subject of complaint in the arrogant demeanour and insolent demand of Mengaud and Rapinat, whom they had entrusted with their confidence.

Thus the federate republics of Switzerland, after enjoying the sweets of independence since the commencement of the fourteenth century, when the fortunate issue of a contest with Albert of Austria laid the foundation of their liberties, were at length overcome by a foreign foe, and obliged to change the form of their government. The pretext for their ruin originated in the notorious injustice of the canton of Berne to the little states subjected to its dominion; and this intolerable yoke, instead of being lightened, was increased, during a war which had effected so many remarkable changes. The magistrates, the chief of whom either perished in the field or sought refuge in the dominions of Austria, endeavored, when too late, to obtain the confidence of those whom they had so long deceived.

The fate of the five smaller cantons was truly lamentable. Formed into little independent societies, on the declivities or amidst the recesses of the mountains, they first resisted the encroachments of the house of Austria, and made the last effort against the injustice of France. They were less fortunate than their ancestors, and fell, not because they had degenerated, but because they retained their original character, while every thing around them was changed.

CHAPTER V.

Policy and Designs of France.—Motives for an Expedition to Egypt.—Preparations for the same.—Bonaparte, with his Army, sails from Toulon.—Attack and Surrender of Malta.—Descriptions of Malta and Egypt.

THE territorial and commercial greatness of Britain, in the East Indies, had long been the envy of France; and every thing, on her part, was contrived to entangle her rival in constant hostilities with the native governments. In these views, Hyder Ally, who had usurped the throne and territory of Mysore, entertained a similar hatred to the English, from obstacles which their power opposed to his enterprising schemes. An alliance between France and Hyder obliged the English to be constantly on the alert in the East-Indies; and though the British arms were triumphant in every contest, the danger increased with the progress of time, inasmuch as the French officers and engineers instructed their allies in all the mysteries of European tactics.

Tippoo Saib, son and successor to Hyder, evinced the same dislike and attachment, and, being severely beaten by the English, just before the war which took place with the republic, thought that war likely to afford him an opportunity of gratifying his resentment; mutual convenience drew the two powers together, and the army of the sultan was officered by Frenchmen. The designs of Tippoo were not doubted, but, occupied as France was with the combined powers of Europe, she could spare no force to co-operate with him. When the continental war finished, this difficulty was removed; but there was another, and that was the superiority of the British navy, now triumphant in every sea.

It was resolved by France to attack the British possessions in India, and the enterprising spirit of Bonaparte was suited to the hazard of the undertaking. It was also determined to seize upon the territory of Egypt, that by moving the commerce of the East through the Red Sea, the new French colony should become the grand mart, where all Europe might be supplied with Indian articles, cheaper than they could be had from the English; while, as a military post, it could at all times transport auxiliaries to the coast of Coromandel. This plan was imparted to Tippoo, and the government in India knew it nearly as soon as it was known in London.

Bonaparte, convinced that the subjugation of Britain was too arduous a task, averting his eyes from the north, turned all his attention to the east; and the army of England, as it was called, was now to be transported to Egypt, for the purpose of preserving its inhabitants from the vassalage of the Turks and Mamelukes, and restoring the country to its ancient splendor. The object of this expedition was so artfully concealed, that it

BOOK III. was generally supposed, this army was organized for the assistance of the United Irishmen; and had France sent it, instead of her feeble aid, the consequences might have been exceedingly serious.

Egypt, before the age of Vasques di Gama, had participated in the commerce of India; and it was possible to render it once more the staple at which the merchants of the eastern and western hemisphere might change the commodities of their respective soils. Rich in its own productions, it even at this period maintained a considerable trade with Arabia and Abyssinia, through the Nile, and with Turkey and Europe, by means of the Mediterranean; while the navigation of the Red Sea was also calculated to share in the wealth of Asia. It was even surmised, that the passage by the Cape of Good Hope would be abandoned; and while Suez, on one side, commanded the commerce of two continents, Alexandria, restored to its primitive destination, would circulate their rich productions throughout another; and, by giving the entire monopoly to the southern provinces of France, increase the wealth and strength of that country, as much as the opulence of her great maritime rival would be diminished.

For some time the ports of Marseilles and Toulon were employed in refitting and launching ships, the fabrication of cordage, and the preparation of naval and military stores. The spoils of the rich arsenals of Venice contributed an ample share; Corsica was called upon to furnish its quota; and even Genoa granted supplies with a liberal hand. While all Europe was contemplating the extent and destination of the armament, Bonaparte, with some of his generals, had repaired to the borders of the Mediterranean sea, where he was joined by his troops, whom he was pleased to term "the right wing of the army of England." The name of England was still preserved, as Bonaparte wished the intended invasion of Britain to be thought postponed, and not declined.

Immediately on his arrival, the French general addressed a proclamation to his troops, in which he told them "that they had already carried on hostilities in mountains, in vallies, and before cities; but that they were now destined to a maritime war. The Roman legions, whom they had sometimes imitated, but never equalled, combated Carthage, by turns on the plains of Zema, and on the same sea they were about to traverse. Victory had never abandoned them, because they were brave, patient amidst fatigues, admirably disciplined, and united among themselves." He also reminded the soldiers, "that the eyes of mankind were fixed upon them; that they had a grand destiny to fulfil, many battles to fight, dangers to overcome, and fatigues to encounter." They were told, "that the genius of the republic, which, from the first moment of its existence, had become the arbiter of neighbouring nations, now wished to achieve the conquest of distant countries." In fine, after being recommended to consider each other as brethren, they were promised, in return for their toils, a rich harvest of glory to all; and to such as survived the expedition, was held out the prospect of a secure retreat, and a suitable portion of money and of land, on their return to their native country.

On the 20th of May, 1798, the general put to sea from Toulon, on board the L'Orient, of 120 guns, bearing the flag of Admiral Bruyes, to take the command of a fleet then assembling from the different ports of France, which was to consist of thirteen sail of the line, besides four frigates, and near four hundred transports. On board the fleet was an army of 40,000 men, and a vast number of adventurers, who associated their fate with this expedition, without knowing more of it than that Bonaparte was at its head; there were a great number of men of science and others, all of them capable of contributing to the prosperity of a new colony; and the whole of this, including the sailors, made the number engaged in the expedition amount to near 70,000 souls. The frigates led the van; the admiral followed, and the ships of the line formed the rear; the transports kept in-shore, between the Hierres and the Levant.

On the 9th of June, Malta was seen, and two crazy barks came off to sell tobacco. Bonaparte asked permission for his squadron to enter the port; but the grand master declared, that it was contrary to the laws of the order that all the squadron should enter, but that every necessary refreshment should be distributed among the soldiers and seamen.

When this answer was made public, the commander, Bosredon Rasifeat, after reading a letter from Dolomieu, another chevalier then on board of the L'Orient, informed his chief, "that he begged leave to resign his employment, as he had only sworn to wage war against the Turks, and was not disposed to carry arms against his countrymen."

Bonaparte persevered in his demand, as a pretext for hostilities. It behoved him to support the character he had obtained of gallantry and enterprise, being, at this period, the only general France had reliance on; the brave Pichegru having been disgraced, and sent an exile to Cayenne, with several others.

Accordingly all the boats of the fleet were seen rowing to the shore, and a letter was presented to the grand master, from the representative of France, threatening to obtain by force what had been so inhospitably denied; but, at the same time, promising to respect the religion, customs, and property of the Maltese. The debarkation, however, was not effected until seven o'clock at night, when the soldiers were landed at the roadsted of La Madealine, the only place in the island where the rocks were neither mined nor cut into mortars: notwithstanding, ample means of defence presented themselves, and the progress of the enemy might have been instantly arrested, had courage and inclination been united. After firing a single cannon, the knight who commanded the town of St. George deserted with his garrison to the enemy. The battery at the point of St. Julian was also abandoned, and the regiment of militia of Birkarhara, posted there, took refuge under the cannon of Fort Manuel.

These unexpected events having produced general terror and distrust, a report was suddenly spread and believed, that all the French, Spanish, and most of the Italian knights, had entered into a conspiracy with the enemy, who, by this time, had advanced into the entrenchments of Nesciar, and seized on all the artillery, now abandoned by the fugitives. A picquet of cavalry, sent by the grand master to the old city, was nearly at the same time refused entrance by the governor, who, as well as the regiment stationed there, stated, that they were determined not to quarrel with the French.

The grand seneschal, notwithstanding this general defection, established his head-quarters at Floriani, the Bailli de Clugny assumed the command of Fort Ricasoli, the Bailli Tomasi remained firm at his post, and the fire of the forts St. Elmo and Tigné produced great execution; while a sally was made with a galley and two galliots, which cannonaded the French shallops, still employed in carrying fresh troops, and sent two of them to the bottom.

The morning of the 10th of June discovered that the enemy had encircled the city, stopped the supplies of provision and ammunition, and were erecting redoubts to batter the place. Hereupon a general confusion took place; 900 of the regular troops refused to attack a post occupied by the enemy; whole companies of militia expressed a determination not to be shut up within the fortifications; and it was found necessary to relieve all the posts commanded by the French chevaliers.

On the approach of evening the nobles, the advocates, and the burghers, who had returned from different parts of the island into the city, surrounded the palace of the grand master, and stated, that as there could no longer be any doubt of treachery, they had drawn up a declaration, and presented it to the Dutch consul, intimating their resolution of surrendering to the French; and it was added, that they had requested him to transmit the capitulation to Bonaparte, either with or without the consent of the order. Several of the knights were, at the same time, massacred;

the chevaliers De Valin, Montazet D'Arnice, and D'Andelard, were put to death; and the chevaliers De Roux, Du Quesnoi, Rigaud, De Cornet, De Guebriant, and the bailli De Neveu, experienced a similar fate. A bloody head was carried about on a pike, and it was with great difficulty that the chevaliers of the priories of Castile and Bavaria could prevent the minister of Russia from being killed during the tumult. The doors of the council-chamber were soon after burst open, the bodies of the murdered chevaliers presented to the members, and the sovereign himself threatened with death.

During this dreadful period of suspense and apprehension, Ransjeat, who had been released from prison; Formosa, the consul of Holland; Doublet, the under-secretary of state; the bailli Frisari; and the chevalier Amati, minister from Spain; were sent by the insurgents to the French camp, where they obtained an armistice, during twenty-four hours, and the terms of capitulation were immediately debated upon and agreed to; but neither the grand master, nor the council, nor the congregation of state, affixed their signatures.

On the 12th of June, at half-past eleven, the French entered the city of Malta, and seized on all the ports; while Ransjeat and Doublet presided over the municipality, and regulated the internal police. The grand master, Hompesch, deprived of all authority, and anxious to abandon a place where he no longer found any respect, was permitted to leave the island, and take refuge in the dominions of the emperor. This unfortunate chief embarked on the morning of the 17th of June, and arrived at Trieste, after a passage of thirty-nine days. He was not allowed to carry away either his plate or jewels; all that he received, or, more properly, was to receive, under the title of an indemnification for so many losses, was the sum of one hundred thousand livres, (about 4,500*l.* sterling.) Though the French legislature passed a vote for a pension of three hundred thousand livres during his life, (a poor compensation for a chief, ranked as a sovereign) he never obtained any portion of it. Had this nobleman betrayed the interests of his order, (as had been pretended) he might have experienced more munificence; and in that case he would have assuredly retired to France, and not sought an asylum in the territories of the Emperor of Germany.

In the course of about eight days, Bonaparte contrived to obtain possession of Valetta and the whole island of Malta; while the ancient order of St. John of Jerusalem beheld itself bereaved of its territories, after being upwards of two centuries and a half in possession of them. In the orders issued by Bonaparte at Malta, there was one more barbarous than the Greek in which it was written; when it is considered, that he had no more right to dictate laws at Malta, than the robber who has broken into the house of a peaceable man, and stolen his property, has to lay down rules for the family. This order began in the usual way, with the two conspicuous words—LIBERTY! and EQUALITY! It first related to the mode of worship in the island, and that protection should be given to the Jews who might wish to establish themselves there: that all the Greeks who should have any connection with Russia, should be put to death; and all vessels under Russian colours be sent to the bottom. He then wrote a letter to the Bishop of Malta, thanking him for his reception of the French troops, telling him the high opinion he entertained of the character of a good priest, and begging him to repair to the town of Malta, and by his influence preserve harmony among the people. He wished to be introduced, he said, to the different chiefs, and begged the bishop to be convinced of his esteem and consideration.

When Bonaparte took the island of Malta, he organized a provisional government, victualled the fleet, took in water, and arranged all the dispositions. He quitted it on the 19th of June, leaving the command to General Vaubois, and appointed Citizen Menard commissary of marine.

In order to gratify curiosity, and enable the reader to form a just idea of the country and people, for the subjugation of whom such immense preparations had been made, we shall devote the remainder of this chapter to a description of Malta, its cities, towns, &c.; and of Egypt, so renowned in ancient history.

Malta, known to the Romans by the name of Ogygia, to the Greeks by that of Melita, was long celebrated as the residence of an order, the laws of which mingled the duties of the cowl with those of the sword; and all the pride, pomp, and glories of chivalry, with the vows, humility, and resignation of the cloister. This institution, coeval with the crusades, and originating in the same spirit of enterprise, that induced European kings and barons to lead their followers to the holy land in quest of extraordinary adventures, was at first known under the name of the order of St. John, and established at Jerusalem in 1103. The heroic courage of the Turks, and the declining fanaticism of the Christians, after a residence of eighty years, occasioned its removal to Acre, where it flourished for a century. Thence, following the fate of the common cause, it was obliged to emigrate; but it conquered Rhodes from the infidels, against whom all the knights had sworn perpetual war; and being driven, after a long and gallant defence, from an island which had owned its sway for more than two centuries, Malta was presented by Charles V. in 1530, to the remnant of chevaliers who had survived the contest; and their successors had continued, until the arrival of Bonaparte, to carry on continual hostilities by sea against the unbelievers in the true faith. The rights of this order, its sovereignty and independence, were acknowledged by all nations, and could neither be invaded nor infringed without the greatest injustice. The Count Ferdinand di Hompesch (before mentioned) was descended from an ancient and illustrious family, and was the first German who had ever been grand master. The chevaliers were in number 332, viz. 200 French knights, 90 Italians, 25 Spaniards, 8 Portuguese, 4 Germans, and 5 Bavarians; but as 50 were incapable of service, on account of their age, 282 only were able to carry arms. The troops and militia, consisting of 17,282 men, were capable of affording a formidable assistance, but they were not actuated by similar motives. Great dissensions had taken place between the order and its subjects; the latter were accordingly 'disaffected, and many of the French knights were also dazzled with the late acquisitions of France.

The island of Malta is separated from that of Goza by a strait of about five miles in breadth, in the centre of which appears the small island of Cumina. The greatest breadth of Malta is about twelve miles, its length twenty, and it is sixty in circumference. Goza is not more than half the former, either in circuit or diameter. Cumina is not quite a mile in breadth, and about three miles long; but it is cultivated, and fruitful in corn. It possesses a fort, which was erected in the year 1618. Malta contains two cities and twenty-two small towns, or cazals, a derivative word from the Arabic, signifying a station; and sufficiently proves that these villages were gradually formed from the collected habitations of laborers, who successively built their huts on those spots which formed situations convenient to their particular employment; a rise not dissimilar to that of the borough towns of our own country.

Citta Vecchia, or the old city, is situated on the highest ground in the island, and near the centre of it was the ancient capital; but the city of La Valetta is the actual metropolis of the island. Its dependencies, which are enclosed within stupendous fortifications, are considered as so many distinct towns. Besides the cazals, there are small groups of houses scattered about the country. The coast is defended by entrenchments, batteries, and towers, from whence the inhabitants give advice, by signal or fires, of any suspected vessels that may be seen at sea. These towers, built at a small distance from each other, and forming a curve, the extremities of which reach to the two castles, placed at the entrance of the harbour, repeat the signals with such rapidity as ensures the prompt defence of the whole coast. Besides the two chief harbours, between which the city of La Valetta is situated, there are several bays, where vessels may ride with safety. Two of the most considerable are St. Paul's Bay, and that of Marzo Scirocco, where the Turks landed in the year 1556. The whole of the coast affords opportunities for landing, except the southern part, which is bold, rocky, and of a great height.

The island of Goza has no harbour, but several bays. Its coasts are also furnished with towers, whose signals, repeated by the fort at Cumina, very rapidly communicate the alarm to Malta. It contains one castle, one town, and six cazals.

The city of La Valetta was built, or at least its foundations were laid, in the year 1566. The elevation of the spot, and its position, between the two great harbours of the island, determined the choice of its situation. It derives its name from the grand master La Valette, who, after having sustained a siege against the Turks, with very unequal numbers, and almost incredible efforts of courage, and fearing another and more powerful descent from the Ottoman troops, obtained supplies from the court of Spain, and caused the walls of the new city to be traced according to a plan conceived and laid down by himself. The inhabitants of either sex and of every age, made a voluntary offer of their labors towards building the city, which would not only prove their defence, but serve to increase their commerce and secure their wealth; as well as increase the importance of the island, by the additional protection it would give to the trade of Europe in the Mediterranean sea. La Valette dying in 1568, it was reserved for his successor, De Mont, to finish the work, and the whole was completed on the 18th of May, 1571. The principal attention in building this city was paid to the construction of fortifications for its defence; and the chapel, called La Vittoria, built by La Valette, in commemoration of raising the siege, was at that time the only place of worship belonging to the order.

La Valetta projects boldly towards the sea for about a mile, is washed on either side by two branches or inlets of it, and presents, at the same time, a stupendous mass of fortifications. Its principal batteries are those of the fort and castle of St. Elmo. This fort stretches, as it were, into the sea, is defended by three tier of cannon, chiefly brass, and has an handsome signal-tower rising from the crown of it. The castle, at the same time, is surrounded with a ditch fifty feet in depth, and is also encircled by the battery of St. John, which is mounted with a numerous and an heavy artillery, chiefly brass four-and-twenty pounders, and brass mortars. This castle and battery completely overlook the harbour, and command its entrance, presenting to the sea an almost impenetrable aspect. Opposite to it, on the right, is

Fort Ricasoli, and on the left Fort Tigné, which commands the Marsa Muschetta harbour, allotted for vessels performing quarantine. The castle and batteries of Ricasoli are situate at the entrance of the grand harbour, which they likewise command from a variety of points. It is a place of great strength, as it stands upon a rock, and its batteries are mounted with heavy cannon from twenty-four to forty-two pounders.

Fort Tigné is on the other side of Valetta, and is built on a neck of land at the mouth of the right entrance of the quarantine harbour, or Marsa Muschetta. This fort was erected by order of the grand master, Emanuel de Rohan, and designed by a French engineer, named Tigné, from whom it derives its denomination. It is of a triangular form, with a round tower facing Valetta, and surrounded by a ditch forty feet in depth, chisselled out of the solid rock. It is a very handsome building, and commands the approach from the westward to Valetta, with the entrance to the quarantine harbour, for a considerable distance. It is fortified with great strength, is well mounted with cannon, and contains barracks for three hundred men, which are bomb-proof. It is also undermined in every part, and the four entrances to the mines are two hundred feet in length, and cut out of the solid rock.

Fort Manuel, which is situated about a mile from Fort Tigné, and separated from it by a part of the harbour about a quarter of a mile in breadth, is less remarkable, perhaps, for its defensive utility, than the beauty of its construction. Its mines extend a considerable distance beyond the ditches, which are generally forty feet in depth. It is immediately opposite the Marsa Muschetta gate, and the public slaughter-houses of La Valetta. The probable motive for erecting this beautiful fort, was to keep an enemy at a distance from La Valetta, should they land in any part of the island to the westward: and thereby prevent the cruel effects of a bombardment on that city. It contains an handsome chapel, and in the square is a fine statue in bronze, of the grand master Emanuel, who was at the sole expence of building the fort. It is near the lazaretto, but is separated from it by a wall of forty feet in height, with a carriage-way beneath it. The only approach to it, except by boats, is by a small neck of land, or isthmus, connecting with the country, about half a mile at the back of the fort, and which is sufficiently guarded and defended.

The ancient castle of St. Angelo is situated in the centre of the grand harbour, and rises from a rock that protrudes, as it were, into the water. It faces the mouth of the harbour, and, having four tiers of powerful artillery from the level of the sea to the top of the works, with a battery of mortars, it may be said irresistibly to command it. So that, independent of St. Elmo and Ricasoli, this part of the castle is capable of sending to instant destruction a ship of any force that should presume to come within its reach, as one hundred pieces of very heavy cannon could be made to bear upon her. This castle is situated on a rocky peninsula, and may be considered, both from art and nature, as an impregnable fortress. It has only one entrance, which is by a draw-bridge from the town of Vittoriosa; and there are three covered gates, of prodigious strength, which at once guard and form the passage.

Vittoriosa is built in a very irregular manner, and rises gradually from the water-side in a state of acclivity to the distance of about half a mile. The houses are of stone, and equally elegant and commodious; the streets, or rather lanes, for they deserve no other appellation, are narrow and irregular. It contains a fine palace, and two handsome churches, which are decorated with paintings and sculptures. There is also a very neat and cleanly market-place in the centre of the town; in the middle of which appears, on a pedestal, a fine statue in bronze of the grand master who laid the foundations of the place. Every part of it is well inhabited, and fountains of water continually refresh it.

The town of Bormula is separated from it by a draw-bridge over a ditch about twenty feet wide, and between fifty and sixty in depth, which is also dug out of the solid rock. This town, like Vittoriosa, is built on the slope of an hill, and displays an equal irregularity. There is only one spacious street; the rest are narrow, and without any kind of pavement. The houses, however, being regularly built, present a pleasing appearance.

The town of Singlia is situated on an eminence, and is irregular. The principal street displays a noble appearance, and extends from the entrance by the gateway, to the point opposite La Valetta, about three quarters of a mile; it is well paved, and in the middle of it there is an handsome column, crowned by a statue of one of the grand masters of the order.

Floriana is connected with, but is situated on, an eminence without the walls of La Valetta; it consists of several neat, pleasant, but unpaved streets, and commands a magnificent prospect of the Mediterranean sea, with the entrance of the grand harbour, and its predominant circumstances. Of the two churches which this place can boast, one, which is situated in the middle of it, presents a large architectural form, with a steeple; while the other, which is placed close to the fortifications that overlook the harbour, has no exterior claim to attention.

The entrance from Floriana to La Valetta is by a draw-bridge, thrown over a ditch of ninety feet in depth, and scooped out of the solid rock:

the bridge is flanked on either side by a powerful battery, which no force could resist, even supposing it to be practicable for an enemy to make so near an approach to the city: to the bridge succeeds an archway of fifty feet in length, hewn out of the rock, on one side of which, and formed in the same manner, is a guard-house and officer's room; this gateway is called the Porta Reale, and gives its name to the street that proceeds from it: this stupendous archway supports a small neat house, that commands the whole of Floriana, and a considerable distance beyond it, which is probably intended as a place of observation for the general or commandant, as occasion may require. On the wings of this building are batteries of immense strength, which join the walls that enclose the city: they are mounted with cannon, and have a commanding front over the Floriana, and the country adjacent. The gate is supported by two cavaliers of ninety feet in height, bomb-proof, and inaccessible, except by one small narrow passage. They are of uniform appearance, and answer in size and shape to each other. These large magazines of powder and shot are so constructed, that no accident can possibly occur to them, as they are formed in the solid rock, and consequently superior to the annoyance of shot or bombs.

The French, while they were in possession of Malta, not only endeavoured to republicanize the Maltese, but to give republican names to the very streets: they, therefore, blotted out the ancient titles, and substituted such as accorded with their political views, and the order of things in France.

Beyond the arsenal and Strada di Mezzodi, two very handsome churches present themselves to the view: they are opposite to each other, and form a part of the street. One of them has a tower filled with bells, which are continually chiming, to the great annoyance of those who live in their immediate vicinity.

The magnificent church of St. John stands in a square, and forms a central point of view to four streets. It is a large plain building, without any striking display of exterior ornament. In the front of the church the area is paved with large flat stones, to the extent of thirty or forty feet; and is inclosed by a small parapet wall with pillars, on the outside of which there is a paved footway for passengers, raised a few inches above the common causeway. The west front of the church presents two towers, containing bells of uncommon magnitude, which continually announce the unceasing ceremonials of public worship in the building beneath them. The first stroke of the bell from St. John's church, is the general signal for the bells of all the other churches in La Valetta and its dependencies: the whole producing a kind of wide-extended chime, which has rather a pleasing effect. The interior form and decorations of this church are truly magnificent.

The roof, which is finely painted, is supported by a double row of superb columns, about thirty feet in height, and are of a beautiful dark green marble, with black veins. To the right of the altar was a stately throne of crimson velvet, richly decorated with embroidered ornaments; the principal of which were the arms of the order. This was the seat of the grand master. In a chapel dedicated to the Virgin Mary, a golden lamp, of large size and great value, had been long suspended by a chain of the same metal. It was said to have been formerly brought from Rhodes, and had ever been regarded by the people with the most profound veneration. It was considered of so much importance by Bonaparte, that he ordered it to be removed to the place of his residence.

This church was built by the Grand Master La Cassiere, and dedicated by Ludovico Torres, Archbishop of Montreuil. It was enriched with the presents made, every five years, by the grand master and priors of the order. The first general chapter celebrated at Malta, assigned a chapel in this church to each nation of which the knights are composed: these chapels form the wings to the extensive body of the church.

The French, with that rapacious spirit which accompanied and disgraced their conquests, stripped this beautiful church of almost the whole of its valuable ornaments; even statues of bronze were pillaged for the mere value of the metal.

Opposite to the Treasury is a very handsome modern edifice, called the Conservatorio; it joins the grand master's palace, and was intended, previous to the surrender of the island to Bonaparte, for the reception of the public library, which at that time promised to become a very splendid and extensive collection of literature. This establishment was begun in the year 1760, by the Bailli di Tencini, who presented it with 9700 volumes, collected at a very considerable expence. The last general chapter, held in 1776, confirmed this institution; and it was also settled, that the books of the knights should, on their death, be presented as contributions to it.

The Jesuit's College, which is near the market, is a large handsome building, well suited for the purposes of public education, and is in the same state of establishment as the colleges in other Roman catholic countries.

The General Hospital, an extensive building, fronts the grand harbour, and has a fine clear air from the sea. It contains several large airy halls and extensive chambers for the sick, where the ranges of beds might be quadrupled without inconvenience. Before the miserable change in the affairs and state of this island, this hospital was open to the natives of all countries, and every kind of medical and surgical assistance amply afforded. The knights not only superintended the different parts of its administration, the principal office of which was one of the first dignities of the order, but frequently attended the sick in their own persons, and with all the care and vigilance of a domestic hospital. At that better period, all the utensils employed in the hospital were of silver, the plainness and simplicity of which, however, announced that such a circumstance was less an object of luxury than a means of preserving cleanliness.

It may, indeed, be wondered that such a place as Malta was so readily surrendered to the army of France; but this must be attributed to secret treachery, and not to the prowess of Bonaparte, or to a decline in that native courage which had impelled the Maltese to perform those martial deeds which history records.

We shall now, according to promise, direct the reader's attention to a land renowned in ancient writings.

Egypt is commonly reckoned to be about 500 miles in length, and 160 in breadth. The borders of the Nile, from Abyssinia to Grand Cairo, form a narrow valley, which, with lesser vallies or openings into the hilly country, and the deserts on either side, is called the Upper, and the whole country watered by the Nile from thence downward; the Lower Egypt. The two grand branches of the Nile, which part at Grand Cairo, together with the Mediterranean, into which they fall, form a triangle, called the Delta, of which the ocean is the base, the two branches of the Nile the sides, and Cairo the apex, or head. A great portion of this part of Egypt, being enriched by the overflowing of the Nile, is extremely fertile. No country in the world is more plenteously stored than Egypt with corn, rice, flesh, fish, sugar, fruits, vegetables, and oil. The Delta produces oranges, lemons, figs, dates, almonds, and plantains in the greatest abundance. The extent of this famous country, that is, of the part of it now inhabited, does not seem, at first sight, to correspond with the descriptions which have been left by the ancients, of its twenty thousand towns and cities, several millions of inhabitants, and armies, kept by its ancient kings, of three hundred thousand men, executing the pyramids, the labyrinths, the grottos of Thebes, the lake Moeris, vast canals, obelisks, temples, and pompous palaces. But, although the reports by travellers, of Egypt being a delicious garden, have been unanimously reprobated by all the French who have written on the subject, since Bonaparte's expedition thither, the most intelligent admit the extent to which the happy influence and dominion of the Nile, by means of industry and art, might have been carried, in times past, from the banks of the river over the arid desert. As a heavy counter-balance to these natural advantages, except in our winter, and the latter part of the autumnal months, the heat of the climate is oppressive to all who are not accustomed to it. The winds are sometimes of such extreme heat and aridity, that their influence proves mortal. During the time these last, the streets are deserted, and the inhabitants almost blinded by drifts of sand, so subtle, that they insinuate themselves into the closest apartments: so that from this enemy there is no such thing as a perfectly secure retreat. The vermin that infest this land, to strangers particularly, is intolerable; and, in addition to all these evils, it is frequently visited by the plague.

Since Egypt fell under the dominion of the Turks, it has been ostensibly governed by a pacha, or, as we pronounce the word, bashaw, who resided at Grand Cairo; but whose authority, for a long time past, has been more nominal than real. The bashaw was, in fact, little more than a sign and memorial of the respect formerly paid, and still professed, by all musselmans, to the eldest son of the prophet. Besides the bashaw there were inferior governors, under various designations, in the different provinces; but the power of the sword was in the hands of the mamelukes. A small number of janissaries, indeed, was retained at Cairo, and a few other places in the service of the Porte, of which they held landed possessions, in return for their service. In Upper Egypt there were some Arabs who paid tribute to the grand signior, or made presents to the bashaw: and, in the Lower Egypt, there were some villages in the possession of sheicks. But the real government or sovereignty of Egypt was possessed by the Mamelukes, originally soldiers of fortune, but who paid very little regard to the conditions on which they held their power and property. They came originally from the mountainous countries between the Black Sea and Caucasus; and their armies were still recruited by boys from those countries, and other youth, the children of christian slaves, brought for sale to Grand Cairo. The laws of Mahomet enjoin great compassion and tenderness for slaves, and nothing is considered as more pleasing and meritorious in the sight of God than their total emancipation. The condition of the young slaves, who fell into the hands of the Mamelukes, was certainly among the gentlest lots of slavery. It was the road to fortune. They were brought up by the Mamelukes in the same manner as their own children, and came, in time, to be almost considered as such; nor did the circumstance of their having ever been in a state of slavery preclude them from any degree of preferment, even that of bey, which was the chief, who was chosen freely by a plurality of voices in a full council of officers; so that the beys, elevated to power, neither by the accident of birth, nor the particular favor of any sovereign prince; but in some degree at least, if not chiefly, by their own merit, were, for the most part, men of superior talents and unquestionable courage. The Mamelukes were all of them brave, even to excess. They were accustomed, from their earliest years, to a dextrous management of the finest and most spirited horses in the world. They were armed with swords and pistols, muskets and lances. Their wealth and state were displayed in their arms, dress, and equipage. Their habitations and household furniture were wretched. It was their manner incessantly to wheel round about an enemy in his front, flank, and rear, and to retreat as he advanced, unless they perceived an advantage, or were under a necessity of coming to close action, while another division of them hung upon his rear, and endeavoured to surround and cut off detached parties, wherever they could find an opening. The general spirit of their warfare, like that of the ancient Scythians and the Arabs, was to cut off supplies, and harass and destroy their enemy by repeated attacks, according to opportunities. But, in different circumstances, their courage, as might be expected, was more or less impetuous and daring.

The beys were not all of them, without exception, of christian origin, as has been commonly supposed. Of late years, the annual number of slaves from Georgia, Mingrelia, and Circassia, has been greatly diminished. In 1762, five of the beys were of Mahometan descent; and, from the cause just mentioned, the proportion of the Mahometan, to what we may call the Christian beys, has probably become greater.

The number of the beys, originally four-and-twenty, by the encroachments of the more powerful over the weaker, had been reduced, it is said, to eighteen or twenty; but on that point the accounts vary. They had frequent quarrels with one another, but these did not lead to such serious and obstinate contests as has been imagined. They did not draw the whole of their resources, whether of actual possession or credit, and plunge many thousands of unoffending people into the vortex of protracted war, but quickly settled their disputes by pitched encounters: in which they were accompanied and joined by the small corps of their respective body-guards. When the combat was over, the conqueror returned immediately to the capital, where most of the bashaws resided. The vanquished party returned also thither in a few days after. If he fell in battle, another bey was chosen in his stead; and there was an end of the matter. So that, on the whole, the disputes among the mamelukes were not of such an inveterate nature as to prevent a ready union against a common enemy.

There were about 10,000 Mamelukes clothed in one uniform, and which were at the disposal of government, or rather that of the beys, who seem to have considered themselves as forming, in some respects, a kind of republic. But, besides these, each mameluke kept on foot, or could easily raise bodies of men among his own vassals.

Besides the Turks and the Mamelukes, the Arabs and Copts form another set of inhabitants. The Arabs, who are all musselmen, may be divided into three classes: the first consists of the Fellahs, or husbandmen and artisans; the second of the Occidentals, who either cultivate the earth or live by trade; and, lastly, the Bedouins, or inhabitants of the desert, some of whom arrive yearly from the heart of Africa to profit by the fertility of the country, and retire, during the spring, into the desert; others are stationary in Egypt: but all of them are detested by the farmers, whom they pillage, and by the travellers, whom they rob. The Bedouin Arabs were attached to the Mahometan faith.

The Copts, christians of the Eutychian sect, are descended from the mixture of Egyptians, Persians, and Greeks, who possessed the country under the Ptolemies and Constantines. Being less ignorant than the other inhabitants, they are become the depositaries of the registers of the lands and tribes; at Cairo they are also the secretaries and collectors of government.

The other inhabitants consist of Jews and Greeks. The Mamelukes, disdaining to marry the natives, form alliances with their own countrywomen alone, who, like themselves, are slaves brought from Georgia, Mingrelia, &c.

CHAPTER VI.

Critical Situation of Bonaparte.—His Proceedings.—His Army inclined to mutiny.—Capture of Alexandria.—Louis Bonaparte's Account of it.—Action at Chebreisse.—Battle near the Pyramids.—The French enter Cairo.

BONAPARTE, having anchored in the neighbourhood of Alexandria, received a visit from the French consul, who repaired on board the Orient, and communicated very unpleasant intelligence. He stated, that the appearance of the fleet had occasioned great commotions in the city, which was prepared for defence; that all the christians were in danger of being massacred; that Admiral Nelson, with fourteen line-of-battle ships, had arrived three days before; and, not finding the armament there, sailed immediately in pursuit of it, towards the north-east. The commander-in-chief found, by this information, that his situation was very critical, and he was therefore determined to precipitate all his movements.

Bonaparte addressed his army in a manner perfectly suited to the designs he had in view, and spoke to the following purport:

"The people with whom you are now going to establish an intercourse, are Mahometans. The first article of their faith is, There is no god but God, and Mahomet is his prophet. Do not contradict them. Treat their mufties and imans with respect, as you have done the rabbies and bishops. The Roman legions protected all religions. You will find here usages different from those of Europe. You will reconcile yourselves to them by custom." The French general also told them, that they were going to undertake a valuable conquest, and give the English a most sensible blow; that they should have much to do, and fight several battles; but that they should succeed in every thing. He then railed against the mamelukes, who, he said, tyrannize over the inhabitants of the banks of the Nile; but that they should cease to exist. He informed them, that the first city they should arrive at was built by Alexander, and that they would meet, at every step, with objects to excite emulation.

Bonaparte then issued general orders from on board the Orient. He commenced by ordering the generals, who commanded detached divisions, to seal up the registers of the revenue; and all the mamelukes to be arrested and taken to headquarters. Having made a disposition of all horses and camels for the use of the army, and stated the sum to be paid for each by the quarter-master-general, he concluded by stating, that all soldiers, stealing horses or camels, should be punished.

In a subsequent order he fixed the superintendence of the coast, and appointed the officers to their situations; he also added a clause, that all sailors, under thirty, should be put in requisition.

Bonaparte transmitted three proclamations, prepared beforehand, and dated on board the flag-ship; the first to the Pacha of Egypt, stating, "that he was come to put an end to the exactions of the Mamelukes;" and inviting his highness, in the oriental style, "to meet and curse, along with him, the impious race of the beys;" the second was addressed to the inhabitants, in which he declared, "that he was come to rescue the rights of the poor from the hands of their tyrants;" and added, "that the French respected, more than the mamelukes, God, his prophet, and the Koran.

"Cadis, Cheiks, Imans, Tchirbadjees," he continued, "tell the people that we are the friends of the true musselmen. Did we not dethrone the Pope, who preached that it was necessary to make war against the true believers? Did we not destroy the knights of Malta, because those foolish men thought that God wished hostilities to be perpetually carried on against those of your faith?" After stating that all the towns and villages, which might arm against the French, should be burnt, he commanded every one to remain in his house, enjoined prayers to be said as usual, and concluded with "Glory to the sultan; glory to the French army, his friends; curses to the mamelukes; and happiness to the people of Egypt."

The third proclamation was to the following effect:—

BONAPARTE, Member of the National Institute, Commander-in-Chief, to the Commander of the Caraval, at Alexandria.

*Head-quarters, on board the Orient,
July 1, 1798.*

"The beys have loaded our merchants with exactions, and I am come to demand reparation.

"I shall be at Alexandria to-morrow; but this ought not to alarm you. You are a subject of our great friend the sultan; conduct yourself accordingly; but, if you commit the slightest act of hostility against the French army, I shall treat you as an enemy, and you will have no one to blame for it but yourself; for such a thing is far from my intention, and from my heart.

"Your's,

"BONAPARTE."

On the same evening Bonaparte made arrangements for landing, and fixed on the Point at Marabou as the spot; he ordered the fleet to anchor as near the Point as possible; but two ships of war, in preparing to execute this, ran foul of the admiral's ship, which caused the order to be countermanded, and the armament remained at its then situation. They were at a distance of about three leagues from the shore, the wind was northerly, and blew with violence, and the debarkation was equally perilous and difficult; but nothing could retard the brave men, who were eager to anticipate the hostile dispositions of the inhabitants. The sea was covered with boats, which stemmed the impetuosity of the waves. The galley with Bonaparte approached the nearest breakers, whence the entrance to the creek of Marabou was discovered; he waited for those boats that were to join him; but they arrived not till after sun-set, and could not, during the night, penetrate the ledge of breakers. Near one o'clock in the morning of July 2, the general-in-chief landed, at the head of the foremost troops, who formed in the desert, about nine miles from Alexandria.

Neither Desaix nor Regnier had as yet been able to reach the shore, and the distance of the shipping had also precluded the arrival of both cannon and cavalry. The troops which landed consisted of 1000 men belonging to Kleber's division, 1800 of Menou's, and about 1500 of General Bon's. As expedition was chiefly aimed at, the van of the army was to commence its march at half after two.

It is asserted upon good authority, that the French troops, on beholding the dreary aspect of the desert, actually mutinied, and refused to land, until Kleber interposed, and prevailed upon his division to consent.

Bonaparte, accompanied by his staff, headed the advanced guard along with General Caffarelli, who, notwithstanding his wooden leg, did not wait the arrival of a horse. General Bon commanded the column on the right; that in the centre was led by General Kleber; while the left, under General Menou, proceeded along the sea-coast. The troops met with little interruption, except from a few scattered Arabs, who killed an officer, and at break of day beheld Pompey's pillar. At length they arrived within a short distance of the old town, which was immediately summoned; but the shouts of men, women, and children, accompanied by some cannon-shot, soon demonstrated that the enemy was not inclined to surrender. Hereupon Bonaparte gave orders to beat a charge, and the French, advancing towards the walls, prepared to scale them, although the fire of the besieged was accompanied by a dreadful shower of stones. While the generals and privates were attempting to reach the summit, Kleber received a musket-shot in the head, and Menou was thrown back from the parapet covered with contusions. By means of a guide, the walls were at length covered by the French troops, and the besieged fled; those, however, who garrisoned the old town, continued their fire, and refused to submit.

These generous invaders, who came, as Bonaparte said, to visit them in pure friendship, in order to introduce liberty and happiness, now penetrated into the city, engaged in the streets, and put a great number of the inhabitants to death. The rest of the natives, dispirited by the dreadful slaughter that had taken place, and being promised that their property should be safe, laid down their arms. The city, notwithstanding, was pillaged by the French, though in the treaty, signed between the inhabitants and the invaders, who with the city obtained possession of two forts, the following clause was inserted:—

“The general-in-chief of the French army promises, on his part, that no one of the soldiers shall molest the inhabitants of Alexandria, by vexatious proceedings, rapine, or menaces; and those who shall commit such excesses, shall be punished with the utmost rigor.”

The following account of the capture of this city was given by the French general, in a letter to his brother Joseph, dated Alexandria, July 6.

“At break of day on the 2d, we invested Alexandria, after driving into the town several small detachments of cavalry. The enemy defended themselves like men; the artillery, which they planted on the walls, was wretchedly served, but their musketry was excellent. These people have no idea of children’s play; they either kill, or are killed. The first inclosure, however, that is to say, that of the city of the Arabs, was carried; and soon after the second, in spite of the fire from the houses. The forts which are on the coast, on the other side of the city, were then invested, and in the evening capitulated.

“Since the 2d of July we have been engaged in disembarking the troops, the artillery, and the baggage. General Desaix is at Demanhur, on the Nile; the rest of the army is to follow him.

“The place where we disembarked is about two leagues from hence, at the tower of Marabout, or the Isles des Arabes. The two first days we had a number of stragglers cut off by the Arab and Mameluke cavalry. I imagine that we have lost about 100 killed, and as many wounded. The generals, Kleber, Menou, and Lasalle, are wounded.

“I send you the proclamation to the inhabitants of the country, which has produced an effect altogether astonishing. The Bedouins, enemies of the Mamelukes, and who, properly speaking, are neither more nor less than intrepid robbers, sent us back, as soon as they had read it, thirty of our people whom they had made prisoners, with an offer of their services against the mamelukes. We have treated them kindly. They are an invincible people, inhabiting a burning desert, mounted on the fleetest horses in the world, and full of courage: they live with their wives and children in flying camps, which are never pitched two nights together in the same place. They are horrible savages, and yet they have some notion of gold and silver; a small quantity of it serves to excite their admiration. Yes, my dear brother, they love gold; they pass their lives in extorting it from such Europeans as fall into their hands; and for what purpose?—for continuing the course of life which I have described, and for teaching it to their children. O Jean Jacques! why was it not thy fate to see those men, whom thou callest ‘the men of nature?’ Thou wouldest sink with shame, thou wouldest startle with horror at the thought of having once admired them!

“Adieu, my dear brother, let me hear from you soon. I suffered a great deal on our passage; this climate kills me; we shall be so altered that you will discover the change at a league’s distance.

“The remarkable objects here are, Pompey’s column, the obelisks of Cleopatra, the spot where her baths once stood, a number of ruins, a subterraneous temple, some catacombs, mosques, and a few churches. But what is still more remarkable, is the character and manners of the inhabitants; they are of a sang-froid absolutely astonishing; nothing agitates them; and death itself is to them what a voyage to America is to the English.

“Their exterior is imposing; the most marked physiognomies amongst us are mere children’s countenances compared to theirs. The women wrap themselves up in a piece of cloth, which passes over their heads, and descends in front to the eyebrows. The poorer sort cover the whole of their face with linen, leaving only two small apertures for the eyes; so that, if this strange veil happens to be a little shrivelled, or stained, they look like so many hobgoblins.

“Their forts and their artillery are the most ridiculous things in nature. They have not even a lock, nor a window to their houses; in a word, they are still involved in all the blindness of the earliest ages.

“Oh! how many misanthropes would be converted, if chance should conduct them into the midst of the deserts of Arabia!”

On establishing his head-quarters at Alexandria, Bonaparte issued a proclamation, stating, that the beys from Georgia had desolated the country, and oppressed the French merchants; that he had arrived, and the fate of the beys was sealed. He told the inhabitants, that the French were come to rescue them from the hands of their tyrants; that they adored God, and honored the prophet and the koran; that their friendship should be extended to all who joined them, or maintained a strict neutrality—but for the beys there should be no deliverance; that all the villages should send to the French general, stating their submission, and that they should hoist the French flag; every village opposing the French was doomed to be burnt; the cheiks and other public officers should continue to execute their respective functions, and all the people of Egypt should offer up their prayers for the destruction of the beys.

Bonaparte established himself at Alexandria, as he had done at Malta; like an arrogant tyrant, he ordered every person, except the muftis, imams, and cheiks, to deposit their arms in a given place within twenty-four hours after; that all the inhabitants should wear the tri-colored cockade, reserving to himself the right of distributing a tri-colored shawl to the cheiks who might distinguish themselves; that the troops were to pay military honors to whoever wore a shawl, and that they should be treated with all due respect. Foreign agents were not to display their colors, and the consul only was to have his name over his door.

Bonaparte, judging the people to be only barbarians, treated them as too ignorant to exercise any of the reasoning faculties; the next proclamation called upon them for reliance on his honor and friendship, in the very paper which acknowledged him the ally of the grand seignior, whose territories he had thus wrested from him!

Possession having been thus obtained of Alexandria, with the loss of only a colonel and seventy soldiers killed and wounded, General Desaix, who had arrived with his division, accompanied by two field-pieces, was immediately dispatched towards Cairo, on purpose to take advantage of the terror with which the Mamelukes would necessarily be inspired by the sudden arrival of the French.

During the interim, Bonaparte issued orders for the transports and two Venetian men of war to enter the old port. He was desirous also, that the fleet should shelter itself there from the enemy; but, on sounding the channel, it appeared there was not sufficient depth of water for the Orient; the road of Aboukir was, therefore, chosen as the fittest anchorage.

The cannon, cavalry, and military stores, having been disembarked, a divan established at Alexandria, and the chief command entrusted to Kleber, in the course of five days a flotilla was established on the Nile. This flotilla consisted of seven small sloops, three gun-boats, and a xebec, and would have been a great assistance to the army, had the route of Rosetta been taken, in carrying the baggage and provisions of the troops, but the French had not yet taken Rosetta, and by that route Bonaparte would have retarded the progress to Cairo at least eight or ten days; he therefore determined to advance through the desert by Dementour, and by this way General Desaix was ordered to proceed.

General Dugua had orders to proceed with the dismounted cavalry to the mouth of the Nile, to cover the entrance of the French flotilla into that river; he was also instructed to take possession of Rosetta, to establish a divan, erect a battery at Lisbé, and embark a quantity of rice in the flotilla; after which he was to proceed towards Cairo, on the left bank of the Nile, to join the army near Rahmanieh, and the flotilla was to proceed up the river.

The French were greatly annoyed by the Arabs; General Desaix was nearly taken prisoner, when not more than fifty paces in the rear; and Le Meriar fell a sacrifice within 100 paces of the advanced guard; Delanau, an adjutant, was made prisoner within a few yards of the troops; and the Arabs settled a quarrel amongst themselves about sharing the ransom, by blowing out his brains! The Mamelukes presented themselves in front of the army; these horsemen retired, and, certain of victory, ceased to harass a march which, under a burning sun, gave nothing but hunger and thirst; the soldiers cried for bread, while the dazzling sunbeams, playing on a sandy soil, displayed such a resemblance to water, as to deceive, not only the stranger, but those who had before witnessed it.

Early in July, the main army left Alexandria. The Arabs filled up all the wells at Beda and Birkit; so that the soldiers, scorched by the heat of the sun, felt a parching thirst, which they could not assuage. The wells were explored, but a little muddy water could only be obtained. Many skirmishes took place, in one of which General de Brigade Mireur was mortally wounded.

When the army was on its march for Rhaminie, the scarcity of wells obliged some of the divisions to halt. The soldiers soon discovered the Nile; they plunged in, and eagerly assuaged their thirst. Speedily the drums recalled them to their colors; a corps of about eight hundred mamelukes were seen approaching in order of battle; the soldiers ran to their arms; the enemy retired, and went towards Dementour, where they met the division of General Desaix: the discharge of cannon announced an action. Bonaparte marched against the Mamelukes, but the artillery of General Desaix had made them retreat, leaving forty men killed or wounded; ten of the infantry were slightly wounded. The troops, being exhausted, were greatly in want of repose; and the horses, harassed by the voyage, required it still more. This induced Bonaparte to halt at Rhaminie the 11th and 12th, when he expected the flotilla, and the division under General Dugua.

General Dugua had taken Rosetta without any obstacle, and joined the army at the expected period. As to the flotilla, he announced that it ascended the river with great difficulty, from the shallowness of the water; however, it arrived on the 14th, and, during that night, the army set out for Miniét-el-Sayd, where it rested; and proceeded again on its march.

About 4000 Mamelukes were discovered at the distance of a league, their right covered by the village of Chebreisse, where they placed some pieces of cannon, and also by the Nile, on which was a flotilla of gun-boats and armed gemes. Bonaparte ordered the French flotilla to dispose itself so as to act with the left of the army, and to engage the enemy's vessels, when the former should attack the Mamelukes and the village of Chebreisse. The violence of the wind deranged this plan; the flotilla was driven nearly a league higher up, where it engaged at a great disadvantage, as it had, at the same time, to sustain the fire of the Mamelukes, the peasants, and the Arabs, and to defend itself against the enemy's flotilla. Some of the peasants, led on by a party of Mamelukes, possessed themselves of one galley and a gun-boat. The commander, Perée, made a successful attack in his turn, and retook the galley and the gun-boat. His xebec, which dealt fire and death, destroyed several of the enemy's gun-boats; he was powerfully supported in this unequal contest by the coolness of General Andreossi, and Bourienne, secretary to Bonaparte, who were on board the xebec.

Bonaparte soon understood, by the noise of the artillery, that the flotilla was engaged; and immediately approaching Chebreisse, perceived the Mamelukes ranged in front of the village. He reconnoitred the position, and formed his army into five divisions, each of which constituted a hollow square; the artillery was at the angles, and in the centre the cavalry and baggage. The grenadiers of each square formed platoons, which flanked the divisions, and were to reinforce the points of attack. The miners posted themselves in two villages in the rear, to secure places of retreat. The Mamelukes suddenly advanced in crowds, and wheeled about on the flanks and on the rear; others fell on the right and front of the army. They were allowed to approach, when the artillery opened, and they were soon put to flight. Some of the bravest rushed upon the platoons on the flanks; these were received with firmness, and nearly the whole were killed by the fire of the small-arms, or by the bayonet. The army advanced against the village of Chebreisse, which the right wing was to attack. It was carried after a slight resistance; the defeat of the Mamelukes was complete; they fled in disorder towards Cairo; their flotilla got up the Nile with all possible expedition. The loss of the Mamelukes was about 700 men, more killed than wounded: that of the French was about seventy, besides the loss on board the flotilla. When the French recovered their squadron from the Mamelukes, they found themselves stripped of every thing.

Perée, in his account of this engagement, said, "I cannot describe to you what we suffered in this expedition: we were reduced, for several days, to subsist entirely on water-melons, during which, we were constantly exposed to the fire of the Arabs, although, with the exception of a few killed and wounded, we always came off victorious. The Nile is very far from answering the description I had received of it; it winds incessantly, and is withal very shallow."

Bonaparte ordered Zayoncheck, the general of brigade, to proceed with about 500 dismounted cavalry, along the right bank of the Nile, in a parallel line to the march of the army, which advanced on the left bank. The army was incessantly harassed on the march by the Arabs; it could not advance farther than a cannon-shot without falling into an ambuscade. All communication, beyond 300 toises from the rear of the army, was cut off, and no intelligence could be forwarded to, or received from, Alexandria. Neither men nor cattle were to be seen, for all the villages were abandoned. The French soldiers lay upon heaps of corn, and subsisted only upon some lentils, and a kind of thin cakes, which they made themselves by bruising the corn.

The army continued its march towards Cairo; and, on the 19th of July, General Zayoncheck united with the main army, where the Nile divides itself into two branches, those of Rosetta and Damietta. At this time, Mourad Bey, at the head of 6000 Mamelukes and a host of Arabs and peasants, was entrenched at Ernbabé, waiting for the French; and, on the 22d, Desaix, with the advanced guard, arrived within two miles of the spot. The heat was intense, and the soldiers excessively fatigued, which induced Bonaparte to halt. But the Mamelukes no sooner saw the army, than they formed upon the plain; an appearance so grand was never before witnessed by the French; the cavalry of the mamelukes were covered with resplendent armour. Beyond their left were the celebrated pyramids, which have survived so many empires, and braved, for more than thirty centuries, the outrages of time. Behind their right was the Nile, the city of Cairo, the hills of Mokattam, and the fields of the ancient Memphis.

The same disposition having been made as at Chebreisse, Bonaparte gave orders for a charge, but the Mamelukes prevented this movement; they made a feint against the centre, and rushed, with their usual impetuosity, on the divisions of Desaix and Reignier, which formed the right: they charged their columns, which reserved their fire until the enemy advanced within half-musket shot, when the Mamelukes in vain strove to break through a rampart of bayonets; their ranks were thinned, a number of killed and wounded remained on the field, and they fell back in disorder, not venturing to renew the action.

General Dugua, with the divisions of Bon and Menou, supported by that of Kleber, advanced against the intrenched village of Ernbabé. Two battalions, under the Generals Rampon and Marmont, were detached to turn the village, and to take advantage of a deep ditch that was in the way, to defend themselves from the enemy's cavalry, and conceal their movements towards the Nile. The divisions rapidly advanced; the Mamelukes attacked the platoons, and unmasked forty pieces of bad artillery; but the divisions rushed forward, so that the Mamelukes could not re-load their guns. The camp and the village of Ernbabé were carried by the bayonet. Fifteen hundred Mameluke cavalry, and as many peasants, whose retreat was cut off, occupied a position behind a ditch that communicated with the Nile; these brave men would not surrender, and were all either put to the sword or drowned in the Nile.

Mourad Bey, who commanded upon this occasion, on perceiving the village of Ernbabé carried, thought proper to retreat, leaving behind him 400 camels, forty pieces of cannon, baggage, and provisions. The divisions of Generals Dessaix and Reignier had already forced his cavalry to fall back; the army pursued the Mamelukes; and the French, after marching and fighting nineteen hours, occupied a position at Ghazah. Never was the superiority of disciplined courage over ill-directed valor more sensibly felt than at this time.

This victory, obtained with the loss of ten men killed, and about thirty wounded, presented a rich spoil for the invaders, who seized on many fine Arabian horses, superbly caparisoned, and found all the purses of the vanquished filled with gold; which amply compensated the soldiers for the excessive fatigues they had suffered. During fifteen days, their nourishment was a few vegetables without bread; the provisions found in the camp, therefore, afforded them an agreeable entertainment.

On the 23d of July the principal inhabitants of Cairo offered to deliver up the city to Bonaparte, who received them at Ghazah; they asked protection for the city, and engaged for its submission. The French general declared, he wished to remain in friendship with the Egyptian people and the Ottoman Porte, and assured them that the customs and religion of the country should be scrupulously respected. They returned to Cairo with a detachment under the command of a French officer. The French troops, notwithstanding, committed excesses; the mansion of Mourad Bey having been pillaged and burnt.

Mourad Bey took refuge in Upper Egypt, while his colleague, Ibrahim Bey, fled towards Syria. Bonaparte removed his head-quarters to Cairo; the divisions of Generals Ragnier and Menou were stationed at Old Cairo; those of Bon and Kleber at Boulac; a corps of observation was placed on the route of Syria; and the division of Dessaix occupied an entrenched position about three leagues in front of Ernbabé, on the route to Upper Egypt. As soon as the French general obtained the confidence of the cheiks and principal families, he organised a provisional government. For the first time, since the days of Mahomet, a deliberative assembly was formed by musselmen representatives. All the principal cheiks, throughout the fourteen provinces of Egypt, who had not exhibited a marked enmity to the invaders, were summoned to meet in the capital; and deputies selected from these constituted a convention, over which Berthollet and Mouge, the former a chemist and the latter a mathematician, assisted as commissioners on the part of France; while Abdallah Kerkaori, an Arabian prince, exercised the functions of president. The members of this divan were permitted to wear turbans, which distinguished them from other chiefs, while over their shoulders were extended tri-colored shawls, descending to their heels.

The French general sent his dispatches to Alexandria and to Paris; and, it being customary with him to convey the rarities of Egypt to the Museum at Paris, he ordered the Mamelukes, whom he had taken prisoners, to be transported in his first collection of natural curiosities. Accordingly, a letter was written to Admiral Brueys, accompanied by twelve Mamelukes, named, whom he wished to be sent to France by the first opportunity. Bonaparte informed the admiral, that, after almost incredible hardships, he was at length quiet in Cairo; and desired him not to be uneasy about the subsistence of his men, the country being rich in provisions almost beyond imagination; he urged him to dispatch the courier he sent in a frigate, to land wherever he thought proper; and said, that he had dispatched, by the Nile, a prodigious quantity of provisions, to pay for the freight of the transports.

Bonaparte also wrote to General Kleber, telling him there was a very excellent mint at Cairo, and desiring him to get back all the ingots he had given to the merchants, in lieu of which he promised them wheat and rice, of which he had immense quantities: these ingots were plunder, taken at Malta, which had been left with General Kleber at Alexandria, to pay the transports to serve in the expedition.

General Kleber was occupied in procuring supplies and providing for the sick; both which duties were attended with great difficulty, as water was obliged to be supplied from Rosetta. The commissary of the marine, and those employed in the victualling-service, complained of the pains and trouble it cost to do the most trifling thing. Kleber laid these obstacles to the hostility of the new divan, and, in a fit of anger, caused the old Cheriff, Coraim, to be sent a prisoner on board the Orient; but the commissary, in a letter to Admiral Brueys, declared, that it was owing to not finding scherms (lighters) enough at Rosetta to convey water and provisions to supply the fleet; until the 29th of July only five of those vessels could be had, and the demand of the fleet could not be supplied until more could be procured from Damietta. Such was the wretched state of the French army in Egypt.

Nelson proceeds in quest of the French Fleet.—Battle of the Nile.—Happy Effects of the Victory.—The Porte declares War against France.—Russia sends a Fleet into the Mediterranean.—Declaration of the King of Naples, who marches against the French.—Defeat of the Neapolitans.—Abdication of the King of Sardinia.

THE destination of the French fleet, by which the conquest of Malta and Egypt was effected, had long attracted the attention of all Europe, and particularly of England; but, though many vague conjectures were afloat before the object of the armament was ascertained, the number and rates of the ships employed upon the occasion were well known. Indeed the distracted state of Ireland did not permit England to detach a fleet for the purpose of blocking up Toulon, and preventing the French from leaving that port; positive instructions, however, were sent to Lord St. Vincent, then stationed off Cadiz, to select a sufficient number of line-of-battle ships for a pursuit, the nomination of which was entirely left to his lordship's choice; but the name of the commander, to whose discretion they were to be entrusted, was particularly specified: this was the enterprising Rear-admiral Nelson, who was already in the Mediterranean, having a flying squadron under his command, with his flag hoisted on board the Vanguard; but this force was by no means sufficient to cope with so powerful an armament as that under Brueys, the French admiral. Ten sail were at length detached, under Captain Trowbridge, as soon as the arrival of a reinforcement from the Channel fleet enabled Lord St. Vincent to spare them; and, when these had joined, Rear-admiral Nelson determined to proceed in quest of the enemy.

Having repaired to the neighbourhood of Naples, for the purpose of obtaining information, he afterwards directed his course to Sicily, and there, for the first time, heard of the surrender of Malta. He immediately took on board expert pilots, and was the first commander who ever passed the Straits of Messina with a fleet of men of war.

After staying only a week, the rear-admiral heard that the French had left Malta; he then steered for Candia, and, being assured that they were destined for Egypt, he sailed thither, and arrived at the mouth of the Nile three days before

Bonaparte. After consulting with the English consul, he supposed his former information to be false, and repaired to Rhodes, having actually passed Bonaparte's fleet in the fog, as they were lying to for the convoy. He returned to Sicily, and, in the bay of Syracuse, procured supplies of every kind for his squadron.

In the course of a few days the English admiral again went in search of the French expedition, and, being informed that it had arrived in Egypt some time before, he once more steered for Alexandria, and, as he approached the coast, saw the object of his desire. The position occupied by the French was in the very place where the famous combat between Augustus Cæsar and Mark Anthony, nineteen hundred years since, decided the empire of the world. History must again record a matter almost as important—a naval battle between the fleets of two of the most powerful states of the civilized world, on which depended their maritime superiority, the immediate renewal of the war on the continent of Europe, and the eventual possession of Egypt.

When Admiral Brueys disembarked the troops under his convoy, he arrived, on the 7th of July, in the bay of Aboukir, forming a line of battle, his headmost ship being as close as possible to a shoal to the north-west, the rest of the fleet forming a curve along the line of deep water, flanked by a number of gun-boats, and, on an island in the van, by a battery of shells and mortars. Thus defended, the French admiral waited till the 31st of July, trusting too much, we presume, to his own strength, because he had abundant time to have taken shelter in Corfu or Malta, which was the earnest but fruitless recommendation of General Bonaparte.

The British fleet hove in sight on the 1st of August, and Admiral Nelson, on a near approach, determined on a manœuvre never before hazarded by any commander, and which, perhaps, was only justified by the known coolness of the veteran officers of his fleet, and the undaunted courage of his sailors, habituated to victory. Being made fully acquainted, by repeated soundings, with the depth of water near the shoal, he daringly gave the signal, which was executed with the same temerity, to turn the head of the enemy's line; in consequence of which, the whole van was attacked on both sides (the French lying at anchor) before any of the ships could move to their assistance.

The sanguinary action commenced a little before the setting of the sun. A signal was made to engage from van to centre, both to windward and leeward; but, as the English fleet advanced for that purpose, the Culloden struck on the northern shore of the Bequier Island, and remained unserviceable: this circumstance, instead of proving fatally disastrous, contributed to the preservation of two other vessels, she having served as a beacon or strand-mark to the Alexander and Leander, then in her wake, which consequently avoided the danger. Captain Foley, in the Goliath, which took the lead, having been followed by the Zealous, the Orion, and the Theseus, notwithstanding they were assailed by the batteries on shore, and the gun-boats stationed on the flank, attacked the van ships of the French in succession as they came up, and then pushed in between their line of battle and the land; while the Vanguard, with the admiral's flag on board, and the signal for close action still flying, kept on the outside, and came to anchor exactly opposite to the Spartiate. In the mean time the Minotaur was opposed to the Aquilon, the Defence to the Souverain Peuple, and the Swiftsure of 74 to the Franklin of 80; but the most unequal part of the contest was reserved for Captain Darby, of the Bellerophon, who had to oppose the commander-in-chief, in the Orient; but he was soon assisted by Capt. Ball, of the Alexander, who assumed such a position as enabled him to annoy, though not to silence, the tremendous batteries of their antagonist. Soon after this, the Leander, which, from her inferiority, could not be considered as appertaining to the line of battle, anchored in a most judicious station, by placing a spring upon her cable, and opening a well-directed fire on the Franklin and Le Souverain Peuple, (which she would not have been able to contend with, had they not been previously engaged,) contributed greatly to the general success.

Such was the masterly disposition of the British fleet, which had thus doubled upon and engaged with only half of the enemy's, while the remainder was obliged to remain inactive, that the project, though daring, proved fortunate, particularly as the yards and rigging of the adverse ships were frequently entangled together, whereby the English seamen were able to display their usual superiority in close fight. Although some of the van struck, the fate of the engagement remained as yet undecided; for those in the rear were untouched, and the Orient, which still continued to pour forth successive broadsides from all her decks, seemed to prove a match for her adversaries: however, a little after nine, she was perceived to be on fire, and, in about an hour after, blew up with a terrible explosion, the force of which was so great, as to shatter her upper works to pieces, and endanger the safety of the English vessels. Notwithstanding this awful spectacle, the action did not cease until day-light; and even then, after a short interval, it was resumed, as several vessels of force still displayed the French flag, nor did it terminate until about noon, when the victory was complete.

The result of this memorable engagement was that out of a fleet of thirteen sail, the admiral, of 120 guns, and the Timoleon, of 74, were burnt, while two 80-gun ships, the Franklin and Tonnant, and seven of 74, were captured. Two vessels of the line, the Guillaume Tell and the Généreux, put to sea during the general confusion, and, with two frigates, found means to escape, notwithstanding the Zealous was sent in pursuit of them; but they did not long remain in possession of the enemy, having been seized soon after: thus the whole of the armament was either taken, sunk, or burnt.

The French, as imagined, lost about 6000 men; the English had 218 killed and 677 wounded, the largest portion of whom belonged to the Bellerophon, the Vanguard, and the Majestic. One officer only was killed, Captain Westcott, who fell early in the action, and was succeeded by Lieutenant Cuthbert, who continued the fight with great gallantry. The intrepid Nelson was wounded in the head, and carried off the deck, while Captain Berry, who took his place, evinced the same courage.

Achard, a lieutenant de vaisseau, in his account of this action, condemned the conduct of the French commander, and asserted,

1. That Le Guerrier was originally moored close to the bank, in five fathoms and a half; but was ordered to move forward, notwithstanding the representations of the captain.

2. That the crews of the headmost ships were all desirous to fire the moment that the leading vessels of the English were within half-cannon shot; but that the commanders refused until a signal for that purpose should be made by the admiral; in consequence of which, the enemy were permitted to choose their position at leisure.

3. That instead of holding a council of war, or making preparations for defence, a distribution of rice actually took place among the ships, notwithstanding the English were in sight from two to six, when the action commenced: and,

4. That the utmost confusion was visible on board the admiral's ship, which was set on fire, not by the enemy's guns, but by mere carelessness; several casks of linseed-oil having been left on the deck.

This account, however, neither corresponds with the report of the English officers, who affirmed that the fire of L'Orient was incessant and tremendous, nor with Achard's former assertion, that previously to the bursting out of the flames, the Bellerophon was about to strike to her. The French commander appears to have been indefensible;

1. In omitting to strengthen his flanks, by means of the two Venetian men of war then lying useless in the old harbour of Alexandria, which would have presented a more formidable bulwark than the batteries on the little island and the gun-boats, which indeed annoyed, but never once interrupted the evolutions of the British squadron. And

2. In forgetting to moor his fleet in such a manner as to tail on the shoals, and thus prevent the antagonist from doubling upon and getting between them and the land.

It was, however, unjust, as well as illiberal, to blame the French admiral after his death; particularly as it had been stated by Brueys, that he detained the fleet to gratify the wishes of the commander-in-chief; and, probably, it was to atone for this, that Bonaparte wrote a letter of kindness and condolence to Madame Brueys.

As soon as the news of this naval victory reached England, bonfires and illuminations declared the joy of the public; and the king and both houses of parliament bestowed marks of favor on the fleet. His majesty conferred the dignity of a baron of Great Britain, with a pension of 3000*l.* per annum, on the admiral, who was accordingly called up to the house of peers, by the style and dignity of Baron Nelson of the Nile. The captains E. Berry and T. B. Thompson received the honor of knighthood, and the other commanders were presented with gold medals.

The Turkish sultan, in consequence of this joyful event, transmitted to Admiral Nelson a superb diamond chelengk, or plume of triumph, taken from one of the imperial turbans, and a sable fur with broad sleeves; also a purse of 2000 sequins, to be distributed among the wounded. A much larger sum, however, was raised for the widows and children of those who perished in the action, by public subscription. The king of Naples, at a later period, conferred upon the English admiral the title of Duke of Bronte, with an estate in Sicily.

Admiral Gantheaume, who had escaped from the Orient during the conflagration, by getting into a boat which was under her counter, in his account said, "that the whole of their van was often raked, and the smoke so thick, that with difficulty they could distinguish the different movements; that in about an hour after the action had commenced, the admiral was wounded twice, and soon after killed on the quarter-deck; that while they were briskly firing from the lower deck guns, they found the quarter-deck on fire, which spread so rapidly, that all was soon in flames; their pumps and sockets were destroyed; the flames increased, and made an alarming progress; they had lost their main and mizen masts, and the fire rapidly spread; both captains were wounded, but the scuttles were ordered to be opened, and every one to quit the ship. At day-break several ships were discovered in possession of the enemy; two which ran aground were attacked, and obliged to strike; four set their sails and stood out to sea; the Timoleon ran ashore, and was set fire to by her crew, to prevent her falling into the enemy's hands. He details the accounts (he added) from memory, not being able to preserve a memorandum of any description.

During this time Tallien was at Rosetta, and in a letter to Barras the director, he said, "Consternation has overwhelmed us all. I set out tomorrow for Cairo, to carry the news to Bonaparte. It will shock him the more, as he had no idea of its happening. He will find resources in himself to prevent the disaster being fatal to the army which he commands."

The intelligence of this astonishing disaster threw the whole French army into consternation, excepting Bonaparte, who knew the ill effects of giving way to apprehension. He congratulated the army on their safe landing, and would not allow that the object of his expedition was frustrated. "To England," he was pleased to say, "is decreed the empire of the sea—to France that of the land." In allusion to the rash determination of the French admiral, to await the arrival of the British squadron, he observed—"If in this fatal act he had his faults, he has expiated them by a glorious death."

Great events were produced by Lord Nelson's victory, the effect of which became most evident at Radstadt. The deputation of the empire had already agreed to a plan of indemnities; by means of which no less than forty-four of the secular and ecclesiastical states were to make immense sacrifices to obtain peace; and the Rhine, in consequence of a secret article of the treaty of Campo Formio, was to be the common boundary between France and Germany: but the attack on Switzerland and Rome, and the impolitic expedition of Bonaparte into Egypt, joined to the opposition experienced by him there, and, above all, the recent destruction of the French navy, rendered a new contest on the continent unavoidable.

The cabinet of Vienna was also determined to try the fortune of a new war, and accordingly, under pretence of maintaining the integrity of the empire, evinced the most unequivocal marks of hostility. The Ottoman Porte, too, which had lately exhibited great jealousy at seeing Istria and Dalmatia occupied by the imperial troops, now evinced its displeasure at the late unqualified aggression on the part of "a man of the name of Bonaparte, calling himself a French general, and who, in that capacity, had made war on the Turkish province of Egypt."—"Some of his emissaries," as added in this memorial, "have pretended to persuade the inhabitants of that country, that they have been sent by Mahomet to give them perfect liberty and happiness, and render their religion the sovereign religion on earth; but the people have answered, that Mahomet does not authorize injustice."

Nine days after, September 11, a formal manifesto was published, in which the Ottoman court called all Europe to witness, that, notwithstanding the frequent invitations of the combined powers, the most rigorous neutrality had been persevered in on its part, although great offence had been given, by the dispersion of seditious papers and the employment of secret agents, with a view of stirring up the inhabitants of Natolia and the Morea, as well as those of the islands of the Archipelago, to revolt. Having stated the various subterfuges recurred to by French ministers, for the purpose of concealing or palliating their injustice, this manifesto added, "that, contrary to the rights of nations, and in violation of the ties subsisting between the two courts, an army, in a manner altogether unprecedented, and like a band of pirates, had suddenly invaded Egypt, the most precious among the provinces of the Ottoman Porte; of which they took forcible possession, at a time when they had experienced nothing but the sincerest demonstrations of friendship." That country "being the portal of the two venerable cities Mecca and Medina," it was observed, "that to wage war upon this occasion, was become a precept of religion incumbent upon all mussulmen;" and it was intimated, towards the conclusion, "that the French ambassador and all his retinue had been sent to the Seven Towers, where they were to be detained as hostages."

An imperial decree was published at Constantinople, September 1, declaring the deposition of the grand vizier, Mehemet Pacha, who, as asserted, "had not observed the instructions given him, to attend to the defence of the Ottoman dominions: so that, in the dark himself with respect to the evil designs of those brutish infidels, the French, he did not in good time apprise the inhabitants of Egypt thereof. When the unhappy tidings from thence came to our imperial ear, a full month after that insufferable event came to pass, such was our grief and concern, that, we take God to witness! it drew tears from our eyes, and deprived us of sleep and rest. We have, therefore, immediately deposed him from the office of grand vizier, and have appointed in his place Youssouf Pacha, governor of Erzerum. Now, it being incumbent upon all true believers to combat those faithless brutes, the French; and it being a positive duty for our imperial person, to deliver the blessed territories from their accursed hands, and to revenge the insults which they have offered to mussulmen, no delay whatever is to take place for the arrival of the new vizier; but the most vigorous measures must be pursued to attack them by sea and land. Wherefore, by a deliberation with the illustrious lawyers, ministers, and chieftains, our subjects, you must, with a full confidence in God and his prophet, fix upon the effectual means of freeing the province of Egypt from the presence of such wretches. You will acquaint all the true believers in the respective quarters, that we are at war with the French, and, turning night into day, will apply your utmost efforts to take revenge of them."

Such was the resentment of the Ottoman Porte against France, which found an advocate in the emperor Paul, who became an active member of the new confederacy. The late Empress of Russia, Catherine II., whose death we have already mentioned, had been so occupied about the extension of her empire, even to the remotest period of her existence; that, instead of zealously entering into a contest which had proved unsuccessful to other powers, she contented herself with occasionally publishing manifestoes, and protecting the most distinguished emigrants, on whom she liberally conferred favors and pensions. Her son, however, Paul Petrowitz, a monarch of a different character, and anxious to distinguish his accession to the throne of the czars by some splendid action, evinced his readiness to oppose the new republic. A Russian squadron, of twelve sail of the line, under Admiral Ouschakoff, was permitted, for the first time, to sail through the Dardanelles, for the purpose of reducing the Venetian islands, in conjunction with their new allies the Turks. The success of this expedition we must, for the sake of chronological order, reserve for a future chapter.

This alliance against France was strengthened rather by the activity than the power of the King of Naples, who, contrary to the third article of the treaty of peace which he had lately entered into, admitted the hero of the Nile and his victorious fleet into the bay of Naples, September 22. His Sicilian majesty instantly went on board the admiral's ship, attended by a numerous train of barges and boats, with colors and music, the whole of that natural amphitheatre being crowded with spectators. Also when Rear-admiral (afterwards Lord) Nelson returned the royal visit, every mark of attention and respect was shown to him, and a new confederacy against France began to be publicly and confidently talked of. "Fire but one gun," said the Chevalier Acton, first minister to the King of Naples, "and the congress of Rastadt will be dissolved."

The King of Naples entered into engagements with the courts of Vienna and London, and was promised by the former a reinforcement of 16,000 troops, and by the latter the protection of a naval force and a subsidy. Having, in the mean time, obliged the convents and clergy to furnish him with money, he had recourse to new levies, and soon obtained a numerous, though not a formidable army. He also applied to the emperor for a commander, and obtained the assistance of General Mack. His majesty, notwithstanding, determined to place himself at the head of his troops, with the laudable hope of relieving the people of Rome from the rapacity and injustice of the invaders, avenging the cause of the dethroned pontiff, and liberating Italy from her oppressors. A manifesto was accordingly published by Ferdinand IV., dated at San Germano, Nov. 22, in which, after stating to his subjects "that he was about to march at the head of the brave defenders of their country, full of confidence in the Lord of Hosts," he told them, he had left "his dear and well-beloved consort regent during his absence," and observed, "that it is better to die gloriously, for God and our country, than to live shamefully oppressed." The metropolitan troops, accompanied by the monarch, commenced their march against the Roman republic on the following day; and the time chosen was peculiarly auspicious, as the attention of the directory was entirely occupied by the movements of the Russian troops.

The imperial general, Mack, sent a formal summons to General Championnet, who commanded in this quarter, to withdraw his troops from the Roman territory. To which Championnet replied, "that such a summons could only be regarded as an act of aggression, and a direct violation of the subsisting treaties." In reply to this declaration, General Mack, on the 25th of November, signified to General Championnet, that his Neapolitan majesty had, in person, passed the frontier on the preceding day, to take possession of the Roman territory, revolutionised and usurped since the peace of Campo Formio. The number of French troops in the Roman state did not exceed 10,000: and so little political discernment had the directory, or so defective was their information, that these were very ill armed and provided. The public magazines were empty, Civita-Vecchia itself left defenceless; and the invasion of the Neapolitans, who had collected on this occasion their whole military force, consisting of 60 or 70,000 men, without skill or discipline, was evidently, to the French government, a most unwelcome and unexpected measure, productive of great political embarrassment.

The Roman republic had long exhibited a scene of dilapidation and oppression beyond example. In what proportion the public distress was to be ascribed to the French commissioners, or to the government of Rome, established and supported by the power of France, is of little importance to ascertain. Probably the balance of injustice would be found, on examination, very equal. The disastrous measures of finance adopted by Faypoult, the chief of the French commissariate, were productive of ruin to individuals; and the plunder and corruption of the subordinate agents completed the picture of the public misery; and, together with the persecutions exercised against all who showed any disposition adverse to these proceedings, excited continual disturbances and insurrections, and destroyed every hope of establishing any rational system of liberty. The venerable names of senate, tribunate, and consulate, served only to remind the inhabitants of Rome of their degraded condition, and answered no other purpose than to add insult to injury, and contumely to oppression.

The state of things in Europe, since the victory of Aboukir, had also a great effect upon the mind of the Sardinian monarch, in whose dominions evident symptoms appeared of a counter-revolutionary spirit. Couriers were known frequently to pass between the two courts of Naples and Turin, and letters were intercepted which plainly proved the good understanding subsisting between them. In one of these, dated October the 2d, written by Prince Pignatelli to the Chevalier Prioca, his Sardinian majesty's minister, the arrival at Naples is announced of the Baron D'Awervech, "the secret agent of his Britannic majesty, who," said the prince, "seems to multiply himself, that he may be present wherever he can serve the cause which is to unite all the princes of Europe against France. You will see that fortune must cease to rebel against us, if we have only courage to follow her. The genius of Prince Repnin, seconding the vast conceptions of the cabinet of St. James's, is preparing to convert into mournful cypress those laurels with which the republicans have covered Italy."

The Baron D'Awervech himself, in another letter, addressed nearly at the same time to the Governor of Turin, thus expressed himself: "The ambassador from the court of London to Berlin has just concerted with Prince Repnin a measure, the most bold that modern diplomacy could suggest in the present circumstances, to put an end, as it were, by force, to the indecision of Austria. They will cause hostilities immediately to be commenced by the court of Naples. A treaty of alliance, offensive and defensive, between these two powers, will authorize his Sicilian majesty again to call to his aid the Austrian contingent. Then all Europe will be put in motion upon the shores of the Bosphorus, as well as upon those of the Danube, upon the banks of the Nieper as upon those of the Rhine, in order to precipitate themselves, en masse, upon that nation of usurpers.—Such, sir, is the plan concerted by the vast genius of Prince Repnin, and of which you now see the first openings."

As soon as the intelligence had reached Paris that the Neapolitans had passed the frontier, war was declared in form against their Sicilian and Sardinian majesties, the directory denouncing in their manifesto "the long train of perfidies of which the court of Naples had been guilty, and which were now brought to the height by an audacious attack upon the French republic; a court which, during the whole course of the war of the coalesced monarchs, distinguished itself by the most insensate fury against the republic, notwithstanding which, the French government made no other use of the superiority which victory gave them, than for the purpose of moderation." They then enumerated the recent instances in which the court of Naples had shewn its ingratitude—"inciting and encouraging the Romans to revolt, and displaying its hostility to the Ligurian and Cisalpine republics. While she dared not openly to declare war against France, she sought to destroy in Italy all the free states which were under her protection. Instead of inflicting signal vengeance for this conduct, the directory did not oppose the taking possession of the duchy of Benevento; they offered their mediation to deliver the King of Naples from the feudal pretensions of Rome. They sent to Naples a new ambassador, (M. Garat,) furnished with the most amicable and conciliatory powers, and were anxious to give satisfaction to his Sicilian majesty respecting the object of Bonaparte's expedition. In return, the fleet of Admiral Nelson was honorably received at Syracuse, and was re-victualled in that port. It even received stores from the arsenal of the king, pilots to clear the Straits of Messina, and whatever was necessary to secure the success of the attack against the French. If, too, we recollect the inconceivable joy which was manifested at Naples on the sight of the English fleet, the public honors which the court itself lavished on Admiral Nelson, in going out to welcome him, his triumphal entry, the large rewards granted to the messenger who brought the first account of this victory, and the illuminations and rejoicings which took place on this occasion;—if it be remembered that, from the time of this victory, the audacity of the Neapolitan government has known no bounds;—if all these circumstances are considered, it must be allowed that more hostile sentiments were never manifested on one side, nor more patience shown on the other. The guilt of the Sardinian government, as an accomplice with Naples, is manifest from a thousand circumstances;—its sentiments, its language, and even its actions, in proportion to its means, have been the same; and its artifice and hypocrisy exactly resemble that of Naples.

In fact, they have never ceased to make war in every way which their imbecility and their cowardice suffered them to put into execution. The Piedmontese troops marched towards Loana at the same moment in which the Neapolitan army attacked the French;—and in the same moment also it was that the Sardinian government dared to require the evacuation of the citadel, and the diminution of the French troops in Piedmont.”

General Championnet, conscious that he could not defend Rome, left a garrison in the castle of St. Angelo, and immediately retreated towards Civita-Castellana. He was followed by the consuls, the senators, and the tribunes of the new republic; and, on the 29th of November, the King of the Sicilies entered Rome, and took up his residence at the palace of Farnese, whilst the combined fleets of England and Naples took possession of Leghorn. His majesty now appeared so conscious of the stability of his recent conquest, that he invited the pope to return from Tuscany, and take possession of his capital. His holiness, however, foresaw that the triumph of this monarch, who had not yet been able to subdue the fortress of St. Angelo, would be but of short duration, and wisely declined the invitation.

During the occupation of Rome by the King of Naples, different detachments of the Neapolitan army had been defeated by the French Generals Lemoine and Rusca; and reinforcements now arriving from all parts, a general attack upon the Sicilians took place throughout their whole line of posts. In the various combats which ensued, the army of Naples suffered immense loss, 12,000 prisoners falling into the hands of the French, and 100 pieces of cannon. His Sicilian majesty evacuated Rome with the greatest precipitation, and was pursued with equal vigor by the French. On the 31st of December, an armistice, limited or illimited, was offered by General Mack, in a letter written from Capua, on pretext of the severity of the weather and badness of the roads. General Championnet returned for answer, “that, as his army had so far overcome the difficulties both of the way and the weather, he should not halt till he made his entrance into Naples.”

Soon after this interchange of messages, the strong post of Gaeta was taken, containing immense magazines and stores of every kind: another body of troops, under General Duhesme, which had forced its way with great resolution and success along the line of the Adriatic coast, through a country intersected with rivers, and guarded by troops which might have disputed every step, after gaining a complete victory on the banks of the Vomano, took possession of the important maritime fortress of Pescara.

Thus, in the course of a few weeks, that monarch, who proved a temporary victor, and offered to restore the popedom, was constrained, on the last day of the year, to abdicate all his continental dominions, and, with his family, seek refuge, as will be shown in another chapter.

The fate of the King of Sardinia was, however, more deplorable. In consequence of the disputes which had arisen between his majesty and the new Ligurian republic, about some territories, this monarch became an object of suspicion to the French government; as may be seen in the quotations which we have given from the manifesto which the directory issued. Though the conduct of his majesty appears to have been exempt from reproach, yet, apprehensive, no doubt, of being sent a prisoner into France, he agreed with General Joubert, on the 9th of December, to sign an act of abdication; and stipulating only for the exercise of the catholic religion for his subjects, the security of his own person, and the enjoyment of his liberty and property for the Prince de Carignan, the ill-fated monarch was pleased to renounce the exercise of his power and authority, to order the Piedmontese army to consider itself as a portion of the French troops, and “to surrender the citadel of Turin, as a pledge that no resistance whatever should be attempted against the present act, which has emanated purely from his own will.”

CHAPTER VIII.

Disastrous Expedition to Ostend.—Capture of Minorca.—Evacuation of Port-au-Prince, in St. Domingo.—Naval Exertions, and Observations.

THE offensive operations of Great Britain, in the course of this year, were chequered with a variety of good and bad fortune. In the month of May, an expedition was fitted out against maritime Flanders; not with the hope of being able to restore that country to the emperor, but to interrupt the internal navigation between Holland, Flanders, and France, by destroying the basin, gates, and sluices of the Bruges canal. An armament accordingly sailed for this purpose, from Margate Roads, May 18, under Captain Popham, with a body of troops commanded by Major-general Coote, both officers of distinguished merit. On its arrival before Ostend, the necessary preparations were made for a descent; and while the Wolverine, Asp, and Biter, returned the fire of the batteries, the Hecla and Tartarus bombs threw their shells with such rapidity and precision, that the town was set on fire in several places, and some little damage done to the shipping.

In the mean time, May 19, by five o'clock in the morning, a landing was effected to the north-west, notwithstanding the violence of the gale; and many of the troops had actually disembarked before an alarm was given. General Coote now burnt several boats, demolished the sluice-gates, and soon after ten effected a grand explosion, by which he hoped to have destroyed a grand national work, which had cost the states of Bruges an immense sum of money, and occupied the labor of five years to complete. Having performed this arduous task in the best manner possible, about noon, the commander-in-chief attempted to retreat; but the surf unfortunately ran so high, that it was impossible to re-embark. Hereupon it was deemed necessary to occupy a position on the sand-hills, at a little distance from the beach; and, as a feint, in order to gain time, a peremptory summons was sent to the governor of Ostend, to surrender that important place; but the answer was, "this would not be done till the garrison were buried under the ruins."

The English, to the number of 1200, were attacked early the next morning by a very superior force, moving in different columns. The English were completely hemmed in, and after a short but gallant contest, were completely overpowered; their front being broken, their flanks turned, and General Coote severely wounded. In this dilemma, the invaders were unhappily compelled to surrender. Captain Popham endeavoured, without effect, to obtain an exchange of prisoners; and it was at first the intention of the French government to oblige the captive troops to labor at the reparation of the works they had demolished; but the damage, though thought considerable, was in a few weeks perfectly repaired.

An expedition in another quarter, which was undertaken early in November, proved more fortunate. To wrest the island of Minorca from the Spaniards being considered an object of great importance, a small squadron was detached for that purpose, under Admiral Duckworth, and the command of the land forces conferred on the Hon. General Stuart, an active and enterprising officer. A division of 800 men having effected a landing in the bay of Addaya, the Spaniards, who had previously evacuated a small battery at the entrance, and spiked the guns, soon after abandoned and blew up the works at Fornelles. About 2000 of their troops then approached in different directions, and threatened to surround the English detachment; but they were repulsed with some loss on the left, while the guns of the Argo checked a similar attempt on the right flank; and sufficient time was thus obtained for the rest of the land-forces to disembark.

Notwithstanding the badness of the roads, and the disagreeable intelligence brought by deserters, that the force on the island exceeded 4000 men, General Stuart detached Colonel Graham to seize on the important post of Mercadel. On learning soon after, that the town of Mahon had been left almost destitute of troops, Colonel Paget, who had advanced with a body of 300 men, summoned Fort Charles, and made the lieutenant-governor of the island and some officers prisoners.

As the commander-in-chief received intelligence that the Spaniards were throwing up works and forming an entrenched camp in front of Cindadella, he determined to attack them there. He accordingly obtained the assistance of some seamen and marines from the squadron, and, advancing in two columns, forced the Spaniards to retire within the walls.

Propitious, however, as were these events, yet, had the place been defended with any degree of resolution, it certainly could not have been carried; the troops being deficient in heavy artillery, and every thing necessary for a siege. When the governor was summoned, he hesitated, apparently restricted by a mere point of honor, from delivering up the island immediately. He took the preliminary articles into consideration, and seemed to be in doubt whether the investing force was superior to that of the garrison. In the course of the following night, two batteries of three twelve-pounders, and three five and a half inch howitzers, were erected; and, though it was evident that such light metal was inadequate to the capture of the place, these hostile preparations had the desired effect; for only two eighteen-pound shot having been fired by the besieged, a capitulation was immediately entered into, and the English consequently became masters of Minorca.

About this time, however, the English were obliged to abandon the island of St. Domingo, in the West Indies, for the possession of which so much blood had been spilt—so much treasure expended! As it could no longer be retained without immense sacrifices, Brigadier-general Maitland agreed, on the 9th of May, with Toussaint L'Ouverture (then commander-in-chief of that colony, where he had been formerly a slave) to leave the island, and deliver up the parish of Arcahaye, and the towns of Port-au-Prince and St. Mark, on condition of guaranteeing the lives and properties of all the inhabitants who might choose to remain. This evacuation was chiefly occasioned by the increasing energy and numbers of the mulattoes and freed negroes, now rendered bold by a succession of engagements, and by the relaxed efforts of the royalists; who, perceiving that the surrender of this colony had been expressly stipulated in the late negotiations in Europe, became apparently indifferent about the form of government that was to afford them protection.

In another quarter, October 28, the island of Goza surrendered to a British squadron, and Malta was blockaded by a detachment of men of war under Captain Ball. Lieutenant Price gallantly defended St. Marcou against a French flotilla from La Hogue; and a Spanish armament, with a body of troops under the command of General O'Neil, governor of Yucatan, was also foiled in an attempt on the bay of Honduras.

During the campaign of this year, the exertions of the British navy were particularly successful, having captured or destroyed thirteen line-of-battle, and as many 40-gun ships and frigates. On the other hand, the English lost the Ambuscade, of thirty-two guns, after a severe action with the Boyonnaire, in the bay of Biscay: the Jason and La Pique ran aground near Brest, at the end of a contest of three hours with La Seine, of forty-two guns, which was captured, as was also the Leander of fifty, the flag of which was reluctantly struck to Le Généreux, of seventy-four, soon after the battle of the Nile, whence the latter had escaped; the commander of the former, however, was entitled to considerable praise, having, notwithstanding the superiority of his adversary, maintained a gallant contest for six hours, during which 100 of the crew of the French ship were killed, and 188 wounded.

Sir John Borlase Warren also assisted in securing the British isles, by his defeat of the armament destined to assist the Irish rebels, already alluded to in our third chapter. While cruising in the Canada, off Lough Swilly, he received intelligence of the approach of this hostile squadron, from the Amelia, Ethalion, Anson, and Sylph, stationed for the purpose of watching the motions of the enemy, and immediately endeavoured to fall in with it. Accordingly, he and the four sail of men of war under his command, viz. the Canada, Robert, Foudroyant, Magnanime, and Melampus, discovered about noon, on the 11th of October, the French squadron, consisting of the following ships:—

Ships' Names.	Guns.	Ships' Names.	Guns.
Le Hoche . . .	80	La Resolve . . .	40
L'Ambuscade . .	40	La Loire . . .	46
La Coquille . .	40	La Romaine . . .	40
La Bellone . . .	36	La Semillante . .	36

And La Biche, a schooner.

Hereupon Sir J. B. Warren threw out the signal for a general chase, and gave orders to form in succession, as each man of war reached her antagonist; but from the great distance, and a hollow sea, it was impossible to commence the action before the following morning, by which time it was discovered that the large ship had lost her main-top-mast.

The French squadron, instead of attempting to escape, bore down, and formed a line of battle in close order, upon the starboard tack. The Canada, therefore, threw out a signal for the Robust to lead, and the rest of the ships to form in succession in the rear of the van. An action of three hours and forty minutes ensued, when the three-decked vessel (which proved to be the Hoche) struck, and three other frigates, following her example, hauled down their colors also. Five frigates, a brig, and a schooner, escaped; but two of the former were afterwards captured. The whole squadron, though insignificant, was entirely new, and full of troops and stores. The happy effects of these captures are already before the reader in our third chapter.

Situation of the King of Naples.—The French march against his Capital, and obtain Possession of Capua by an obnoxious Armistice.—Comotions in Naples.—Bravery and Superstition of the Lazaroni.—Capture of Naples.—The French General's seductive Proclamations.—Naples declared a Republic.—Revolution at Lucca.

THE King of Naples, in consequence of the failure of his expedition into the Roman territory, was not only forced, by a sudden reverse of fortune, to abdicate his dominions on the continent, but also to make a precipitate retreat on board of a British flag-ship, commanded by the gallant admiral who fought the battle of the Nile. While his majesty, after appointing Prince Pignatelli

Notwithstanding this monarch had abandoned his subjects, a large portion of them were still hostile to the French, and not only attacked and cut off their convoys, but also seized upon their baggage, and massacred the stragglers. However, the republican troops still continued to advance in three columns, under the Generals Duhesme, Le Roy, and Macdonald.

Championnet, the commander-in-chief, was entirely ignorant of the state of the centre and left wing of his army under General Duhesme, who was equally so with the destiny of the right wing; he had forced his way through a country intersected by rivers and defended by the troops of the enemy. With all its successes the French army was attacked by an armed peasantry and people, and was in great distress, when a deputation of Neapolitan officers, authorized by the viceroy, waited upon General Championnet, proposing to deliver up Capua on being granted an armistice as the basis of a permanent treaty. The Neapolitan army was evidently discontented at being governed by a foreigner and forsaken by the royal family.

General Championnet, who had haughtily refused a similar proposal before, now cheerfully agreed to an armistice, which was accordingly concluded, on the 10th of January, between the republican general, the Prince of Milliano, and the Duke of Gesso, by which Capua was to be delivered to the French, with all its artillery and stores. The army of Championnet was to have the country from Acerra before Naples; Benevento, and along the Adriatic, was to form a line of demarkation; the ports of Naples were to be evacuated by the ships belonging to those at war with the republic; and the Neapolitans were to pay to France 10,000,000 of livres. Hostilities were not to commence till three days' notice should be given by either of the parties.

General Championnet, in a secret note to the directory, which went with the capitulation of Capua, declared that he was surrounded on all sides, destitute of provisions, ammunition, and articles of every kind; that the loss of a battle would have ruined his whole army, and a victory, even before Capua, would have availed him nothing. He looked on the possession of this place as of the utmost importance, since there was in it a supply for the army of all its wants, and it greatly hastened the conquest of Naples. An armistice, granted to a people so full of perfidy, was no more than a stratagem of war, and the one now concluded could be broken by the Neapolitans whenever they thought proper; and that he had no doubt of the conquest of Naples about the time when the news of the surrender of Capua could reach the directory, as he corresponded with the disaffected party, which was very numerous. The directory passed the severest censures on General Championnet for agreeing to any armistice till he had subdued the whole kingdom.

The king was truly dissatisfied with this armistice, as appears by his letter to General Pignatelli, commander-in-chief at Naples during the absence of his majesty:

Palermo, Jan. 15, 1799.

"At the time when, from the urgency of circumstances, and the good dispositions manifested by the people, to which in your former letters you have done justice, I expected a general rising in defence of the capital of my kingdom, I receive your's of the 12th instant, which informs me of the disgraceful treaty which has been concluded, in consequence of the most absurd instructions given by you to persons directed to negotiate with the enemy, and by which I see the greatest part of my realm, though unconquered, given up with a view of sparing the capital, when it is obvious that these concessions must lead to the irretrievable loss of my whole kingdom. I have been more surprised that you have acted in this unwarrantable manner, as you had no powers from me for such negotiations. The instructions which I left with you were of a tendency very different. In concluding such a treaty, you may either have forgotten you have a master, or remembered it only for the purpose of imposing the most scandalous and disgraceful terms on him.

"You may suppose how much I am incensed at finding the trust I had imposed in you betrayed in such a manner, and how indignant I feel against your unworthy advisers. F. R."

A proclamation was soon after published, formally disavowing the late armistice, and calling on all the inhabitants of the different provinces to rise in defence of their country, their families, their property, and their religion. They were told "that cowardice and treachery alone had rendered the invasion formidable;" and "that the bravery and attachment of the people to their sovereign must speedily render their enemies contemptible."

The imperial General Mack having been deserted by his soldiers, and looked upon by the royalists as a traitor, sent an officer before him to crave protection from General Championnet. So closely was he pursued, that he reached the French camp almost as soon as the officer, and was received with kindness and affability. He obtained a passport, and was escorted to Milan. This enraged the Lazzaroni, who collected their forces in a body, and poured their vengeance on the republicans at Ponte Rotto, defeating the advanced guard, and pushing forward to the line of the French army, where multitudes were put to death, and the rest took refuge in flight.

The Prince of Molliterno had the address to be chosen their general; but, when they learned that he wished to negotiate with the French, they not only deserted his standard, but aimed at his life. The Duke Della Torre, and his brother, Clement Filomavino, were first murdered, and then burnt to ashes, although inimical to monarchy. As the Lazzaroni had attacked the van-guard of the republican army, Championnet sent them a proclamation by the chief of the squadron; but the messenger was received by a volley of musketry; and, after attempting to explain, forced to return.

The insurgents, by this time, had chosen two leaders, Paggio and Michel; the former kept a chandler's shop, and the latter was a porter. Several avowed partisans of France, joined by a number of the chief inhabitants, for the sake of preserving their lives and fortunes, found means to seize on the castle of St. Elmo. The French general, hoping that the appearance of his army would reduce the Lazzaroni to submission, deferred the assault till the following day; but the fire they kept up convinced him they were to be subdued only by force. Those at St. Elmo acquainted the general in the night that they only waited his commands to open a dreadful fire upon the city. The two battalions on Capo di Monte had orders to march at night, and form a junction with the garrison of St. Elmo, and discharge upon the city the whole of their artillery. This was the signal for General Eble to commence firing upon it, and the whole army were to rush impetuously forward, and bear down all before it.

Although night overtook them, the firing continued, when the republicans formed into two divisions, and, exhausted with fatigue, one of them charged on the gallant enemy, while the other sought some repose amidst a dismal heap of carnage and ruins. At the dawn of day, January 23, the battle raged with fury, and it was doubtful who would be the conquerors. To end the conflict, General Championnet gave orders to force the passages to the Castello Novo and the Fort del Camine, at the point of the bayonet. A division was to seize on the palace, and another to form a junction with the garrison of St. Elmo, already in possession of part of the city.

At this critical period Championnet thought he might meet the superstitious ideas of those savage people, and therefore published an account of his regard for their great St. Januarius! This had the desired effect; his conversion flew like lightning through the city, and did more in his favor than his artillery. One of their chiefs delivered an oration to his soldiers, ordered them to stop their firing, and to lay down their arms. He was listened to with reverence, and obeyed with alacrity. The horrors of war were followed by acclamations of joy, and the French general's hand was kissed in token of submission.

Thus suddenly the Lazzaroni became the advocates of republicanism. They plundered the royal palace, which but a short time before they would have defended to the last; and General Championnet thought proper to hinder them from committing other extravagant excesses. He left the command of the place to General Dubesme, and encamped his army on the heights around the city of Naples. Having disarmed the inhabitants, the French general, in person, proclaimed to his troops, that henceforth they should be styled "The Army of Naples;" which decree was accompanied by the shouts of the multitude and the tremendous thunder of cannon.

The clergy, and many of the nobles, celebrated the entry of the French. Even the cardinal archbishop condescended to pay his court to the invaders, and actually practised fraud to reconcile the people to the new government. In consequence of long and earnest prayers, the phial, which contained a precious portion of the patron saint, so much respected by the inhabitants, exhibited undoubted marks of miraculous interposition, an event immediately communicated to the credulous multitude. After this, a day was appointed for a solemn Te Deum, when the citizens were to return thanks for the glorious entry of the French troops, who had come to regenerate the nation, and consolidate its happiness. At the same time the venerable prelate intimated, that St. Januarius had greeted their arrival in the kindest manner, "his blood having miraculously liquified on the very evening of that day on which the republican forces had taken up their abode in the capital."

With affected piety Championnet assisted on this occasion, and then addressed the following seductive proclamation to the deluded inhabitants:—

"You are at length free; your love is the only price which France desires to obtain from you for your liberty, and the only clause of a treaty of peace, which the army of the republic comes to ratify, by a solemn oath with you, within the walls of the capital, and on the subverted throne of your last monarch. Misery be to the wretch who shall refuse to sign with us this honorable compact, in which the fruit of victory is given to the vanquished, and which only leaves to the conqueror the glory of having consolidated your happiness: he shall be treated as a public enemy, against whom we remain in arms!

"If there be still among you hearts so ungrateful as to reject that liberty which we have gained for you at the expence of our blood; or any men so insane as to regret a king deprived of the right of commanding, in consequence of his violating the oath which he had sworn to defend them, let them fly for protection to standards which are disgraced by perjury! War shall be prosecuted against such to extermination. Republicans, the cause in which you have so generously suffered is ultimately victorious. What the brilliant victories of the army of Italy had not been able to accomplish, has been happily effected by the blindness of your last king.

"Let him blame, then, his own mad pride and his audacious aggressions, for the happiness of your fate, and the disgrace which he has experienced: but let him be justly punished for having attacked, against the faith of oaths, a nation in alliance with him, and for having attempted to deprive a neighboring people of their liberty; let him be punished by the loss of a crown which he has dishonored, and by the chagrin of having been the principal instrument of making you free: let no apprehension embitter the sentiment of an happiness so unexpected.

"The army which I command remains in the midst of you for your defence—it will lose its best men—it will shed its last drop of blood, before it will allow your last tyrant to entertain even the hope of renewing the proscriptions of your families, and of opening again the dungeons in which he has caused them so long to pine.

"Neapolitans, if the French army now assumes the title of the army of Naples, it is in consequence of the solemn engagement into which it has entered, to die for your cause, and to make no other use of its power than to maintain your independence, and to preserve your rights, which it has vindicated. Let the people, therefore, be assured of the full enjoyment of their religion, and cease to be alarmed with respect to the rights of property. The force of interest has assisted the tyrants in the exertions they have made to calumniate, in the eyes of the world, the integrity, generosity, and good faith of the French nation; but, to a nation so generous, a few days are sufficient to divest credulous men of the odious prejudices to which tyranny has recourse to incite them to deplorable excesses.

"The organization of plunder and assassination projected by your last king, and excited by his corrupt agents, as a mean of defence, has produced the most dreadful and horrible consequences; but in removing the cause of the evil, it will be easy to check its effects, and to repair even the fatal mischief which it has produced.

"Let the republican authorities, which are about to be established, restore order and tranquillity, on the basis of a paternal administration; let them dissipate the idle alarms of ignorance, and oppose the fury of fanaticism, with a zeal equal to that which has been employed by perfidy to increase them; and, in a short time, the severity of discipline, which re-establishes order with so much facility among the troops of a free people, will not fail to put a period to the crimes produced by hatred and revenge."

Immediately after this, Naples was proclaimed a commonwealth, under the designation of "The Parthenopean Republic," and the provisional government confided to twenty-one citizens, chosen by the French general. These were enjoined to draw up a plan for a new constitution, and while money was levied for the payment of the army, the estates of the clergy and the domains of the crown were declared to appertain to the conquerors.

Charles Laubert, a man accused of jacobinical principles, was placed at the head of the new administration; and none of the rest possessed the confidence of the nation, except Dominico Cirillo, a celebrated physician, and Flavio Pirelli, formerly a president of the royal chamber.

The national guard, indeed, boasted of the first grandeas, particularly the princes Della Torella and Rocca, both knights of St. Januarius, and the richest individuals in the kingdom. The Prince of Molliterno, before mentioned, was appointed commander-in-chief, and the Duke de Roccarmana offered to levy a regiment at his own expence.

An assembly, or kind of parliament, was soon after convoked, and care was taken to admit two representatives on the part of the Lazzaroni, who still continued to possess considerable sway in Naples, while their former leaders were gratified with offices and pensions.

In order to keep his word, Championnet restrained, as much as possible, the spoliations of the agents of the directory, and not only suspended them from the exercise of their functions, but obliged them to return home. Soon after, the French general and all his principal officers were cashiered by the directory; and General Serrurier, in consequence of having seized the little republic of Lucca, January 15, received the command of the army of Naples. All titles and exclusive privileges were abolished in Lucca; the sovereignty of the people was proclaimed, a directory established, and the sum of two millions of livres levied on the estates of the ex-nobles alone, which was immediately presented to General Serrurier.

Proceedings of General Bonaparte in Egypt.—A Theatre opened at Cairo.—Anniversary of the Republic.—Entertainments.—Policy of Bonaparte.—His Visit to the Pyramids.—Execution of Coraim.—A sudden Insurrection at Cairo.—Other Insurrections.—Policy of Mourad Bey.—Battle of Sediman.—El-Arisch seized by the Pacha of Syria.—Alexandria blockaded, and threatened with a Siege.

THE reduction of Egypt proved a more difficult task than Bonaparte at first supposed. The Mamelukes, though unacquainted with the modern system of war, were not so ignorant as he suspected. The number of his enemies was also about to be increased, in consequence of the declaration of war by the Ottoman Porte; but his greatest enemy proved to be the plague, called by the French physician an inflammatory fever, in order to conceal the malady; its contagious effects, however, soon led to a discovery of the real cause.

The first care of the general was to provide for the support of his troops, and the preservation of their health. The Egyptians, by nature a soft and timid race, were naturally struck, after the arrival of the French, with terror. They shut themselves up in their own houses, and concealed whatever they had fit for being used as food; so that for several days the French were forced to subsist on their own naval stores. But when the apprehensions of the natives were removed, the markets of Alexandria were supplied with all sorts of provisions in the greatest abundance. The Delta was fully sufficient to supply all necessities, which could be conveyed to the French magazines by the Nile, or by canals. The old canal that conveyed the waters of the Nile to Alexandria, with other canals, were cleared and repaired. Wind-mills were constructed for the grinding of corn, the only mills known to the natives being hand-mills, and here and there mills wrought by oxen. The want of wine was found capable of being supplied by a spirit extracted from dates.

The divan which had been appointed, (as mentioned in the sixth chapter) had it in charge, from the commander-in-chief, to inquire whether Egypt did not furnish a substitute for hops for the making of beer. At Alexandria and Grand Cairo, boards were instituted for inquiring into the best means for the prevention of contagious distempers, and in general for preserving the health of the seamen and soldiers: among the first fruits of which was the cleansing of these and other cities from many impurities, and a recommendation of the bath, with directions to the French soldiers for using it.

At Cairo, a theatre was established for the amusement of the French; and music was introduced on all occasions. Here also the anniversary of the republic was celebrated with uncommon splendor. On the setting of the sun, September 22, the feast was announced by three salutes of artillery. The commencement of the feast was proclaimed at sun-rising the next morning, by three discharges from the whole of the artillery; that of all the different divisions of the army; that of the park; and that of the marine, or flotilla, on the Nile. Immediately the generale was beaten through the whole city, and all the troops, in the highest order, appeared under arms, in the place of Elbecquier. In this place a circle had been traced of two hundred fathoms diameter, of which the circumference was formed by one hundred and five columns, decorated with three-colored flags, bearing the names of all the departments. These pillars were united by a double row of garlands, emblematical of the unity and indivisibility of all the parts of the French republic.

One of the entries into the circle was decorated by a triumphal arch, on which was portrayed the battle of the pyramids; the other by a portico, above which were placed several Arabic inscriptions. Of these there was one as follows: "There is no God but one God, and Mahomet is his prophet."

In the middle of the circle was raised an obelisk of granite, of the height of seventy feet. On one of its faces was engraven, in letters of gold, "To the French republic, ann. 7;" on that opposite to it, "To the expulsion of the Mamelukes, ann. 6." On the collateral sides, these two inscriptions were translated into Arabic. The pedestal of the obelisk was embellished with bas reliefs; on the adjoining ground, seven altars in the ancient style, intermixed with candlesticks, supported trophies of arms, surmounted with three-colored flags, and civic crowns. In the centre of each of these trophies, was a list of those men, of each division, who fell in the act of delivering Egypt from the yoke of the Mamelukes.

As soon as all the troops had assembled, and were drawn up on the place of Elbecquier, the commander-in-chief appeared, accompanied by his staff-officers, the generals of divisions, the commissary-general, the commissaries of war, and of civil administrations, artists and men of science, the kiaya, or Turkish officer, next in authority to the bashaw, the emir Hadji, and the members of the divan, both of Cairo and the provinces. When arrived, Bonaparte and his suite seated themselves on the platform that ran round the obelisk. Superb carpets covered the mount on which it stood. The music of the different demi-brigades struck up warlike marches, patriotic airs, and songs of victory.

The troops, after going through their exercises with great readiness and precision, came and arranged themselves around the obelisk; when a proclamation, by the commander-in-chief, for the discipline of the army, and the good government and well-being of Egypt, was read aloud, by the adjutant-general. It was listened to with the most profound silence, and followed by repeated cries of vive la republique. A hymn was performed at the orchestra, and the troops filed off, in perfect order, before the general-in-chief, who returned with his company to his quarters. The whole of this company, with several Turkish officers and Arabian chiefs, who had come up during the exhibition, were invited to dinner at the general's house, where a sumptuous table was provided, of one hundred and fifty covers. The French colors were united with the Turkish, the cap of liberty was placed by the side of the crescent, and the rights of man by the koran. The gaiety of the French was tempered with the gravity of the Turks. The mussulmen were left to their own choice of meats and drinks, and expressed great satisfaction with the attentions that were shewn them. After dinner, several toasts were drank. The commander-in-chief gave, for a toast, "To the three hundredth year of the French republic;" one of his aides-de-camps, "To the legislative bodies, and the executive directory;" Menge, president of the Egyptian institute, "To the perfection of the human understanding, and the advancement of knowledge;" General Berthier, "To the expulsion of the Mamelukes, and the prosperity of the people of Egypt." Other toasts were given, and each was received with unanimous plaudits, and suitable airs of music. Patriotic couplets, sung by the soldiery, concluded this civic feast.

At four o'clock, foot and horse-races began, and the prizes were adjudged to the victors, who were borne in triumph around the circus. At the close of the day, the whole of the circumference of this was illuminated in the most brilliant manner. The pillars, the intermediate garlands, and the triumphal arches, were hung with chrysal lamps, which produced the happiest effect. At eight o'clock, there was a beautiful display of fireworks, accompanied, at different intervals, by discharges of musquetry and artillery. A considerable number of Turkish ladies enjoyed the spectacle from the windows and tops of the houses that surrounded the place of Elbecquier. The intent of this entertainment was, to impress the minds of the Egyptians with a sense of the power, art, and magnificence of the French nation, and of their respect for mussulmen, and good-will towards all the Egyptians. Nor was it by professions alone that Bonaparte studied to gain the attachment and confidence of the people; for, in order to please them, and dispel their apprehensions of some unknown impending calamities, the annual ceremony of the opening of the Nile was this year accompanied by even greater pomp than usual. On this occasion the general distributed considerable sums, in alms, among the poor, and gave an entertainment to the notables of Cairo. In like manner he gave a considerable sum for defraying the expence of a magnificent feast, in honor of the birth-day of the prophet. Having, on that occasion, declared himself the protector of all religions, he received, from the mussulmen, the name of Ali Bonaparte.

The French general not only declared himself a disciple and friend to Mahomet, but, by means of his emissaries, as well as no obscure hints in messages and letters to different parties of mussulmen, insinuated that he was acquainted with their inward thoughts and designs, and endeavored to propagate a persuasion that he had been actually and expressly commissioned, by the prophet, to resist, repel, and overthrow the tyranny of the beys, to reform certain errors and abuses, and to promote justice, mercy, and piety, the great ends of the Mahometan and only religion.

The predominant passions of the people of Egypt were religious bigotry and superstition, and a jealousy and indignation against any degree of familiarity with their women; and the French general endeavored to win their favor by making his officers and soldiers attend the great festivals and ceremonies in honor of the prophet, and by forbidding plunder. He improved the condition of the women by giving them a certain portion of their husbands' goods at their decease; and he encouraged marriages between them and his soldiers, but prohibited polygamy.

Accompanied by his staff and the members of the national institute, with a powerful guard, and conducted by several muftis and imams, he proceeded to see the pyramids, where, after hastily surveying the five inferior ones, his attention was directed to that called "Cheops." After examining the different apartments, he seated himself in a flattened vault, on a chest of granite, eight feet long and four feet deep, amongst his attendants, and invited the muftis, imans, &c. to be also seated, when he saluted Sulaman, Ibrahim, and Muhamed, the chief muftis, and said—

“God is great, and his works are marvellous. Here is a great work accomplished by the hands of man. What end had he in view who constructed this pyramid?” One of the priests answered, “It is the work of a great King of Egypt, called Cheops, who wished that his ashes might not be disturbed by sacrilegious intrusions.”—“Cyrus the Great,” replied Bonaparte, “gave orders, that his inanimate body should be exposed to the open air, on purpose that it might be the more easily and completely dissolved, and be re-united to the natural elements. Don’t you think that he did much better? What think you?” One of the muftis, bowing his head, said, “Glory to God, to whom all glory is due.” Bonaparte added, “Honor to Allah; who was the caliph that gave orders for the opening of this pyramid, and disturbing the ashes of the dead?” The mufti and imans made answer, “According to some, Mahomet, the commander of the faithful, who reigned, many centuries ago, at Bagdad; but, according to others, Haroun al Reschid, who fancied that he should find treasures in it; but, when those whom he had sent had entered this apartment, they found nothing but mummies, with the following inscription on the wall, written in letters of gold: “The impious commit iniquity without fear, but not without remorse.” Bonaparte applied a proverb, well known to the persons with whom he now conversed—“The bread that is taken by violence fills the mouth of the robber with gravel.”

But notwithstanding all the French general’s precautions, and in the midst of his festivities, the capital became suddenly disaffected. The fate of the aged Coraim, whose arrest has been mentioned in the close of the sixth chapter, was productive of great animosity. This cheriff was convicted of treasonable correspondence with the Mamelukes, and, on the 6th of September, condemned and executed. His head, with a label of his crimes, was carried through the streets; an act of severity which was calculated indeed to inspire terror and create disgust. Murmurs of discontent were soon intermingled with the deliberations of the national assembly of musselmén. These murmurs did not escape the vigilance of the French commander, who had his spies in every place, and was informed of every thing that passed. He endeavoured to preserve peace and good order by measures of prevention. Out of the numbers of individuals who were followers, and employed in various services of the government and army; and all Europeans, of whatever nation, residing at Cairo, he formed, about the beginning of October, ten companies of national guards, not to be employed as regulars, but to occupy and maintain certain appointed posts in the city on any announced emergency.

It was not long before the insurrection apprehended burst forth. On the 21st of that month, immense crowds, armed with spears and sharp stones, assembled in and around the grand mosque, and every other mosque in Cairo. These were the fortresses in which they were to make their stand, and from which to make their attacks. A secret correspondence was established between the Mahometan priests and Mamelukes, some of whom were concealed in different houses, in the garb of women. General Dupuis, at the head of a regiment of dragoons, repaired to the grand mosque, to disperse the multitude that was every moment increasing. He was furiously attacked and mortally wounded. Not a few of his men were killed. The rest carried back the general to his quarters, where he died in a few hours after.

The alarm being given, the whole of the French were immediately under arms. The general gave orders for a battalion to march against the grand mosque, where the Turks were assembled to the number of 8 or 10,000. They were summoned, but decidedly refused to surrender. The citadel then fired on the city, particularly the grand mosque, into which there fell several bombs, exciting terror and despair. Other battalions were sent against the other mosques, in the avenues and approaches to which the Turks were attacked, and driven back to the mosques. The doors of these were forced by the French, who made a dreadful slaughter. But the mus-sulmen, though defeated, were not yet conquered. The place of the slain was supplied by new combatants, and the contest was prolonged. This was a terrible day, and scarcely was that which followed less bloody. Not a Turk who was armed with so much as a club or a stone escaped with life. The Turks, on their part, assassinated every individual, or small party of French whom they found in the streets. They burst open the houses of the French, and plundered them; and if any European domestics were found, they were put to the sword. Some traces of the insurrection remained till the 23d of October; towards the evening of which the city began to resume the appearance of tranquillity.

The loss of the insurgents was calculated by the French at 5 or 6000 men; that of the French themselves, in killed and wounded, was stated by them not to have exceeded 100; and this loss, it was also stated, was owing to a shower of heavy stones thrown on the French from the tops of houses.

In this affair the Greeks, at Cairo, took a decided and active part on the side of the French. Some of them took up arms in their cause while its issue was yet dubious; a greater number, after it was decided, were active in the discovery of fugitives. All the prisoners whom they brought to the different military stations in Cairo, and who were found guilty on evidence, we may presume not very scrupulous, were put to death. The disguised Mamelukes, conformably to a former decree, underwent the same fate. Several parties of the insurgents retaining their arms, endeavoured to escape death by a precipitate flight; but these unfortunate men were assailed by double terrors. While they were pursued by General Danourt, at the head of a body of cavalry, they were met in front by the Arabs of the desert, who are equally hostile to all strangers, Turks, Europeans, and Egyptians, and sometimes parties of their own nation; strangers not of their own tribe. The unhappy fugitives from Cairo, hemmed in between such enemies, and the avenging French, had no retreat. The fate of the whole was ruin, slavery, or death. Bonaparte, having inflicted severe punishment, published an amnesty to all peaceable people, and held the same language of conciliation, and affected confidence, as usual.

While the insurrection was brewing at Cairo, the French arms were employed in the suppression of plots of less moment, and in subduing open resistance in other places. Scarce a day passed without some skirmishing between the French and Arabs. At Sombat, capital of the district of Gambia, the inhabitants assassinated a detachment of French, consisting of one half of a demi-brigade, and a part of a regiment of dragoons. On the 13th of September, the place, by orders of the Generals Dugua and Verdier, was burned. About the same time there was an engagement at Mitcamar, between the Arabs and the troops under General Murat, in which the former were completely routed. On the night between the 15th and 16th of September, the French garrison of Damietta was attacked by a number of Arabs, joined by insurgents from several neighbouring provinces. The Generals Vial and Andreossi attacked them in their turn, at their head-quarters in the village of Schouarra, situated within cannon shot of Damietta. The Arabs, to the number, as stated by the French, of about 10,000, were ranged in one line, extending from the Nile to the lake Menzales. The number of the French did not exceed 500. Fifteen hundred of the Arabs were killed or drowned in the inundation of the river, and in the lake. The village Schouarra was taken, and committed to the flames. Columns of light troops scouring the country, between Damietta and Mansoura, punished the chiefs of the revolt.

General Desaix being informed that some barks, with articles for the Mamelukes, were at Reshuasch, marched to surprise them; and, after crossing eight canals, and the lake Baten, with the water up to their armpits, came up with the convoy at Banaseh, and made it a prize. Desaix rejoined his division at Abu-jairjeb, marched to Tarutelshereef, where he took his position at the Canal of Joseph, to insure a communication with Cairo. Arrived at Siut, he endeavored to overtake the Mamelukes at Beneady, whither they had retired with their women and baggage: but they having joined Mourad Bey, in Faium, Desaix returned to Siut, to re-descend to Tarutelshereef, where he embarked his troops on the Canal of Joseph. Arrived off Mansura, he met Mourad Bey, who kept up such a well-directed fire upon the French on their landing, that Desaix ordered them to return on board, intending to fall down to Minkia. The Mamelukes, having harassed the barks, some companies of grenadiers dispersed them: the debarkation being effected, the troops resumed the road to the desert, accompanied by the barks as far as Mantra; Mourad Bey was at four miles distance; while his rear-guard harassed the French, he gained the heights, and they saw his army open with all the magnificence of the east. They discovered his person, surrounded by all the beys and kiaschefs under his command. The French marched forward; and the cavalry they had to oppose turned and fled to Elalamon. In following the French left their barks; they were obliged to return for biscuit: Mourad thought they had fled; he attacked them, and actually carried away two prisoners from the points of the bayonets, while night delivered the French from his valor. On regaining the barks, the French loaded with biscuit, and, after taking some repose, recommenced their march.

Mourad Bey had got a stranger to arrive in his army, with news that the English had destroyed the French at Alexandria; that the people of Cairo had massacred those who were in that city; and that there remained in Egypt only the few soldiers whom they had put to flight the evening before, and whom they should presently destroy; a festival was given, and a sham battle, where the French were represented by Arabs, who were ordered to suffer themselves to be beaten. The feast concluded with the murder of the two prisoners who had been taken two days before.

General Desaix, on reaching Sediman, in Fay-cum, a province of Upper Egypt, resolved to attack when he had left the open and cultivated country. The Mamelukes passed the night in carousals. At day-break, October 7, they formed a hollow square, flanked by two lesser bodies: soon after the French saw Mourad with his Mamelukes, and 8 or 10,000 Arabs. A valley was between the two armies, which must be passed before the French could attack. As soon as Mourad saw them in the disadvantageous position, he surrounded them, charging them with a degree of fury. The closeness of the French rendered his numbers of no advantage to him; their musketry repulsed him for the time. The Mamelukes stopped, wheeled, as if to flee, and suddenly fell on one of the squadrons, which they levelled; all who were not killed fell down: this uncovered the Mamelukes to the centre of the French, who instantly gave a heavy fire: Mourad stopped and wheeled once more; those of the squadron not killed came into the ranks. The French were again attacked with the cries of rage; much valor was shewn on both sides; the barrels of the French muskets were hacked by the sabres of the Mamelukes; their horses fell back at the sight of the bayonets; their riders turned them, hoping to force their ranks by their kicks; the French pressed together without disorder; carnage was every where, but there was no battle; the Mamelukes were wild with fury; they threw their arms at the French, and the troops were assailed with firelocks, pistols, battle-axes, and showers of sabres. Those who were dismounted crept upon their bellies under the bayonets, endeavoring to cut the soldiers legs; but all was in vain; they were obliged to flee.

Mourad had committed great slaughter among the French; in falling back he did not flee, and the situation of the French was not improved; scarcely had he retreated, when he opened a battery, hitherto concealed, which at each discharge carried off six or eight soldiers. The French were lost in consternation; the number of the wounded increased every instant; to march was to abandon the fallen, and to abandon them was to give them up to certain death. Desaix remained motionless a moment: at length, the voice of necessity drowned that of the unfortunate wounded, and the army began its march. Mourad threatened his retreat: his only choice was now between victory and absolute destruction; the army, as one individual, determined to force the battery: the light artillery did prodigies; and, while they dismounted some of the guns of the Mamelukes, the grenadiers came up; the battery was abandoned; the cavalry, panic-struck, wheeled, fled, and left the French no enemy to oppose.

On the side of the united forces of the Mamelukes and Arabs three beys were killed, two wounded, and 400 of the flower of his troops killed on the spot. The loss of the French was by them stated to be thirty-six killed, and ninety-six wounded.

Here, as well as at the battle of the pyramids, the soldiers made a considerable booty. There was not a Mameluke on whom they did not find from three to five hundred louis. Mourad Bey retreated to the gorges of the mountains of Tajain-rast, to take care of his wounded, and recruit his army. Thus Desaix was left in possession of the best part of Upper Egypt.

In the mean time, Achmet el D'jezzar, Pacha of Syria, instigated by the Turks, seized on the fort of El-Arisch, and made preparations to invade Egypt: Alexandria was also blockaded by the English, and threatened, nearly at the same time, with a siege by the Ottoman fleet and army.

PARTLY by policy, and partly by force, the interior of Egypt was kept in a state of tranquillity for a short period. In order to sway this superstitious nation, Bonaparte endeavored to instil a belief of his immediate intercourse with the Divinity. "Is there a man so blind," said he, to the cheriffs and imans of the mosque, "as not to see that all my operations are conducted by destiny? Instruct the inhabitants that, ever since the world existed, it was written that, after having overcome the enemies of Islamism, and destroyed the cross, I should come from the furthest part of the west to fulfil the task which has been imposed upon me. Make them see that in the second book of the Koran, in more than twenty passages, that which has happened was foreseen, and that which shall take place has also been explained: let those, then, whom the fear of our arms alone prevents from pronouncing imprecations, now change their dispositions; for, in offering prayers to heaven against us, they solicit their own condemnation: let the true believers, then, present vows for our success. I could call to account each individual among you for the most secret sentiments of his heart; for I know every thing, even that which you never communicated to any person; and the day will come when all the world shall witness, that, as I act in consequence of orders from above, human efforts are of no avail against me."

In this impious manner the French general endeavored to awe the natives; but, though he had established himself in Egypt, he still remained in a state of continual alarm. He had strengthened his army by the wrecks of the navy, and by recruits of different nations in the East. Taxes were imposed and collected; horses, camels, and provisions for the army were supplied in abundance.

Early in December a detachment of 1500 men, with two pieces of cannon, under the command of General Bon, took possession of Suez. Thither Bonaparte went himself, on the 22d of December, accompanied by several officers, and men of science and learning, and escorted by a corps of cavalry. Having forded the Red-Sea at low water, he visited the fountains of Moses, about ten leagues and a half from Suez, in Asia. Five sources contribute to form these fountains, which send up to the top little monticules of sand. The water is very good, but somewhat brackish; there are vestiges of a small modern aqueduct, which conducted the water to cisterns on the borders of the sea, from whence it was taken to supply ships. These fountains are at the distance of three-quarters of a league from the sea.

In the evening Bonaparte returned to Suez, but the sea was high. His guide lost him in the marshes, from which he extricated himself with difficulty, being up to the middle in water.

Suez appears to have been the entrepôt of a very considerable commerce. Barges only can come into the port; but a point of sand, that runs out a league into the sea, and which is uncovered at low water, and near which frigates can lie at anchor, furnished every possible means for the erection of a battery, that might protect the shipping at anchor, and defend the coast. At Suez, the Arabs of Top came and solicited the friendship of the French. Here also Bonaparte received a deputation of the monks of Mount Sinai. The pious Cenobites brought him the humble offering of the fruits of their mountain, and presented to him the charter of toleration given, originally, and signed by Mahomet, requesting also the protection of the conquerors; and Mahomet's charter was countersigned by Bonaparte.

As the fort of El-Arisch had been seized by the Pacha of Syria, Bonaparte, suspecting an attack on the side of Syria, and another by sea, would take place, resolved to march into Syria, chastise D'jezzar, and destroy the preparations made for an expedition against Egypt, rather than wait and receive the combined attack apprehended on the coasts of that country. Having, by a proper disposition of his troops and other precautions, provided for the internal quiet of Egypt, the French general accordingly gave orders to Gen. Almeyrus to embark provisions and stores for the army of Syria, to be conveyed, by the lake of Menzales, to the port of Tinch, and from thence to be carried, by land, to the village of Cathich. The artillery, that had been employed in the siege of Alexandria, was put on board three frigates, which were to cruise off Jaffa, and to maintain a communication with the army. Camels and mules were provided with extraordinary expedition, at Cairo, for carrying the light artillery, ammunition, and provisions, of which the most bulky, as well as the most necessary article, was water. The army, amounting to about 12,000, was parted into four divisions; one under General Kleber, one under General Regnier, one under General Bon, and one under General Lasnes. The cavalry was commanded by General Murat, the artillery by General Dommartin, and the engineers by General Caffarelli. A junction was formed, on the 4th of February, 1799, between the divisions of Kleber and the advanced guard of Regnier, under the command of General Grange, at Cathich; from whence they proceeded to Larissa, otherwise called El-Arisch, a village pleasantly situated on the river Peneus, and the seat of a Greek archbishop, as well as of mosques for the votaries of the Mahometan religion. El-Arisch was carried, by General le Grand, with the bayonet. The barbarous Arnautes and Maugrabins, who defended it, took refuge in the fortress, but with such precipitation, that, in barricading the gates, they shut out 200 men, who were put to the sword, or made prisoners.

Scarcely was the blockade of El-Arisch begun, by Regnier's division, when a reinforcement of infantry and cavalry, escorting a convoy of provisions for the defenders of El-Arisch, appeared in sight of that village, and encamped on a rising ground, covered by a very deep ravine. At that moment General Kleber came up with the advanced guard of his division. General Regnier communicated to him the design he had formed, of turning the ravine, and surprising the camp of the Mamelukes in the night. Kleber entirely approved of this project. The attack was made, and succeeded. The camp was carried, and the corps of Mameluke cavalry cut in pieces, or taken. A number of horses, camels, stores, and provisions, and the whole of the convoy, fell into the hands of the French. Two boys were killed on the field of battle. The two other divisions of the army, with the artillery, formed their junction a few days after. Bonaparte himself, with his état-major, and a strong guard, who had set out from Cairo on the 10th, arrived at El-Arisch on the 17th of February. In his march across the desert he lost several men and a number of horses, through bad provisions and the want of water, as well as by the attacks of the Arabs, who never ceased to harass him.

The main army, thus assembled, took a position before El-Arisch, on the 18th of February. Bonaparte ordered one of the towers of the castle to be cannonaded, and, a breach being soon made, he summoned the place to surrender. The garrison was composed of Arnautes and Maugrabins, all rude barbarians, without leaders, uninformed in any of the principles of war acknowledged by civilized nations. Their answer was, that they were willing to come out of the fort, with their arms and baggage, as it was their wish to go to Acre. At length, on the 20th of February, the garrison surrendered, on condition of being permitted to retire to Bagdhad, by the desert. A number of the Maugrabins entered into the French service.

On the 24th of February, the head-quarters of the army marched to Kan-jouness, the first village of Palestine, as they got out of the desert, and from whence they discovered the cultivated plains of Ghazah.

The French army now succeeded in traversing eighty leagues of the most dry and barren part of the desert; for the inhabitants of El-Arisch, as well as those of Cathich, enjoy only a few spots of cultured ground, and a few palm-trees near their wells; all around being a dry and burning sand. The aspect of the plains of Ghazah was more pleasing and recreating to the sight, as they appeared bordered by mountains, which rendered the prospect similar to that of European countries, without having the tiresome monotony of Egyptian plains, and of those parching sands, which uniformly fill the air with an annoying insufferable dust.

Abdallah Bashaw, with 1000 cavalry, and 50,000 Naplousians, lay encamped in the heights of Korsum. After harassing the French army, attempting to take it in flank, and to entangle it in the mountains, he was beaten back, forced to raise his camp, during the night of the 24th, and fell back upon Ghazah; against which place the French proceeded to march on the 25th of February. The fortress of Ghazah, being evacuated by the enemy, was taken possession of by the French, without resistance. In Ghazah they found a very seasonable supply of provisions and military stores. The inhabitants having gone out to meet Bonaparte, the city was treated in a friendly manner.

On the 29th of February, the main army began to move towards Jaffa, (the ancient Joppa,) a sea-port on the coast of Palestine, between which and Damietta, along the sea-coast, the whole is desert and wild. Here pilgrims pay for permission to visit the Holy Land.

This city is surrounded by a wall, without a ditch, and defended by strong towers, provided with cannon. Trenches were opened, batteries were erected, and a practical breach was made in the wall. Notwithstanding two desperate sorties, and every exertion on the part of the garrison, about 4000 strong, the principal tower was taken, and the greater part of the brave garrison put to the sword; with a view, no doubt, of striking terror into other parts of Palestine, and wherever Bonaparte might direct his march. About 300 Egyptians, who escaped from the assault, were sent back into Egypt, and restored to their families. The French found, in the towers of Jaffa, ten pieces of cannon, and about twenty indifferent siege-pieces, either iron or brass.

Bonaparte, in making himself master of the towers of Jaffa, on March 6, lost above 1000 men. About fifteen small trading vessels were found in the harbour. The French general now formed a divan, composed of the principal Turks of the town. He also gave orders for taking every necessary measure for the defence of the place. Jaffa proved a situation of the highest importance to the army; it became the port and the entrepôt of every thing that was to come from Damietta and Alexandria. From Jaffa, Bonaparte wrote the following letter to D'jezzar Pacha, dated the 9th of March:

"Since my arrival in Egypt, I several times informed you that I had no design to make war against you, and that my only object was to expel the Mamelukes. You returned no answer to the overture which I made you. I announced, that I desired that you would drive Ibrahim Bey from the frontiers of Egypt; but, instead of that, you sent troops to Ghazah; you formed there large magazines, and gave out that you intended to march against Egypt. You, indeed, began to put this plan in execution; and you threw 2000 of your troops into the fortress of El-Arisch, which is only six miles from the frontiers of Egypt. I was obliged, then, to depart from Cairo, to direct, in person, the war which you seemed to invite. The districts of Ghazah, Ramley, and Jaffa, are already in my power. I have treated with generosity such of your troops as surrendered at discretion, but I have been severe towards those who violated the rights of war. In a few days, I shall march against Acre. But why should I go, to deprive an old man, with whom I am not acquainted, of the few remaining years of his life! What are a few miles more of territory, in comparison of those which I have already conquered! And, as God grants me victory, I will, like him, be clement and merciful, not only towards the people, but towards the great. You have no solid reason for being my enemy, since you were that of the Mamelukes. Your government is separated from that of Egypt by the districts of Ghazah, Ramley, and impassable marches. Become my friend, be the enemy of the Mamelukes and the English, and I will do you as much good as I have done you hurt; and I can still do you more. Send me a short answer, by some person invested with full powers, that I may know your views. He needs only to present himself to my advanced guard, with a white flag; and I have given orders, to my staff, to send you a pass of safety, which you will find here annexed. On the twenty-first of March, I shall march against Acre; I must, therefore, have an answer before that day."

To this letter, D'jezzar returned the following verbal answer:

"I have not written to you, because I am resolved to hold no communication with you. You may march against Acre when you please. I shall be prepared for you, and will bury myself in the ruins of the place, rather than let it fall into your hands."

The name of this pacha, El D'jezzar, which signifies the butcher, sufficiently declares the ferocity of his disposition. This hoary chief is said to have extorted from the people no less than 25,000 purses, (about a million and two hundred thousand pounds sterling,) and to have put to death some hundreds, besides mutilating a number of individuals. His residence at Acre was fortified without like a castle, while it resembled a den within; for near to the place of audience was a dungeon, into which the victims of rage or suspicion were immediately precipitated. Be it, however, recollected, that the government of the turban is always despotic. D'jezzar was not deficient in policy nor in courage.

The French army marched to Zetta, under the tower of which it passed the night. On the sixteenth, they encamped at Sabarieu, after extricating themselves from the narrow passes of mount Carmel, on the plains of Acre. A division of the army, under General Kleber, marched against Caiffa, which the enemy abandoned at their approach. On the seventeenth, late in the evening, they arrived at the mouth of the little river of Acre, which is at the distance of about fifteen hundred fathoms from the fortress. The night was employed in constructing a bridge, over which the whole army passed, at break of day, on the eighteenth.

The city of Acre (anciently called Accho by the Hebrews and Phœnicians, and afterwards Ptolemais by the Greeks) was, by the French, called St. Jean d'Acre, on account of its being the residence of the knights of Jerusalem, which they defended against the Saracens. It is the last and most southern city on the Phœnician coast. It was a considerable place, so early as the Israelitish judges, since we find that the tribe of Asher could not drive out its inhabitants. After being in the possession of the emperor Claudius, it fell into the hands of the Turks and Arabs, who kept it till the holy war, when it was retaken by the Christians, in the year 1104. The Turks took it a second time, under Saladin. It was wrested from them a second time, in 1191, by Guy, King of Jerusalem, Richard I. King of England, and Philip, King of France. It was then given to the knights of St. John, who held it about one hundred years, with great bravery. But a dispute, concerning the possession of it, among the Christians themselves, gave an opportunity to Sultan Melech Seraf, with an army of one hundred and fifty thousand men, to reduce it again under the Ottoman yoke, in the year 1291. The greater part of the inhabitants fled, for refuge, to the island of Cyprus. Acre was immediately entered and plundered by the Turks, who made a horrible slaughter of those who remained in the city, rased its fortifications to the ground, and destroyed all its noble edifices, as if they could never take sufficient revenge upon it for all the blood it had cost them, or sufficiently prevent such slaughters for the future. It was in this city that our Edward I. then a prince, received a wound with a poisoned arrow.

Acre, by its excellent situation, seems to enjoy all the advantages to be derived from sea and land, being encompassed, on the north and east side, by a spacious and fertile plain, on the west by the Mediterranean, and on the south by a large bay, extending itself from that city to mount Carmel. These advantages pointed it out as a fit entrepôt for commerce, to Faccardino (not improperly called the great), chief of the Druses, who, towards the end of the fifteenth century, threw off the Turkish yoke, fortified Acre with additional towers, and, also, that it might be inaccessible to the Turkish gallies, deposited large masses of stones in the deepest parts of the entrance into the harbour. Without the harbour, in the bay, there were roads where vessels lay at anchor, and to and from which the commerce with Acre was carried, in lighters, or boats. The Druses, like the Arabs, maintain an independence, almost total, on the Ottomans. These people, inhabiting the woody, as well as mountainous parts of Syria, Libanus (or Lebanon), and Antilibanus, &c. claim their descent from the crusaders that went to conquer the Saracens, and take Jerusalem. They profess themselves Christians, are enemies of the Turks, and have their particular princes, called emirs. Faccardino was the chief of the Druses, or emir. Their submission to the Porte is rather nominal than real. Tribute, very irregularly paid, is the only proof or symbol of subjection. The Marconites, a sect of Christians anciently distinguished by the appellation of Nestorians (a term well known in ecclesiastical history), live among, and, indeed, form a part of the Druses. The Marconite Christians have, in the present day, a college, even in the Vatican, in Rome, where there is a society for propagating and cherishing all sects of Christians acknowledging the Roman catholic religion. The Marconites, in external matters and ceremonies, are the same with the ancient Syrian church; in articles of belief, or speculation, the same with the Romish. In the times of Faccardino (who carried on a correspondence and commerce with India, as well as the Grecian islands and Italy), the most opulent and commercial, and, indeed, the most accomplished, noble-minded, and princely family in Europe, was the Medici, who gradually arose, through the usual gradations in democracy, to the sovereignty of Florence, and the dependent districts, under the names of the great dukes of Tuscany. Faccardino paid a visit to Cosmo de Medici, at Florence: he was received, at the court of Cosmo, with the most elegant hospitality, and returned to Syria, and St. John d'Acre, accompanied by all manner of artists from Italy.—Bridges, highways, palaces begun, (though, unfortunately, not finished), improvements in navigation and fortification, and agriculture and commerce, as well as some approaches towards literature and science, in Syria, were the effects of the visit, paid by Faccardino the great, to Cosmo de Medici. Soon after the death of Faccardino, Acre fell again under the dominion of the Turks.

On the eighteenth of March, the French army, having crossed the little river of Acre, encamped upon an insulated eminence, that was near to, and parallel with the sea. On the twentieth, the trenches were opened, at about one hundred and fifty fathoms from the fortress.

A project for a general attack on Bonaparte, by sea and land, had been concerted between the British and Turkish governments. A descent was to be made, by the bashaw D'jezzar, on the frontiers of Egypt, on the side of the desert of Syria. D'jezzar was to be supported by an army, which was to march across Asia Minor, from Damascus; and the combined operation of these armies, from Syria, was to be favored by a diversion, towards the mouth of the Nile, by Mourad Bey, who, though forced to retreat before the advances of the French, was yet in considerable strength, and would be joined by bodies of Arabs. It was to direct the execution of this plan, and to contribute towards its execution, by maritime co-operation, that Sir Sidney Smith had left Portsmouth in the preceding autumn, on board the Tigre, of eighty-four guns, and sailed for the Levant, where he endeavoured to hasten the preparations for this campaign in Egypt. Commodore Hood continued to block up the port of Alexandria, and the mouths of the Nile. He had experienced the impracticability of burning and destroying the fleet of transports, and French frigates, without a debarkation of troops considerable enough to attack Alexandria. Sir Sidney, informed of the first movements of Bonaparte, endeavoured to detain him, by making attempts on Alexandria, which he bombarded, without farther injury to the French than sinking two transports.

In the mean time, D'jezzar sent timely notice of the approach of Bonaparte, to Sir Sidney Smith, on whom the command of the British naval force in the Archipelago had devolved, after the departure of Commodore Trowbridge.

Sir Sidney, on the 7th of March, 1799, proceeded towards the coast of Syria, and, on the eleventh, arrived before Caiffa. On the fifteenth, he steered for St. John d'Acre, to concert measures with D'jezzar, having got the start of the enemy by two days, which he employed in making preparations for the defence of the place.

On the sixteenth, about eight in the evening, after a chase of three hours, the commodore, Sir Sidney, took, off the cape of Carmel, the whole French flotilla, under the command of Eydoun, chief of division, laden with heavy cannon, ammunition, platforms, and other articles, necessary for Bonaparte's army to undertake the siege. This artillery, consisting of forty-four pieces, was immediately mounted on the ramparts of Acre, against the lines and batteries of the enemy, as well as on gun-vessels. The latter were employed with the greatest success, against the enemy's fire. The nature of the ground, however, permitted the French to carry their trenches within half a musket-shot of the ditch of the place.

The French, on the thirtieth of March, having effected a breach in the wall, on the north-east part of the town, endeavoured to take it by assault, but were vigorously repulsed by the garrison, with considerable loss. The ditch was filled with dead bodies. The troops of D'jezzar afterwards made three successful sorties. The object of the last was to destroy a mine, which the enemy had constructed under the covered way, to the northward, in order to fill up the ditch, near the breach. The English undertook this enterprize; and while two thousand Turks took charge of the sortie, they jumped into the mine, and, finding that the works were not quite finished, tore down the supports, and destroyed the whole construction. After this, an uninterrupted fire was kept up, from the fortress of Acre; the artillery being served by English and Turkish artillerymen, who had set out for Acre, from Constantinople, on the fifth of March. These men were placed under the immediate command of Colonel Phelippeaux, the chief engineer in the place, to whose councils, plans, and unwearied exertions, the safety of Acre, and the important consequences that followed, were, by the most intelligent part of the Anglo-Turkish garrison, principally attributed. As the town of Acre stands on a rectangular point of land, in the form of a square, of which two sides are washed by the sea, the British ships, in the bay of Acre, were enabled to contribute the protection of their guns to the garrison, and to the working parties, detached from those ships, who were employed in throwing up two ravelines, or half-moons. These, taking the enemy's nearest approaches (advanced within stone's cast, in flank), considerably impeded his operations. The enemy having nearly made a lodgment on the crown of the glacis, and mined the tower forming the inward angle of the town-wall, which is composed of curtains and square towers, after the manner of the twelfth century, Bonaparte, who had transported the cannon he found at Jaffa, and effected a breach on the fourteenth day of the siege, attempted to storm, but was repulsed. Repeated assaults were equally unsuccessful.

It was judged to be the best mode of defence by the garrison, to make frequent sorties, in order to keep the enemy on the defensive, and to impede the progress of their covering works.

Agreeably to the plan of operation already mentioned, and in the execution of which D'jezzar was very active, a number of Mamelukes, who had followed Ibrahim into Syria, the janissaries of Damascus, troops from Aleppo, Maugrabins, and others, advanced with an intention of joining the Arabs and Naplousians (inhabiting the ancient Samaria), and attacking the French army at Acre, on one side, while the troops of D'jezzar, supported by the fire of the British ships, should attack them on the other. Neither a detachment of Kleber's division, under General Junot, which had taken post at Nazareth and Saffat, in order to watch and oppose the progress of the enemy, and cover the siege of Acre, nor the remainder of that division, under Kleber himself, sent for his support, were found adequate to that object. General Junot, surrounded and attacked by nearly three thousand cavalry, was forced to fall back upon Caffcana. Kleber had, on the eleventh of April, reached Sedjarra, within four miles of Cana, when four thousand Turkish and Arabian cavalry, supported by four or five hundred foot, coming down from the hills, surrounded the French, and were preparing to charge them. Kleber attacked the village of Sedjarra, and routed the Turkish cavalry, which fled across the Jordan. But by this time, or within a day or two after, the whole Syrian army, having passed the Jordan, in different divisions, at the bridge of Jacob, and at that of El-mecana, encamped on the plains of Fouli (the ancient Esdreton), where they formed a junction with the Samaritans, or Naplousians. The united army amounted from 15,000 to 18,000 men, and (as was computed by the French generals), together with the armed inhabitants of the country, by whom, as is usual in Asia, they had been joined in their march, and after their arrival in the plains of Fouli, to above 40,000. At the same time, Simon, the commandant of the party of French at Saffat, had been obliged to retire within the fort, where he was attacked by the enemy, who attempted to carry the place, by scaling it. They were repulsed, with great loss; but the French still held it in a state of blockade, with very little of either ammunition or provisions.

Bonaparte, informed of these circumstances by General Kleber, who, at the same time, intimated his intention of making an attempt to get behind, and surprise the enemy, immediately determined to attack at all points, and come to a decisive engagement with a multitude, by whom he might be attacked and harassed, at their pleasure. He gave orders to Murat, general of brigade, to leave the encampment before Acre, with a thousand infantry and a regiment of cavalry, by forced marches, to seize possession of Jacob's bridge, to fall on the besiegers of Saffat, in rear, and, having raised the siege of that place, to join General Kleber. This general, retarded by the difficulty of the roads, and the defiles through which he had to pass, could not reach the Syrian camp till about two hours after sun-rising. The enemy, warned of his approach, by their advanced parties, from the heights of mount Hermon, was quickly on horseback, and marched forward, as far as the village of Fouli, which they occupied with the Naplousian infantry, and two small pieces of cannon, carried on the backs of camels.

Bonaparte, leaving only two divisions to keep the trenches, and carry on the siege of Acre, with what remained of his cavalry, after detaching General Murat to Jacob's bridge, the division of Bon, and eight pieces of artillery, hastened to the relief of Kleber. Having marched from Acre, on the fifteenth of April, he reached and took post on the heights of Saffuria, in the evening of that day, and, on the next morning, at day-break, marched towards Fouli, along the Gorges of the Samaritan mountains. From the last eminence that he had to pass, he saw Esdrelon, or Fouli, and Mount Tabor; and, at the foot of this mountain, General Kleber in close action with the enemy. The general had drawn up his men, in number 2000, upon some ruins where he had deposited his baggage, and where he maintained a resistance to 20,000 cavalry, by whom he was nearly surrounded. Bonaparte formed his troops into three square bodies, of which one was cavalry, and made proper dispositions for turning the enemy, at a great distance, and cutting off their communication with their camp, as well as their retreat; and, with the assistance of General Murat, destroying or overthrowing them in the Jordan. The cavalry, with two field-pieces, were sent to take the enemy's camp; the infantry proceeded to turn their army. When it had advanced within the distance of half a league of Kleber, Bonaparte dispatched for his support General Rampon, with a demi-brigade, and General Vial with another, to cut off their retreat towards the mountains of Naplousia; while he himself ordered his foot-guides to lead him to the proper places for intercepting their retreat to their magazines at Jenina. The enemy then, for the first time, began to perceive that the approaching forces were Frenchmen. Their great mass of cavalry was thrown into disorder. The discharge of an eight-pounder announced the arrival of the French to Kleber, who, thus assisted, charged the Turkish cavalry with the bayonet, and attacked and carried the village of Fouli. The enemy, perceiving that they were cut off both from their magazines and camp, were struck with consternation. They threw themselves behind mount Tabor, and, having gained, during the night, the bridge of Gizelmecana, retreated towards Damascus in great disorder and with great loss.

In the mean time, General Murat had surprised the son of the general of Damascus at Jacob's bridge, had taken his camp, putting all who had not fled to the sword, raised the siege of Saffat, and pursued and harassed the enemy's retreat for several leagues. Murat, having left a party to guard the post of Jacob's bridge, and thrown provisions into the castle of Saffat, on the 17th of April took possession of the fort, situated on the lake of Tiberias, where he found a year's ammunition and provisions.

The column of cavalry sent to attack the Syrian camp, under the command of the adjutant-general Le Turcq, having completely surprised it, taken 500 camels, with tents, stores, and provisions, killed a great number of men, and made 250 prisoners, Bonaparte gave orders that all that was found in the villages of Noures, Jenina, and Fouli, should be destroyed by fire and sword. After reproaching his Naplousian prisoners for having taken up arms against him without provocation, he restrained his vengeance and promised them his protection, on the condition of their remaining quietly in future in their mountains. The loss of the enemy, according to their reports on their return to Damascus, exceeded 5000 men. They could scarcely conceive that, at the same juncture of time, they had been beaten on a line of nine leagues. With military combinations, on plans of any extent, those barbarians are unacquainted: they are to be considered, indeed, not as warriors but as hordes of robbers.

General Kleber, with his division posted in different stations, was left to guard the Jordan; Bonaparte, with the division under General Bon, and the cavalry under General Murat, returned to the camp at Acre.

New works were pushed with great vigor on both sides. Fresh assaults were made by the besiegers, and sorties by the besieged. The French, on the 28th of April, were encouraged by the arrival of three pieces of battering-artillery, 24-pounders, brought to Jaffa by the frigates under the Vice-admiral Pernée, and six pieces of eighteen, sent from Damietta; and, on the 7th of May the English, by the appearance in the bay of Acre of a fleet of corvettes and transports, under the command of Hassan Bey.

The approach of this additional strength was the signal to Bonaparte for a most vigorous and persevering assault, in hope to get possession of the town, before the reinforcement to the garrison could disembark. The gun-boats being within grape distance of the head of the attacking column, added to the Turkish musketry, did great execution: still, however, the enemy gained ground, made a lodgment on the second story of the north-east tower, the upper part being entirely battered down, and the ruins of the ditch forming the ascent by which they mounted. Day-light, on the morning of the 8th of May, discovered the French standard on the outer angle of the tower. The fire of the besieged was much slackened in comparison with that of the besiegers; and the flanking fire of the former from the ravelines was become of less effect, as the enemy had covered themselves in the lodgment beforementioned; and the approach to it by two traverses were now seen, composed of sand-bags and the bodies of the dead built in with them, their bayonets only being visible above them. Hassan Bey's troops were in the boats, but as yet only half way on the shore. This was a most critical point of the contest; and an effort was necessary to preserve the place for a short time, till their arrival. Sir Sidney, therefore, landed the boats at the Mole, and took the crews armed with pikes up to the breach. The enthusiastic gratitude of the Turks, men, women, and children, at the sight of such a reinforcement, at such a time, was not to be described. Many troops returned with the very opportune reinforcement to the breach, which was defended by a few brave Turks, whose most destructive missile weapons were heavy stones: these, striking the assailants on the head, overthrew the foremost down the slope and impeded the progress of the rest. A succession, however, ascended to the assault, the heap of ruins between the two parties serving as a breast-work for both. The muzzles of their muskets touched one another, and the spear-head of the standards were locked together.

D'jezzar, hearing that the English were on the breach, quitted his station, where, according to the ancient Turkish custom, he was sitting to reward such as should bring him the heads of the enemy, and distributing musket-cartridges with his own hand. The energetic old man, coming behind, forcibly pulled them down, saying, if any harm happened to his English friends, all was lost. This amicable contest, as to who should defend the breach, occasioned a rush of Turks to the spot, and thus time was gained for the arrival of the first body of Hassan's troops. It became necessary to combat the bashaw's repugnance to the admission of any troops, but his Albanians, into the garden of his seraglio, now a very important post, as occupying the terre-plein of the rampart. There were not above 200 of the original 1000 Albanians left alive. This was no time for debate: his objections were over-ruled. A regiment, called the Chifflick, was introduced, consisting of 1000 men, armed with bayonets, and disciplined after the European method, under Sultan Selim's own eye, and placed, by his orders, under Sir Sidney's immediate command.

The garrison, animated by the appearance of such a reinforcement, was now all on foot; and there being consequently enough to defend the breach, Sir Sidney proposed to the bashaw to get rid of the objects of his jealousy, by opening his gates to let them make a sally, and then to take the assailants in flank; a request with which he readily complied. Orders were given to the colonel, to get possession of the enemy's third parallel, or nearest trench. The gates were opened; the Turks rushed out, but were driven back to the town with loss. The sortie, however, had this good effect, that it obliged the enemy to expose themselves above their parapets; so that the flanking fire of the besieged brought down numbers of them, and drew their force from the breach: the small number, therefore, remaining in the lodgment, were killed or dispersed.

The group of generals and aids-de-camp which shells, from 68-pounders, had frequently dispersed, was now assembled on a mount, called Richard Cœur de Lion. Bonaparte was distinguished in the centre of a semi-circle; his gestilations indicated an intention to renew the attack, and his dispatching an aid-de-camp to the camp shewed that he waited only for a reinforcement. A little before sun-set a massive column appeared advancing to the breach with a solemn step. The bashaw's idea was, not to defend the breach this time, but rather to let a certain number of the enemy in, and then close with them, according to the Turkish mode of warfare. The French column thus mounted the breach unmolested, and descended from the rampart into the bashaw's garden, where, in a few minutes, the bravest and most advanced among them lay headless corpses; the sabre, with the addition of a dagger in the other hand, proving more than a match for the bayonet. The rest retreated precipitately; and the officer commanding the column, who, as afterwards appeared, was General Lasnes, while he was manfully encouraging his men to mount the breach, was severely wounded. General Rambaud was killed.

During this contest, immense multitudes of spectators, on the surrounding hills, waited only, according to the manner of Asia, to see how it would end, to join the victors.

Sir Sidney Smith, conceiving the ideas of the Syrians, as to the supposed irresistibility of the French, must be changed, since they had witnessed the checks which the besieging army daily met with in their operations before the town of Acre, wrote a circular letter to the princes and chiefs of the Christians of Mount Lebanon, recalling them to a sense of their duty, and engaging them to cut off the supplies from the French camp. He sent them, at the same time, a copy of Bonaparte's impious proclamation, in which he boasted of having overthrown all Christian establishments, accompanied with a suitable exhortation, calling upon them to choose between the friendship of a Christian knight and that of an unprincipled renegade. This letter had all the effect that he could desire. They immediately sent him two ambassadors, professing not only friendship but obedience; assuring him, that, in proof of the latter, they had sent out parties to arrest such of the mountaineers as should be found carrying wine and gunpowder to the French camp; and putting eighty prisoners of this description into his hands, and to be at his disposal. Bonaparte's career farther northward was thus effectually stopped by a warlike people, inhabiting an impenetrable country.

The Turkish Chifflick regiment made a fresh sally, the next night, the 9th of May, the lieutenant-colonel, Soliman Aga, being determined to retrieve the honor of the regiment, by the punctual execution of the orders he had received, to make himself master of the enemy's third parallel, which he did most effectually: but the impetuosity of a few carried them on to the second trench, where they lost some of their standards; though they spiked four guns before their retreat. Kleber's division, instead of mounting the breach, according to Bonaparte's intention, was thus obliged to waste its time and strength in recovering its trenches; in which, after a conflict of some hours, it succeeded.

A flag of truce was now sent into the town, by the hand of an Arabian dervise, with a letter to the bashaw, proposing a cessation of arms, for the purpose of burying the dead bodies, the stench from which had become intolerable, and threatened the existence of every one of the armies on both sides, many having died delirious within a few hours after being seized with the first symptoms of infection. While the answer was under consideration, a volley of shots and shells on a sudden announced an assault; which, however, the garrison was ready to receive, and the assailants only contributed to increase the number of the dead bodies in question, to the eternal disgrace of the French general, who thus disloyally sacrificed them. Sir Sidney saved the life of the Arabian dervise, who had come with the flag of truce, from the effects of the indignation of the Turks, and took him off with himself to the Tigre, from whence he sent him back to the general with a message, which made the army ashamed of having been exposed to such merited reproof. It must have been extremely painful to Sir Sidney, whose humanity was equal to his extraordinary intrepidity and bravery, and who had exerted himself, with success, to soften the fate of the French prisoners at Constantinople, to behold the multiplied horrors which were committed under his inspection, and these under the united flags of the Sublime Porte and of Great Britain. The French wounded and prisoners were massacred by the Turks, in cold blood. As they have a savage satisfaction themselves in slaughtering their enemies, and even their women and children, they place no faith in capitulations, and think the only way to be secure against any future attacks from their prisoners of war is to put them to death. They bound two and two of them together in one sack, having first cut off their heads, and threw them into the sea.

All hopes of success having vanished, the French had no alternative left but a retreat, which was put in execution on the night between the 20th and 21st of May, after a siege of sixty days. Their battering train of artillery, amounting to twenty-three pieces, fell into the hands of the English cruisers. Their howitzers, and the medium 12-pounders, originally conveyed by land with great difficulty, and successfully employed to make the first breach at Acre, were embarked in the country-vessels, at Jaffa, to be conveyed coastwise, together with the worst among the wounded, which embarrassed the march of the army. This operation was to be expected; Sir Sidney Smith, (the British commodore,) therefore, took care to be between Jaffa and Damietta, before the French army could get as far as the former place. The vessels being hurried to sea, without seamen to navigate them, and the wounded being in want of every necessary, even water and provisions, they steered straight to his majesty's ships, in full confidence of receiving the succours of humanity; in which they were not disappointed. He sent them on to Damietta, to receive such farther aid as their situation required, but which it was out of his power to give to so many. Their expressions of gratitude to the English sailors were mingled with execrations on the name of their general, who had, as they said, exposed them to peril, rather than fairly and honorably renew the intercourse with the English, which he had broken off by a false and malicious assertion, that the English commander, Sir Sidney, had intentionally exposed the prisoners he had formerly taken to the infection of the plague.

The French army had not long begun to retreat, when it was harassed in rear by the Arabs, (a party of whom came down to the boats, and treated the English flag with every token of union and respect,) while the van column, in its march along the beach, was severely annoyed by rowing gun-boats.

Ishmael Bashaw, Governor of Jerusalem, entered the town of Jaffa by land, at the same time that the English squadron brought their guns to bear upon it by sea, in case of resistance. The plunder and massacre of the helpless inhabitants, begun by the Naplousians, was stopped by the united efforts of Ishmael Bashaw and the English commodore. The English flag, re-hoisted on the consul's house, and under which the Bashaw of Jerusalem met Sir Sidney, served as an asylum for all religions, and for every description of the surviving inhabitants. Two thousand cavalry were dispatched to harass the French rear. But this, after all the losses it had suffered, and disadvantages under which it had labored, returned, at length, from an unfortunate and disastrous expedition, to Grand Cairo. In the course of his retreat, Bonaparte took signal vengeance on all the villages and towns in which assassinations had been committed on his troops, or where his convoys had been interrupted. Many of them he ordered to be reduced to ashes, carrying away all their camels, cattle, or whatever provisions they possessed, for the use of his army. He visited all the forts on the Egyptian side of the desert, (having previously demolished those on the side of Syria,) directed new works to be constructed, and garrisoned the most important with troops.

THE various seeds of discontent, jealousy, and resentment, that prevailed among different tribes and classes of men in Egypt, during the absence of the commander-in-chief and flower of the French army in Syria, threatened to break out into open insurrection and revolt. Soon, however, after his return, all things were reduced to their former state of tranquillity. But ideas of re-conquering Egypt, as Bonaparte had foreseen, were inspired into the councils of the divan, by the victory of Lord Nelson, and the consequences naturally resulting from that event; and, also, by what Bonaparte probably had not foreseen—the brave and successful defence of St. John d'Acre.

The following is an account of the loss sustained by the French upon this occasion, according to the statement of General Berthier:—

Died of the plague	700 men.
Killed in battle	500
Wounded	1800
Total	3000

Immediately upon his return to Cairo, Bonaparte directed his attention to the formation of different corps. He soon put the army in a state to march to new combats. He had destroyed one part of the general plan of attack, combined between the Porte and England, and he every moment expected that he would have to attack the other parts.

He was informed, by General Desaix, that the Mamelukes in Upper Egypt had divided their forces; that a part had proceeded to the passes of Sababier, with the intention of joining Ibrahim Bey, who had gone back to Ghazah; and that Mourad Bey descended, by the Fayoum, to gain the passes on the lakes of Natron. He was of opinion, that it was the intention of the latter to form a junction with a body of Arabs already assembled in that quarter; but that General Destaing would disperse them with the moveable column under his command.

General Le Grange, with a moveable column, left Cairo on the 10th of July, and arrived at Sababier, where he surprised the Mamelukes in their camp. They had scarcely time to escape, and abandoned all their baggage and seven hundred camels. Fifty of their horses were taken. The Mamelukes fled into the desert.

General Murat, with another moveable column, received orders to proceed to the lakes of Natron, disperse the Arabs collected there, second the operations of General Destaing, and cut off the retreat of Mourad Bey. General Murat arrived at the lakes of Natron, took a kiaschef and thirty Mamelukes, who were pursued, along with some Arabs, by General Destaing. Mourad Bey, when near the lakes of Natron, learned that the French were there, and made a retrograde movement. On the 13th of July he rested near the pyramids of Ghazah, on the side of the desert.

In the beginning of July, a Turkish army, under Mustapha Bashaw, supported by the Anglo-Russian and Turkish fleets, advanced against Aboukir, the bulwark of Alexandria and Egypt. The Turkish troops, under Mustapha, and those on board the united fleets, were computed from 30 to 40,000 men. On the 11th of July, Seid Mustapha Bashaw anchored, with all his forces, in the road of Aboukir. On the 16th they effected a landing, without opposition; and an attack was immediately made on the castle and redoubt. After a heavy cannonade, which was continued from ten in the morning till three in the afternoon, the redoubt ceased to fire, and offered to capitulate; but the Turks, heated by the battle, would listen to no proposals; they scaled the redoubt, and cut in pieces the whole garrison, amounting to 700 men. The French in the castle, 400 in number, fearing a similar fate, surrendered prisoners of war.

Bonaparte, informed by a letter from Alexandria, that this Turkish fleet, of 100 sail, had anchored at Aboukir, and indicated hostile intentions against Alexandria, having made the proper dispositions for the defence and peace of Upper Egypt and Cairo, and also for keeping up the communication between Cairo and Alexandria, moved with the main army from Rhamanie, and, on the 23d of July, took a position at Birket. The head-quarters were fixed at Alexandria. The miners were sent to Leda to dig wells; springs were discovered, and the wells formed and guarded. Three battalions of the garrison of Alexandria, under the command of General Destaing, were ordered to reconnoitre the enemy, take a position, and see wells cleared at midway between Alexandria and Aboukir. This attention to wells is as great a point in warfare, in hot countries, as the establishment of stores and magazines in other countries.

Bonaparte employed the morning of the 24th in viewing the fortifications of Alexandria, and in preparing every thing for attacking the enemy at Aboukir; where, according to the report of spies and reconnoitering parties, Mustapha Basha, commanding the Turkish army, landed with about 15,000 men, a great quantity of artillery, and a number of horses, and was engaged in erecting fortifications. In the afternoon, Bonaparte left Alexandria with the main army, advanced parties being sent to various posts, in different directions, and took a position between the wells of Alexandria and Aboukir. The army began to move forward toward Aboukir, at day-break, on the 25th of July. A brigadier-general, with two squadrons of infantry and 100 dromedaries, was ordered to take a position between Alexandria and the army, in order to oppose the Arabs and Mourad Bey, who were every moment expected to arrive, with the design of joining the Turkish army, and in order to preserve the communication with Alexandria. A division of the army, which had proceeded to Rosetta, was directed to take post, by day-break, at the extremity of the bar of Rosetta, at Aboukir, and near the entrance of the lake of Madie, in order to cannonade such of the vessels of the combined fleet as might be found on the lake, and to harass the enemy's left.

The first line of the Turks was posted about half a league in front of the fort of Aboukir. About 100 men occupied a mount of sand, defended on its right, towards the sea, by intrenchments, and supported by a village at the distance of about 300 toises, which was occupied by 1200 men and four pieces of cannon. The left was upon a detached sand-hill, to the left of the peninsula, and about 600 toises in front of the first line. This position was very badly fortified; but the Turkish army occupied it in order to cover the most plentiful wells of Aboukir. Some gun-boats were stationed so as to protect the space between this position and the second line; which was also occupied by 2000 men, provided with six pieces of cannon. Their second position was about 300 toises in the rear of the first village; their centre, at the redoubt which they had taken from the French; their right, behind an intrenchment extending from the redoubt to the sea, a space of about 100 toises; their left was posted between the redoubt and the sea, on some low sand-hills and the shore, commanded by the fire from the redoubts and the gun-boats. In this position there were about 700 men and twenty-two pieces of cannon. About 100 toises behind the redoubt lay the village and fort of Aboukir, occupied by nearly 1500 men.

The train of the bashaw, who had the chief command, consisted of eighty horsemen. The squadron came to anchor in the road, about a league and a half from the shore. After a march of two hours, the advanced guard of the French came in sight of the Turks. These being attacked by the French with the bayonet, retreated towards the village. Two squadrons of cavalry and a platoon of guides, on horseback, cut off their retreat, and killed or drove into the sea this body of 200 men, of which not one escaped. The same division of the French army then marched upon the village, which formed the centre of their second line, and turned it; while another corps attacked it in front. The whole second line, including the village, was carried. The French cavalry killed many with their sabres, and drove many into the sea. The rest made their escape to the redoubt, which formed the centre of the second position. This second position was very strong, the redoubt being flanked by a ditch of communication, which secured the peninsula on the right, as far as the sea. Another ditch of the like kind stretched along on the left, to a small distance from the redoubt. The remaining space was occupied by the enemy stationed on the sand-hills and in the batteries. In this position the enemy had from 8000 to 9000 men.

While the French troops halted to take breath, the general-in-chief ordered some pieces of artillery to be planted in the village, and along the shore, on the left. A fire was opened on the redoubt, and the right of the Turks. The French cavalry, on the right of their line, attacked the enemy's left, which it repeatedly charged with great impetuosity, cutting down, or driving into the sea, all who came in their way. But they could not penetrate beyond the redoubt without being put between its fire and that of the gun-boats. Hurried by their impetuosity into this terrible defile, they fell back at each charge, and the Turks made a stand with fresh forces on the dead bodies of their companions. A reinforcement was sent of infantry. The Turks at this instant made a sally. The heads of the hostile columns fought body to body. The Turks endeavored, by their superiority of bodily strength, to wrest the bayonets from the French; they slung their muskets behind them, and fought with their sabres and pistols; for every Turk carries a musket, two pistols in his girdle, and a sabre. A French regiment at length reached the intrenchment; but the fire from the redoubt, which every where flanked the intrenchments, obliged them to retire.

The Turks, notwithstanding the dreadful fire from the village, darted from their intrenchments to cut off the heads of the dead and wounded, that they might receive the rewards which the Turkish government bestows for the encouragement of this barbarous custom. Another corps of the French was sent to advance, for the support of their friends, on the Turks. They leaped on the parapet, and were soon within the redoubt. Another party of the French rushed forward upon the Turks at the charging step. General Murat, who commanded the advanced guard of the French, seized the moment when the redoubt was attacked, to order a corps of infantry to charge, and reverse all the Turkish positions, as far as the ditch of the fort of Aboukir. This movement was executed with so much impetuosity, and so opportunely, that, at the moment the redoubt was forced, this column had already reached its destination, and entirely cut off the retreat of the Turks to the fort of Aboukir. Confused and terrified, they now found every where only the bayonet and death. The cavalry cut them down with their sabres. They believed that they had now no resource left but to flee to the sea, into which 6 or 7000 precipitated themselves in total despair. Mustapha Bashaw was taken, with about 200 Turks: 2000 men lay on the field of battle. All the tents, the equipage, and twenty pieces of cannon, (two of which were English, having been presented by the court of London to the grand seignior,) fell into the hands of the French. The English gun-boats saved themselves by flight. It was computed that about 10,000 Turks were drowned. The fort of Aboukir ceased to fire: the garrison was struck with terror.

A flag of truce was soon followed by the surrender of the fort of Aboukir. Bonaparte, foreseeing the certainty of this, retired, even before it took place, to Alexandria.

At this place he issued a declaration, dated, Army of the East, general orders, July 27.

"The general-in-chief, wishing to give a mark of his approbation to the brigade of cavalry of General Murat, which covered itself with glory at the battle of Aboukir, orders the commandant of artillery to send to the brigade the two English pieces of cannon, which had been sent, by the court of London, as a present to Constantinople, and which were taken in that battle.

"On each cannon there shall be engraven the names of the three regiments composing that brigade, as well as the name of General Murat, and that of Adjutant-general Roire: there shall be written round the touch-hole, 'Battle of Aboukir.'"

Another declaration, dated, general orders, August 1st, Bonaparte, general-in-chief.

"The name of Aboukir was fatal to all Frenchmen. The 25th of July has rendered it glorious. The victory which the army has gained accelerates its return to Europe.

"We have conquered Mentz, and the limits of the Rhine, by invading a part of Germany. We have now re-conquered our establishments in India, and those of our allies, by a single operation. We have put into the hands of government the power to force England, notwithstanding its maritime triumphs, to a peace glorious for the republic.

"We have suffered much; we have had to fight enemies of every kind; we have them still to conquer; but, at length, the result will be worthy of you, and we shall merit the thanks of our country."

So close had been the blockade of Egypt by the British fleet, and so difficult, at this time, all communication with other countries, that the affairs of Europe were but imperfectly known to Bonaparte. Having received some intelligence of a new war, and being apparently disgusted with his present expedition, this brave general planned the desertion of his army, notwithstanding his repeated declarations—"I am with you!" Resolving to return secretly to France, he was accompanied by Berthier, (to whom alone he is said to have communicated his intentions anterior to the event,) and also by the Generals Lasnes, Murat, Andreossi, the Chief of Brigade Bessieres, a company of guides, several Mamelukes, and Mongé, Berthollet, and Arnauld, members of the Egyptian institute. All but the first officer went on board, in consequence of sealed instructions, which they were to open on the beach. Thus Bonaparte suddenly embarked, August 24, on board two armed vessels, prepared for that purpose; and, after wonderfully escaping from the vigilance of the English cruisers, landed first at Ajaccio, then at Frejus, and reached Paris on the 16th of October. The consequences of his unexpected return, and the wretched state of the French army in Egypt, shall be the subjects of other chapters.

DURING the transactions recorded in the preceding chapter, wherein mention has been made of a new war, hostilities had re-commenced in Germany and Italy. The two contracting powers, Great Britain and Russia, conscious of the advantages likely to be derived from the concurrence of Prussia, held out the most alluring offers to Frederick William III.; and the cabinet of Petersburg even tendered a succour of land-forces, amounting to 45,000 infantry and cavalry, together with a proportionate quantity of artillery, all the expences of which were to be defrayed by a subsidy from England. The young prince, however, refused his participation; preferring the certain advantages of a neutrality, to the precarious benefits arising from war.

The allied courts still persisted in their resolution to humble the ambition of France; and the Emperor of Germany, dissatisfied with the treaty of Campo Formio, and being now assured of powerful assistance, no longer concealed his hostile intentions. The acquisition of Piedmont, the conquest of Switzerland, and the recent revolution at Naples, were events in which he was nearly interested; and he had already exhibited dissatisfaction, by marching a column of troops into the mountainous regions occupied by the Grisons, and taking possession of their country. His imperial majesty also gave orders for assembling a powerful army between the Inn and the Lech, which was to be joined by a body of troops under the Prince of Condé; while his ministers, at the congress of Radstadt, were instructed to check the too-eager wishes of some of the co-estates for peace.

The congress of Radstadt had, from the beginning of this year, become a mere form and mockery of negotiation, serving only as a pretext for delay. The emperor Paul, in conformity to his recent engagements, had immediately put his troops in motion. Austria waited with impatience the arrival of the Russians, and the approach of that season in the year, when the operations concerted between the imperial courts, on the side of Italy and the Tyrole might commence; while France was solicitous to replace, by military conscriptions, the dreadful void which appeared in all the armies of the republic. The renewal of the war was, however, regarded with aversion by all classes of the nation. Every degree of confidence in the government was lost, the most gloomy apprehensions were entertained, and defeat and disaster were already anticipated.

General Jourdan, having been appointed to the command of the French forces destined to enter Germany, and who were to assume the appellation of the "Army of the Danube," as that river was expected to be the theatre of their exploits, began his march into Suabia at the end of February; but the French plenipotentiaries at Radstadt acquainted Count Metternich, who was at the head of the deputation of the empire, "that the march of the army ought to be considered as a precaution, rendered necessary by circumstances; and that the directory persisted in the intention of concluding peace with the empire, if the empire would declare itself against the march of the Russians." The deputation, as a majority of them wished for peace, came to an ultimatum, that the note in question should be sent to the diet, accompanied by a declaration, stating the urgent necessity of such an answer as would enable them to resume the negociation. The Austrian minister, in a note, dated March 4, signified, in explicit terms, how much this proceeding was disagreeable to his imperial majesty; and that all further declaration should have been suspended till the ulterior decision of the emperor and the empire, agreeably to the former ultimatum of the deputation.

A peace would assuredly have taken place, but for the interposition of the Emperor Paul. As

In the course of a few days, the same ministers notified to the plenipotentiary of his imperial majesty, "that in granting a free passage to the army of a power which has declared war against France, and in permitting it to traverse his dominions, the emperor reduces the republic to the necessity of regarding this act as a rupture of the ties which unite the two states; and that, in consequence, a concise and satisfactory explanation is demanded."

No direct answer was given by the court of Vienna; but a memorial, transmitted by Count Metternich to the college of princes, plainly indicated the approaching rupture. After complaining of the capture of Ehrenbreitstein, and the overthrow of the governments of Rome, Switzerland, and Piedmont, it was intimated, that the present situation of affairs "did not afford the least hope of such a prospect of peace as was compatible with the true interests of the Germanic body; and it was considered as imprudent to refuse the assistance of a powerful court, which had manifested a sincere regard for the interests of the empire."

In the mean time, the armies of the contending powers had taken the field. The Austrian forces, assembled between the Inn and the Lech, to the amount of 65,000 men, were confided to the Archduke Charles, whose gallantry has been recorded in the seventh chapter of our second book. The generals, Count Starray and Hotze, headed about 20,000 more in the Palatinate and the country of the Grisons; Bellegarde, with about 25,000, occupied the Tyrole; and an army of at least 60,000, prepared to enter Italy, and reconquer Lombardy.

The army of the Danube consisted of 40,000 men; and Jourdan, relying on the speedy arrival of succours, addressed a proclamation to his troops, in which he stated, that the Austrians had passed the line of demarkation. "The emperor," he observed, "deceiving the pacific disposition of the French government, has called into the bosom of Germany armed strangers, less known for their military success than their ravages in former wars; and while, scrupulous observers of the faith of the treaties, you remained in a firm, but peaceable attitude, this prince dared to concert hostile movements with his new allies, and avail himself, under favor of a perfidious silence, of the advantages resulting from your security."

Jourdan having made the necessary dispositions, crossed the Rhine, March 1, at Kehl and Basle. A secondary army, styled the army of observation, under General Bernadotte, advanced into the Palatinate. This general, having summoned Philipsburg, which was resolutely defended by the Rhinegrave of Salm, immediately formed the blockade of that fortress; while Mannheim readily obeyed the mandate of another body of troops, and opened its gates to the invaders, on the 2d of March.

By this time Jourdan had advanced through the valley of the Kintzig, entered Suabia, and hoped, with the assistance of Massena, who intended to penetrate by the side of the Tyrole, to enable France to anticipate the arrival of the Russians, and force the emperor again to sue for peace, under the walls of his own capital. Numerous and powerful armies, however, barred the passage to Vienna; and the gallant Archduke was prepared to meet an enemy, over whom he had triumphed but three years before, near the same place.

The Archduke published a proclamation at his head-quarters at Fribourg, in reply to the declaration issued by the French commander-in-chief. After paying many compliments to the valor of his own troops, he impeached the faith of the directory, and complained, that immediately after the conclusion of the most solemn treaties, "the peaceable people of Switzerland were subjugated, and violent means adopted by the French, to change the country into a slavish ally, for the purpose of establishing themselves on the flanks of Germany." He also intimated, that a design had been formed "to extend the limits of the Helvetic Republic as far as the Danube, and to make that river and the Lech its boundaries."

At the same time, his imperial majesty circulated a declaration, denouncing the powerful levies which had taken place in Switzerland, and the military conscription, for raising 200,000 men in France. It was also stated, that the house of Austria had been obliged to extend its preparations, and adopt measures of precaution, not only against the dangers to which the empire was exposed, but also for the safety of its hereditary dominions.

On the 13th of March, the directory thought proper to appeal to the two councils and the nation at large, by means of a message, containing a formal complaint of the violation of the treaty of Campo Formio. Having entered minutely into all its provisions, it was observed, that Austria had been anxious to defer and elude its stipulations, particularly by keeping garrisons in Ulm and Ingolstadt, and maintaining 100,000 men in Bavaria, which duchy was to have been evacuated, in conformity to an express agreement. It was added, that the French ambassador at Vienna had been at first received with coldness, and afterwards treated with insult. Instead of the reparation promised at Seltz, and the appearance of a minister-plenipotentiary at Paris, the imperialists had seized on, and kept possession of, the territories of the Grison league, with a view of attacking either Helvetia or the Cisalpine republic; while the Grand Duke of Tuscany not only displayed his enmity to France, during the contest with the King of the Two Sicilies, but had since armed his subjects, for the express purpose of aggression. This enumeration of grievances concluded with the assertion, that the troops of Russia were now quartered in the hereditary states, where they had been joyfully received by the emperor, who left his capital for the express purpose of testifying his satisfaction at their arrival.

The grand object of Jourdan was to prevent the junction of the Austrian and Russian armies on the Adige; and for this purpose his army was supported by the troops under General Massena, who had gained the heights of the lake of Constantine. But any communication between these generals on the eastern side of this lake was impracticable, as the imperialists remained masters of Feldkirch. The French commander made a furious attack on the Austrians in their entrenchments, under the gallant General Hotze, March 12, but was repulsed with considerable loss, and obliged to fall back on Villengen, or Dillengen, while hotly pursued by the Archduke.

As the approximation of the rival armies rendered an action inevitable, the Archduke Charles made his head-quarters at Umerdorf, near Ribnach, and determined to give battle immediately to the French, who had now reached Pullendorff and were posted in a line, with the right at Salmansweiller and Mandorf, their centre near Stockach, and the left at Ming.

The hostile armies were within sight of each other, being only separated by a narrow valley or rivulet. One of the adjutants of Jourdan presented himself before the camp of the Austrians, in order to inquire if the dispatches had arrived from Vienna, as the answer to the demands of the directory was to be contained in them? Being answered in the negative, the rupture of the armistice was instantly proclaimed. This was immediately followed by an attack on the vanguard of the Austrian army, which retreated to the main body. The Austrians next day, March 20, attacked the French with equal vigor and intrepidity. The battle of Pfullendorff continued until night, when Jourdan, taking advantage of the darkness, assumed another position near Engen.

On the 25th of March, the sanguinary battle of Stockach was fought in the plain of Leiblingen, in the midst of woods; and so great was the eagerness on both sides, that the two commanders-in-chief, after reconnoitering in person, instead of assuming, as usual, a central position in the rear, fought at the head of their respective troops. The French were at first successful, in consequence of a spirited attack on the right wing of their antagonists: Count de Nauendorff and Prince Schwartzberg were both forced to fall back, while General Van Damme succeeded in intercepting the communication with Pfullendorff. The left wing was afterwards assailed, and the Princes of Furstenberg and Aulbalm Bernberg, who commanded divisions, were killed: the little town of Leuzingen was also taken possession of; but that of Walwis and the batteries on the Nellenberg resisted all their efforts; while the Archduke, by detaching two battalions on the flank and rear of the assailants, obliged a half brigade to surrender. Night alone put an end to the horrid carnage, when 10,000 men were left dead or dying in the field.

On the subsequent morning, Jourdan continued his retreat towards Schaffhausen and Basle, which was rendered both precipitate and disorderly, as the Archduke had ordered the enemy to be attacked on all sides, in consequence of which some of the posts in the valley near Villengen were forced.

On Jourdan's return to Paris, he threw the whole blame of his miscarriage on the directory; and, it must be confessed, with some reason; for, though unsuccessful on former occasions, this general had to contend with an army far superior to his. One portion of the vanquished troops, notwithstanding they were closely pursued, found means to cross the Rhine at Lautemburg and another at Strasburg.

In the mean time, General Massena had taken the field at the head of the army of Helvetia, consisting of 45,000 men, for the purpose of driving the Russians from the mountainous regions inhabited by the Grisons. In his address to the inhabitants, he observed, "that the enemies of their independence having called in a foreign power to support tyranny, the friends of their liberty had deemed fit to invoke the assistance of the French republic." He accordingly marched against the imperialists, and established himself at Alstatten, in the Reinthal, threatening the entrance into the country of the Grisons. He at length approached Sargans, and summoned Auffenberg to evacuate the Grisons; the imperial general refused to comply, and Massena gave orders to make a vigorous but feigned attack on BOOK III.

Feldkirch, to conceal his operations and prevent Hotze from granting aid to General Auffenberg, at Coire. He also sent a division to turn Coire by the heights, and assault the bridges on the forks of the Rhine, five miles farther up the river than Coire. The centre of his army crossed the river, got possession of Baltzars, and cut off the communication between Feldkirch and the Grisons. The posts of Meyenfeld and Zollbruck were forced; the fort of Luciensteig was carried by assault, and the French having got possession of the castle of Holdenstein, General Auffenberg being in a situation which precluded any assistance, surrendered Coire, and his whole division became prisoners, to the amount of 7,000 men.

Though the French had in vain attacked Feldkirch with great loss, they made a similar attempt two days after, March 14, but with no better success. Having but one opportunity before the return of General Hotze, the French general attacked Feldkirch again in different points with a body of grenadiers; forming a junction with the troops of Oudinot. This was conducted by Massena in person, who was driven back with great loss. General Oudinot crossed the Rhine, occupying Rheineck, at the confluence of that river into the Lake of Constance, which made General Hotze resume his position at Feldkirch.

Having obliged the Austrians to evacuate the country of the Grisons, Massena had sent detachments, under Generals Lecourbe and Desolles, into the Tyrole, towards the sources of the Inn and the Adige, and thus secured a double entrance into Italy and Germany at the same time. The defeat, however, of the army of the Danube converted the contest from an offensive to a defensive warfare. General Jourdan had been superseded, and the chief command conferred upon General Massena.

The Archduke Charles now resolved to enter Helvetia, partly for the purpose of supporting General Hotze in the war he was carrying on in the mountainous regions adjoining the Tyrole, and partly to prevent any forces being detached into Italy to strengthen the French army there.

As soon as the season became fit for military operations, the Archduke dispatched Count Nauendorff against Schaffhausen: he likewise threatened the left of Massena's army under Colonel Ernou, who occupied the defiles of Kentzie, which obliged General Massena to retreat by Kehl, and fix his head-quarters at Basil. He was master of the Rheimthal and Rheineck, at the upper end of the lake of Constance, and kept possession of Schaffhausen till the posts on the left side should be fortified. Basil was strongly garrisoned. General Nauendorff invested Schaffhausen on the 13th of April: he entered the place sword in hand, when the French burnt the beautiful bridge across the Rhine, in order to secure their retreat. On the ensuing day, Major-general Piaezec having attacked Petershausen, obliged the enemy to abandon that place also; and in the course of a week the French were dislodged from the town of Eglisau, by a detachment under Prince Schwartzenberg.

General Massena attacked the Swiss of the small cantons on the lake at Schwitz, and forced them to lay down their arms; and at Altorf 4000 men were either dispersed or cut to pieces. General Soult followed this patriotic army to the valley of Urseren, to prevent their gaining the pass of St. Gothard. As the Valteline was left exposed, more was necessary to defend the left wing of the French army in Switzerland, than the re-establishment of its interior communications. General L'Orison made good his retreat into the Grisons, being forced to abandon part of his artillery, and Lecourbe crossed from the Lower Engadin to Bellinzona, to protect the pass of St. Gothard, by destroying the communication between the small cantons and the Swiss Italian baillages. Lecourbe took a position at Bellinzona, while the head-quarters of General Massena were at Zurich, performing a variety of manoeuvres with his left wing to delude the Archduke; but his royal highness, adhering to his original intention of gaining the Grisons before he attempted any thing on the Rhine, sent reinforcements to Feldkirch.

A new attack was planned between Hotze and Bellegarde, who had reached Lentz, in pursuing the republicans on their retreat from the Upper Engadin, where the Austrian commanders were joined by numbers of the Grisons in arms. The Swiss troops were eager to form the vanguard of the column to act against Luciensteig, now made remarkably strong by the French. This fort was situated in a narrow defile, formed by awful rocks, whose summits, to the eastward, embraced the steep heights inclosing the valley, half a league in length.

General Hotze, in conjunction with a numerous corps of armed Swiss and Grisons, succeeded in becoming master of Luciensteig, the key of the Grisons, which occasioned an immense waste of blood and treasure, May 14. The first of his four columns was ordered to make a feigned attack at the upper end of the defile; the second to secure the mountains above Mayenfeld, and to render easy the attack on the front, by a descent on the rear, as the signal for a serious attack. The third column was to free the Seeviser Alps on the north and north-east; and the last, with the artillery and cavalry, was to storm the passage on the east, by the Slapiner-Joch. The front column was headed by Hotze, in person; and the other three by General Jellachich; and, not till after twelve hours march with excessive fatigue, did the Austrians arrive at the rear of the republican intrenchments, the only place where they could form a junction. General Hotze forced the pass, and, having blown up the gate, in defiance of the republican army, he took the fort commanded by General Humbert, and eight pieces of cannon. The French 4th demi-brigade were taken prisoners, amounting to 3000 men.

The French column, in retreating from the Grisons, were closely pursued by the Generals Bellegarde and Hotze. Towards the end of May, the Archduke passed the Rhine at Schaffhausen, with a view to join the corps of General Hotze; which, notwithstanding the utmost efforts of the French commander, he successfully effected. General Bellegarde, in the mean time, seconded by divers of the hardy mountaineers of the lesser cantons, had taken possession of Glaris; and, appearing to menace Lucerne, the members of the Helvetic government withdrew from that city to Berne. General Massena was now obliged to concentrate his forces in his intrenched camp before Zurich. After much skilful manœuvring, and the attack of various posts with various success, the Archduke, on the 5th of June, bore down with his whole force upon the intrenchments, which the French defended with obstinate valor. The approach of night, at length, compelled the Austrians to retire. Orders were issued to re-commence the attack early the next morning; but Massena took advantage of the darkness to assume a new position on the heights of Mount Albis; and the Archduke took triumphant possession of the city of Zurich, June 6. General Massena left behind him thirty-five pieces of cannon, three howitzers, with a number of ammunition-waggons.

Previous to these latter events, Count Metternich had informed the French ministers, at Rastadt, that he had received a formal order from his imperial majesty, in his quality of chief of the empire, to take no further part in the negotiations for peace, since the circumstances and relations under which the congress had assembled were totally changed; and that he should immediately leave the place of congress. The deputation of the empire, however, refused to concur in this resolution, and contented themselves with referring the decision to the general diet. Divers members, nevertheless, of the deputation left Rastadt immediately on the departure of Count Metternich. The bark retained for the conveyance of the French ministers having been cut away by an Austrian patrolle, and complaint being made of this infraction of the law of nations to the grand chancellor of the empire, Baron D'Albini, answer was returned, that he would not be responsible for the events of war, nor promise any further security to the congress. The deputation, on this, gave notice to the ministers of France, that the course of negotiations should be suspended; and they, in their turn, protesting against the violations of public right, declared that they should retire, in three days, to Strassburgh, where they would wait for the renewal of the negociations, and receive whatever propositions of peace should be offered them.

In consequence of this notice, the Baron D'Albini, grand chancellor, wrote to Colonel Barbaczy, the commander of the cordon of the Austrian advanced posts, demanding escorts for the deputies of the empire, and safe conduct for the French plenipotentiaries. Colonel Barbaczy, on the 28th, addressed a very extraordinary note to the French ministers, informing them, "that, as it did not accord with military plans, to tolerate citizens of the French republic in countries occupied by the royal and imperial armies, they consequently should not take it ill that the circumstances of war forced him to signify to them to quit the territory of the army in the space of twenty-four hours." It is remarkable, that the plenipotentiaries would actually have quitted Rastadt on the preceding day, had not the deputies of the empire prevailed on them to wait the return of Baron D'Albini's messenger. The demand was for a safe conduct; and, when it was observed to the Hungarian officer who brought Barbaczy's letter, that it contained nothing relative to the object of the demand, he answered, that a doubt on that head would be injurious to the honor of an Austrian officer. At the same moment, 400 hussars, of the regiment of Szeckler, entered Rastadt, took possession of the posts and gates of the town, with an order to suffer no person to enter or go out. The French ministers hastened their departure, and, at eight in the evening, they were in their carriages. On coming to the gates, they were surprised to find a passage refused them; and it was not without an express permission from the military commandant of the place, that they were at length suffered to pass. It was then two hours after sun-set; and, when they had advanced about 500 paces from the gate, a troop of Szeckler's hussars, or of persons exactly resembling them, suddenly burst out from a wood that skirted the road, and surrounded the first carriage, in which was Jean Debry, with his wife and children. Thinking them to be some patrolle, he exhibited his passport from the window, and mentioned his name and quality. "You are the minister Jean Debry!" was the reply; and immediately he was dragged out of his carriage, and fell, covered with blood, from repeated strokes of the sabre. The hussars proceeded to plunder the carriage; and, returning to see if he was actually dispatched, raised up his arm, which falling again, as perfectly destitute of sensation, they exclaimed, "Oh, for him, he is dead enough!" In the second coach were the secretary and other domestics of the minister, who were suffered to pass, after the pillage of their property. In the third carriage was Bonnier alone. They asked if he was the minister Bonnier. On his answering in the affirmative, the hussar opened the door of the carriage, dragged him out, and he was instantly murdered with many mortal wounds. The secretary of the legation, Rosenstiel, who was in the fourth coach, seeing, by the light of a flambeau, what was passing, jumped out of the carriage, and fortunately made his escape. In the fifth coach was the minister Roberjot with his wife. They attempted to drag him out; but Madame Roberjot holding him fast clasped in her arms, they massacred him in this position; and, having thus executed their commission of pillage and slaughter, the hussars rode off. The carriages, immediately turning back to Rastadt, were freely re-admitted within the walls. The secretary Rosenstiel, having wandered about for some time, gained a narrow path, which led safely to Rastadt; and Jean Debry, with much difficulty, making his way to a neighboring wood, bound up his wounds in the best manner he was able, the coldness of the night contributing happily to stop the effusion of blood. He continued there till day-light, and then, venturing out, crept slowly and unobserved into the town.

The indignation and horror excited by this atrocious and unexampled act of barbarity, pervaded every mind susceptible of the feelings of humanity. The Prussian legation wrote immediately a letter to Colonel Barbaczy, expressed in terms which strongly marked their suspicions of that officer; and demanding an effectual escort and safeguard for what remained of the French legation. It appeared, indeed, incredible that this crime could have been committed without his knowledge. Had the ruffians who perpetrated these bloody deeds been prompted merely by the motives common to such wretches, would the ministers have been the only persons sacrificed by them? Would they have carried the effects and papers pillaged, as was openly affirmed to be the case, to the Austrian commandant at Rastadt? Would they, in a word, have practised that sort of discrimination which marks a premeditated design? It was imagined by many, that Barbaczy was but the instrument of this abominable crime; in proof of which it was alleged, that, when the directorial minister of Mentz complained to that officer of the insults offered by the Austrian troops during the last days of the congress, Barbaczy did not venture to give any answer himself, but sent the letter to the commandant of Freudenstadt, who, in his turn, waited the orders of a superior.

Jean Debry, and the other survivors of the legation, left Rastadt the following day, under an Austrian escort, accompanied by another, and much stronger, furnished by the Margrave of Baden. Colonel Barbaczy was subsequently arrested, by order of the Archduke Charles, with the professed view of undergoing a trial by court-martial; which, however, did not eventually take place. It was pretended (by those who wished to perplex what the vilest of mankind dared not to palliate) in express contradiction, not only to the oral evidence of the parties, but to the solemn judicial depositions taken at Carlsruhe, that the murderers were not Austrians, but French emigrants in disguise. How far the court of Vienna was implicated, directly or indirectly, in this black and mysterious business, cannot easily be ascertained. Against the Archduke, indeed, a prince of unblemished virtue, and of the highest honor, or even the emperor, personally, no suspicion could possibly attach; and supposing, contrary to all previous probability, any persons possessing the imperial confidence capable of so horrid a design, it still remains to point out what motives of sufficient magnitude, public or private, existed, to excite them to the commission of it. The circumstances, nevertheless, attending this catastrophe, were such as called for the most anxious investigation, in order to remove all possibility of imputation from the Austrian government, which ought to have been as free from suspicion as from guilt; but, most unfortunately, the coldness and apathy apparent in its whole conduct, on this occasion, was very ill calculated to efface the jealous and invidious surmises of those who yield a ready assent to all that is told of "the crimes of cabinets."

The French directory hesitated not, publicly and peremptorily, in a message to the two councils, to ascribe the murder of the plenipotentiaries to the command or contrivance of the court of Vienna. But a charge of this nature, from such a quarter, can carry with it very little weight. The councils, in return, resolved "that this act should be denounced, in the name of the French nation, to all good men, and to the governments of every country, as committed by the cabinet of Vienna, and executed by its troops, on the 9th of Floreal, 7th year, with their reliance on the courage of the French to avenge it; that a funeral fête should be celebrated in honor of the murdered deputies throughout the republic; and that the government, guilty of this assassination, should be consigned to the vengeance of nations, and the execrations of posterity." Such was the tragical termination of a congress, which, at its opening, seemed as if it were destined to restore peace and happiness to Europe.

This event, for a moment, averted the torrent of public indignation from the directory. The elections of the renewed third of the legislative body once more excited the passions of all parties; and the choice of new members, notwithstanding the threats and artifices of the directory, was by no means favorable to their wishes. Among the directors themselves, the lot of secession had fallen upon Rewbel, whose conduct in office had been such as to cover him with opprobrium; insomuch, that, when this public despoiler subsequently took his seat in the council of elders, the bench where he placed himself was instantly deserted by all the other members of the council. The person fixed upon as his successor was the famous Abbé Sieyès, then ambassador at the court of Berlin. This choice, made in avowed opposition to the utmost exertions of the directory, portended some great and important change in the political system. The power of the directory received, from the impression of public opinion, an alarming shock; for the sentiments of Sieyès were well known to be in the highest degree inimical, not merely to the conduct and to the persons of his colleagues, but to the whole plan of the directorial constitution.

THE campaign in Germany appeared to be closed, by the retreat of Jourdan, before that in Italy had been well opened; and the army of the Danube became a sacrifice to the incapacity and corruption of the directory. So impolitic was their conduct, and so rapacious were their agents, that the commonwealths, recently established by France, actually meditated their infranchisement. Their dependence on the French republic was rendered too conspicuous not to be mortifying, and the sudden and arbitrary changes, imposed upon them by force, and without even the appearance of necessity, rendered their situation equally precarious and disgraceful. Several commotions accordingly took place, and many plans were conceived, with a view of meliorating their condition. A secret league was formed for guaranteeing the independence of Italy, into which many of the ablest inhabitants of Genoa, Milan, Turin, and even of Rome and Naples, readily entered.

Scherer, minister at war, but who was finally dismissed from his post, was, to the grief and astonishment of thousands, appointed commander-in-chief of the army of Lombardy, in the place of Championnet. General Scherer was not deficient in courage, as he had already distinguished himself in the armies of the North and the Pyrenees; but, as he was accused of the most bare-faced dilapidations during his late administration, and exhibited the most scandalous profusion amidst the general misery, the choice of this officer was exceedingly unpopular, and particularly among the Cisalpines, as he was supposed to be the author of all the rigorous measures lately adopted against their state.

While the exactions of Rivaud in anterior Italy, and of Faypoul at Naples, tended to cast an odium on the French republic, the new commander-in-chief crossed the Alps, and began his operations by demanding an extraordinary contribution of 600,000 livres from the provisional government established at Piedmont. By this exaction, the Italians learned what they had to expect; and, although many of them persevered in their wish for a complete infranchisement from foreign bondage, others rejoiced at the present critical state of affairs, because it seemed to presage the return of the Austrians, whose yoke was far more agreeable to them than that of their present masters.

The invasion of Tuscany was General Scherer's first military operation, having seized on Florence, March 25. The grand duke, instead of making any resistance, published a declaration, requesting, as a proof of "the attachment and affection of his faithful subjects, that they would respect the French army." At the same time, General Miollis became possessed of the port of Leghorn; and all the property belonging to the subjects of Great Britain, Portugal, Austria, Russia, the Ottoman Porte, and the states of Barbary, was subjected to sequestration. The victors, however, thought proper to furnish his royal highness and his family with a guard of honor, and to permit them to pass through the quarters of the French, unmolested, on their journey to Vienna. The aged pontiff, Pius VI., was, indeed, treated with extraordinary rigor. Having been permitted to retire to the Tuscan territories, he was now arrested by order of Scherer, and, with about forty attendants, conveyed to the fortress of Brancón, whence he was removed to Valence, where he soon after died, August 29.

Although the invasion of Tuscany enabled the French, by means of requisitions, to maintain and pay the soldiery; still it contributed to enfeeble the army, in consequence of the number of troops required to garrison the respective towns. The number of the Austrians, too, had by this time increased; and as those in the Tyrole, under General Bellegarde, were no longer needed since the defeat of Jourdan by the Archduke Charles, a numerous army was marching towards Italy to oppose the French.

The commander-in-chief, Scherer, having collected his troops, and established his head-quarters at Mantua, held a council of war, when it was determined to attack the enemy, before they received any new reinforcements from Suabia, and had effected a junction with the Russians.

The command of the Austrian army had been entrusted to General Melas, an aged officer, who now occupied Verona and the neighbourhood of that city, with a body of 20,000 men; from 8 to 10,000 were posted at Porto-Legnano; the heights of Pastringo, Cyse, and Calmasino, were carefully fortified; and while the right wing extended to the lake of Garda, the left was posted on the Adige, over which were thrown two bridges of boats; with the double view of preserving a communication, and facilitating a retreat.

Between lake Garda and the Adige, the whole Austrian line was attacked on the 26th of March, by six divisions, three of which endeavored to force the posts on the lake, that they might take Verona in the rear; a plan which was concerted by General Moreau, who headed those divisions, and completely succeeded in as far as the plan related to himself. The redoubts and intrenchments were carried; the French made themselves masters of Rivoli, and having passed the Adige, they cut the lines of the Austrian troops, part of which retreated a long way into the valley. The remaining divisions, commanded by Scherer in person, attacked the outposts of Verona with great fury; but with such intrepidity did the Austrians receive them, that the fort of St. Maximin was taken and re-taken no less than seven times. General Kaim, who was wounded, observed in his report, "that there was no former example of so deadly a fire of musket-shot having been maintained without interruption during the space of eighteen hours." The battle continued from sun-rising until night. The Generals Victor and Grenier, after repeated attacks, obtained possession of St. Lucia, whence they were twice driven out by General Hohenzollern.

The French having been finally repulsed, Moreau proposed to evacuate the territories of Tuscany, Rome, and Naples, for a time; but the commander-in-chief resolved to re-pass the Adige, and retreat to Peschiera: which retrograde movement was strongly condemned by the former.

By this time General Kray had arrived with a large body of troops, intending to drive the French behind the Mincio, in order to be able afterwards to besiege Peschiera and Mantua. The action, called the second battle of Verona, accordingly commenced, March 30, by an attack on the right wing of the French, while a large body of the imperialists advanced against the left, where Moreau was posted, with the divisions of Hatry, Montrichard, and Serrurier.

Having thrown bridges over the Adige, Gen. Scherer renewed his attack on the Austrian line, but was again defeated with great slaughter; and the bridges being demolished by a detachment which took the French in the rear, the retreat of many thousands was cut off, or they were dispersed among the mountains in the vicinity. The loss sustained by the French upon this occasion was estimated at 7000 men.

Thus vanquished in all his endeavours, Scherer drew off his forces on the first of April, from the lake of Garda, after placing a strong garrison in Peschiera, and collected his army below Villa Franca, in the neighbourhood of Magnan, the right division being encamped before Porto Legnano. In the mean time, the Austrian army crossed the Adige, occupied Castel Nuovo, and pressed on the left of the French army, after masking Peschiera. General Scherer determined to hazard a third general engagement on the 5th of April, that the Austrians might thus be prevented from turning his left flank; for which conflict General Kray was well prepared, and resolved not to let pass the favorable opportunity of engaging a retreating enemy. The battle was long and desperate, as every point of the line on which the combatants met was obstinately disputed. Moreau forced his way through the enemy's centre, and fought under the walls of Verona. The left column of the Austrian army, having turned the right of the French, threw them into confusion, and in the issue decided the victory. Scherer next day retreated towards Roverbello, and passed the Mincio at Goito.

The fate of Italy still hung in suspense, when, on the 18th of April, Marshal Suwarrow reached the heart of Lombardy, much earlier than the most sanguine expectations could have ventured to presage. Having been dispatched by the emperor Paul, he took upon him the direction of the Austro-Russian army, estimated at 100,000 men.

Field-marshal Suwarrow, who had risen from the ranks, through all the intermediate gradations, to that of general-in-chief, brought with him a reputation established by more than fifty campaigns. He first distinguished himself as a partisan, at the head of a body of light troops, during the seven years war; and afterwards acquired considerable fame by his exploits against the Poles, the Tartars, and the Turks. His greatest fame, however, was the victory he obtained at Ryminik, which, in addition to the title of Count, conferred by two emperors, had obtained for him the surname of Ryminiski; while his sanguinary feats at Ismailow and Praga, although demonstrative of consummate bravery, excited the dread more than the applause of mankind.

As he lived among his troops, like an Arab chief with his tribe, he won their affections by participating in all their hardships. Finding that the Greek cross was capable of inspiring its followers with fanaticism, he seized every opportunity to arouse the valor of his soldiers, by recurring to the popular superstitions of his country; and, though unacquainted with war as a science, he was passionately fond of all its stratagems and dangers.

No time could have been more favorable for the new commander than the present, as the French, having been successively defeated by the generals Melas and Kray, were obliged to take refuge under the cannon of Mantua, and had become so weak in point of numbers, that nothing but a sudden retreat could save them from captivity. At this critical period, Scherer, overwhelmed with shame, after having ruined the army of Germany by dilapidations as a minister, and the army of Italy by his ignorance as a general, resigned the command, and obtained an escort to shelter him from the indignation of the people. Moreau was immediately appointed his successor; but his forces did not exceed 35,000 men. A retreat having become absolutely necessary, Isola Della Scala, and Villa Franca, were abandoned in succession; the Mincio was crossed, and the strong fortresses of Peschiera and Mantua being abandoned to their fate, the generals Kray and Klanau formed the blockade of both with a body of 25,000 men.

Suwarrow having taken the field, in order to pursue the French, his commencement was exceedingly auspicious; for, two days after his arrival, April 20, the town and citadel of Brescia, with a garrison of 1000 men, capitulated to a detachment commanded by Field-marshal Lieutenant Otto.

The Russian field-marshal immediately took measures for pushing forwards. Having crossed the Oglio, and advanced to the Adda in three columns, the French were found strongly posted on the other side, as they had fortified Cassano, and made all the necessary preparations for an obstinate resistance. During the night of the 27th, General Vukassowich found means to cross the river Adda on a flying bridge, after which he immediately took post on the right bank near Brivio. In the course of the succeeding morning, an Austrian column, under General Otto, passed over near the castle of Trezzo, and falling in with Grenier's division, which was advancing against Vukassowich, at length forced it to give way. After this, the village of Pezzo, or Pozzo, was carried sword in hand. General Melas also marched with artillery against Cassano, and obtained possession of the bridge, while a division of French at Bertero was beaten, after an obstinate engagement, and forced to capitulate.

The battle of Cassano, during which Moreau had several of his aides-de-camp killed by his side, decided the fate of the Cisalpine republic. The directory having learned the fate of the action, immediately left Milan; the two councils followed on the succeeding morning, April 28, and in the course of the same forenoon, a body of the allies entered and took possession of the city.

On the 26th of May, Peschiera surrendered to General Count St. Julien, after a short siege; Mantua was closely pressed; the capital of Piedmont was at the same time threatened by a column of the allies, and Moreau was obliged to abandon his strong position between the Po and the Tonaro.

When Suwarrow became master of Milan, he determined to embrace a variety of objects by a loose and injudicious partition of his army. Accustomed to fight against the Poles and the Turks, he supposed that one victory produced the entire discomfiture of the enemy, and that nothing remained but to reap the immediate fruits of his success. His intentions therefore were—First, To prosecute his operations against Moreau, that he might oblige the French commander to hasten his retreat, and evacuate Piedmont and Genoa before he could procure reinforcements.—Secondly, To penetrate above the lakes, which would enable the Archduke more easily to pass with his left wing beyond St. Gothard.—Thirdly, BOOK III. Behind him, on the south-east, General Kray laid siege to Mantua with 25,000 men, while Ferrara and Bologna were blockaded by Klenau; the defence of these places was favorable to the retreat of the troops commanded by General Macdonald.

CHAP. XIV.

—Fourthly, He sent General Ott to assist Klenau to check General Macdonald in gaining the passes of the Appenines on Upper Tuscany, and cut off all intercourse with that country and the Ligurian republic on its north-west. He also sent a vanguard to reduce Novarra, and such places as the republicans had abandoned, and to march up the Po as far as Turin, and thus call the attention of General Moreau to his rear, by flanking his left wing. General Hohenzollern proceeded towards Placentia, with a part of the combined army, and drove back the republican vanguard beyond Voghera. To gain the passes into Genoa, by way of the Appenines, Suwarrow took a station at Bobbio, on the road from Placentia to Genoa.

When General Kray was master of Peschiera, he went on to Burgoforte, and assembled the whole of his troops around Mantua, the garrison of which made frequent sorties. General Latterman opened the siege of Milan, May 5, the trenches before Pizzighitone having been opened at the time by General Kaim, which, after four days, was forced to surrender. This last place surrendered on the 9th, after an explosion of a small magazine of powder. The garrison, consisting of 600 men, were made prisoners of war. The castle of Milan, which was garrisoned with 700 troops of the line and about 600 natives, held out only a short time, under General Bechaud.

After Moreau retreated beyond the Adda, he advanced his army towards the territory of Genoa, in three columns; repairing in person to Turin, in order to make provisions for the eventual evacuation of that city, and the preservation of the citadel, fixing his head-quarters at Alexandria, on the 7th of May. Suwarrow, in the mean time, had advanced to Pavia; but, by the divisions of his army, had weakened his main force, which General Moreau could not possibly have withstood, had his strength been consolidated. That officer took an excellent position between Valenza and Alexandria, behind the Po, fortifying himself on the Adda, within a kind of intrenched camp. A Russian division crossed the river below Valenza, on the 12th of May, attacking, with great fury, the left of the French; but they were driven back with prodigious slaughter.

Suwarrow now determined to march the main body of his army along the left bank of the Po to Turin, to force the French general either to fall back on the French frontier, or take refuge in the territory of the Ligurian republic. As General Moreau saw the movements which were made to render this design easy, he threw a bridge, during the night, over the Bormida, near Alexandria, which he crossed next morning, in person, at the head of a strong column, attacking and breaking the chain of Austrian and Russian posts of Marenzo, Guiliano, and Garrasols, and retreating in safety to Alexandria. But, though thus successful, he deemed it proper to evacuate Valenza and Alexandria, Casal having been captured by General Vukassowich; and he retreated by the way of Coni, still preserving his communication with Finale, and the other posts on the coast of Genoa. The schemes of Suwarrow were thus rendered abortive by the superior generalship of Moreau, which made him march towards Turin, that place instantly surrendering to the allies, and the garrison retiring to the citadel on the 27th of May. Scarcely had ten weeks passed away from the commencement of hostilities on the Adige, till Marshal Suwarrow had led his troops from the foot of the Rhetian Alps, across the plains of Lombardy, nearly within sight of the vineyards of Provence.

Though Suwarrow had made this astonishing progress in front, there was still an army in his rear, to oppose which a very considerable force was absolutely necessary. General Macdonald, being apprised of the retreat from the Adige, had departed from the kingdom of Naples. A camp was previously formed at Caserta, and at Naples was erected a strong national guard. Fort St. Elmo was provided and garrisoned for a siege, as were likewise Capua and Gaeta; the government was organized; and the patriots of Naples (as they were styled) appeared fully determined to defend themselves against every effort of the court of Palermo. When General Macdonald, however, departed from the camp of Caserta on the 9th of May, they were seized with astonishment; and the Roman republicans were scarcely less confounded.

Although Ferdinand IV. had abandoned his capital, he was not wholly forsaken by his subjects: the inhabitants of the provinces, in particular, still retained an affection for their absent king, and were ready to sacrifice their lives in his defence.

Cardinal Ruffo was very assiduous in cherishing these loyal sentiments. This ecclesiastic, one of the most extraordinary characters of the age, had, in consequence of some disputes with the pope, taken refuge in the court of Naples, where he was appointed Intendant of Caserta, an appointment by no means suitable to the dignity of the Roman purple. Having accompanied the king to Palermo, at a period when all the courtiers despaired of the restoration of the monarchy, he obtained leave to repair to Calabria, on purpose to erect the standard of royalty there. Although accompanied by five persons only when he landed at Scilla, viz. Spasiani, a priest, who acted as his secretary; his brother, a commander of one of the orders; a valet, and two domestics; this fortunate adventurer was soon joined by a number of inhabitants, headed by Don Reggio Renaldi, rector of Scalca, who had already organized an insurrection, and waited only the arrival of a chief!

The warlike cardinal, after collecting a number of new levies, in the capacity of general, resorted to his sacred functions as a priest, on purpose to arouse the fanaticism of a people whom he knew to be both superstitious and barbarous in the extreme. In virtue of his spiritual authority, he excommunicated all those who would not take up arms, while he enjoined every true catholic to wear a red cross in his hat, as a signal of faith, and promised such as might die in battle the immediate enjoyment of paradise. In addition to many of the peasantry, his eminence was soon joined by a multitude of galley-slaves, criminals imprisoned in the gaols, and robbers who had infested the highway; these were immediately formed into divisions, under three chiefs; the first of whom was called Fra' Diabolo, a monk, who, after being expelled from his convent, became the leader of a desperate band of freebooters; the second was the gaoler of Salerno, who marched at the head of his prisoners; and the third, Pauzanera, who, as reported, had committed fourteen homicides. Such, as asserted by some writers, were the troops under Cardinal Ruffo; but, be it recollected, that those styled criminals had been imprisoned by the revolutionists, and were probably more worthy characters than those whom they now opposed. The royalist army, though chiefly composed of Lazzaroni, or beggars, consisted of some hundreds of Calabrians and Russians, and amounted to upwards of 20,000 men. The martial prelate, having bestowed on them the appellation of "The Christian Army," attacked and seized the port of Avigliano, and the towns of Cotrone and Cantanzaro.

Having defeated the republican levies of men which were sent against him, Cardinal Ruffo marched against the capital, which, on the 20th of June, surrendered by capitulation.

Castel-a-mare, about eighteen miles from Naples, was summoned, by the members of the Neapolitan government, to surrender. The patriots fought with incredible valor, having, at first, formed the resolution of burying themselves under the ruins. They were summoned a second time, and, as they had no hope of obtaining any succours, they surrendered to a British squadron, under the command of Commodore Foote. The capitulation was signed on the 22d of June, and ratified by Cardinal Ruffo, Commodore Foote, and the commanders of the Russian and Turkish squadrons, the last of whom affixed his mark and seal. Those who capitulated amounted to 1500, and declared their intention of emigrating.

Soon after, a coalesced army of English, Russian, Turkish, Portuguese, and Italian troops, came into port, animated by the activity, and directed by the talents, of Lord Nelson, and his meritorious second, Captain Trowbridge. To the treaty which the cardinal had agreed to with the Prince of Caraccioli and some other members of the revolution, Lord Nelson refused to accede.

A body of English, Russian, and Portuguese troops having obtained possession of the castles of Ovo and Nuovo on the 26th, under the command of Captain Hood, another detachment, led by Captain Trowbridge, invested the castle of St. Elmo on the 29th. This was a work of great difficulty; seven batteries, armed with cannon of the largest bore, were successively erected; and, on July 11, thirty pieces of ordnance were ready to play on the fort. This arduous task was chiefly accomplished by the exertions of a body of British seamen. The garrison persisted in a vigorous defence; but the batteries of the place being almost all dismantled, and the works very much shattered, Mejan, the commanding officer, thinking the place was about to be stormed, at length consented to a capitulation. The terms were agreed to and signed on the 12th. The garrison, after having laid down their arms, were to be embarked for France, on the condition of not serving again until an exchange should take place; and all the subjects of his Sicilian majesty were to be delivered up to the allies.

The King of the Two Sicilies had arrived from Palermo, July 10, and, having repaired on board the Foudroyant, the English admiral's ship, where the royal standard was hoisted, saw also his flag waving once more over his capital. Lord Nelson and Captain Trowbridge did not confine their efforts to the restoration of the king, but extended them to that of the papal chair. The fate of the unfortunate Pius the Sixth had been unknown, even to the Austrians, who had entered Parma twenty-four hours after the pontiff had been torn from thence.

The only towns not yet reduced, under the authority of the Neapolitan government, were Capua and Gaeta. The former surrendered to Capt. Trowbridge, June 28. The French garrison laid down their arms on the glacis on the 29th, and marched towards Naples, to be there embarked for France. Capua surrendered, July 1, on the same conditions.

The King of the Two Sicilies formally disavowed the authority of Cardinal Ruffo to treat with subjects in rebellion. Ferdinand entertained exalted notions of his prerogative, having lately imprisoned the viceroy, Prince Pignatelli, on account of his negotiation with General Championnet; his letter to that prince, which we have given in the ninth chapter, is a sufficient test of his Sicilian majesty's jealousy; and it seems that, having anticipated, he had absolutely prohibited, at this time, a similar compromise of the royal authority. He accordingly put an end to the truce, and instantly blockaded the convoy destined to carry the members and adherents of the late government to France. However, as the honor of the English nation was immediately implicated, in respect to the prisoners at Castel-a-mare, which had surrendered to the squadron under Commodore Foote, the articles of that capitulation were strictly enforced, and considered as inviolable, amidst all the convulsions that afterwards ensued.

It was hoped that the magnanimity of the allies would have protected the patriots from the burst of royal vengeance; but Ferdinand looked upon those patriots (who were probably mistaken lovers of their country) as traitors, and, disregarding all treaties, his majesty was determined they should be treated as such. A special commission was appointed, which pronounced sentence of death, without much formality, on such as had taken an active part in the late revolutionary government.

For this conduct of his Sicilian majesty, the character of the hero of the Nile has been most wantonly and shamefully traduced. The prisoners on board the ships in the bay had addressed a letter to Admiral Nelson, which, as impartiality directs, we here subjoin:—

"After the arrival of the British fleet in this road, commanded by your excellency, the capitulation was begun to be put in execution. The garrison of the forts, on their part, set at liberty the state-prisoners and the English prisoners of war, and gave up, to the troops of his Britannic majesty, the gate of the royal palace which leads to the new fort; and, on the other side, the troops of his majesty the Emperor of all the Russias, attended the march of the garrison, with all the honors of war, out of the forts. It is now twenty-four days that we are lying in this road, unprovided with every thing necessary for existence. We have nothing but bread to eat; we drink nothing but putrid water, or wine mingled with seawater; and we have nothing but the bare planks to sleep on. Our houses have been entirely pillaged, and the greater part of our relations either imprisoned or massacred. We are persuaded that all the treatment which we suffer, after having capitulated, and after having, on our side, put the articles of the capitulation religiously into execution, is entirely unknown to your excellency, and to his Sicilian majesty, your fidelity and his benevolence being engaged in our deliverance. The delay of the execution of the capitulation gives us room to claim and implore his and your justice, in order that a treaty, concluded with four of the most civilized powers of Europe, who have always appreciated the inviolability of treaties, should be executed as speedily as possible. We hope that, by means of your good offices with his Sicilian majesty, due execution will be given to the articles of a capitulation which has been signed with good faith, and religiously fulfilled on the part of the garrison."

The following was Lord Nelson's answer:—

"I have shewn your letter to your gracious king, who must be the best and only judge of the merits and demerits of his subjects."

His lordship showed the letter, no doubt, with a compassionate view; for what could more powerfully plead the cause of those wretched men than their own pathetic address? Can it be supposed that he, who was equally renowned for piety and philanthropy, and who afterwards solicited in vain for the life of a traitor (Despard) in his own country, could have been an advocate for the immediate execution of so many in Naples? He styled the Sicilian king gracious, it being an epithet generally applied to majesty, and similar epithets are frequently abused through form or courtesy. The lady of the English ambassador was calumniated too, because she was unavoidably present at the scene; but of that lady we shall record an anecdote in our next book, which will fully demonstrate her natural benevolence. The Queen of Naples has been also accused as the secret instigator of the vengeance which ensued after the capture of the fortresses. It has, however, been asserted, by a person of rank, actually present on the occasion, that her majesty in vain interceded, on her knees, for the life of Cirillo: if the queen, then, had no influence, could it be presumed that the intercession of an English admiral would have prevailed?

The executions commenced with the Chevaliers Massa, Serra, Julian Colonna, and the Prince de Strongoli, who suffered death in the castle of Ceuf. Belloni and Pistici, two priests, were hanged near the Vicaria; the Adjutant-general Grimaldi burst from the hands of the guards, and perished, fighting against them; Menthone, the minister at war, suffered after a short and memorable speech. Dominico Cirillo, on being interrogated as to his condition, replied, "Under the despotism I was a physician; in the time of the republic, a representative of the people; at present, a hero!" Prince Carraccioli, general and chief of the Neapolitan marine, was executed on board a Neapolitan frigate. Marcello Scoti, Paschal Buffo, Joseph Luogoteta, and several others, suffered. Nor was the softer sex exempt from this terrible proscription; for Eleonora Fonesca, and eighteen ladies of distinction, were executed by the cord; while the Duchesses of Cassano and Popoli were shut up for life in a penitentiary-house.

These are a few only of those who were put to death by the sentence of the state inquisition, and who chiefly consisted of Sicilians: some perished by their own hands, to avoid the disgrace of a public execution; others were burnt within their palaces; hundreds were torn to pieces by a frantic populace; and, if we are to give credit to some of the few who escaped from this scene of general carnage, the Lazzaroni frequently disputed with each other the bleeding members of their victims, which they were accustomed first to broil on the smoking ruins, and then devour. We trust, for the sake of humanity, that this account has been exaggerated.

The original number of those who had capitulated was from 1500 reduced to 500. These, who continued on board the transports, were allowed to sail for a French port, on condition of perpetual banishment, and the total confiscation of all their estates: they sailed from the bay of Naples on the 12th of August.

Caudor must acknowledge that the King of the Two Sicilies carried his rigor too far; he vindicated his conduct, indeed, by insisting that the treaty had not his royal sanction—that such examples were absolutely necessary in times of rebellion; and that the French, in their civil war with the Vendéans, had paid no regard to their treaty. His majesty, however, notwithstanding he was supported by a British fleet, a body of confederates, and an army of Calabrians, and still further strengthened by a new alliance, offensive and defensive, with the court of Vienna, and the promise of 60,000 Austrians, in case his dominions should be again invaded, did not deem himself safe in Naples, but thought fit to return to Sicily, and fix his residence again at Palermo.

The rabble, or the Lazzaroni, appear to have been the most strenuous supporters of royalty; while the great families, or nobles, seem to have countenanced the late revolution. Even the clergy were advocates for republicanism. Ruffo, and all his adherents, were solemnly excommunicated in the cathedral of the capital; the cardinal archbishop had enjoined, by means of a pastoral letter, that the name of the republic should be substituted for that of the king in the prayers of the church; and all who refused obedience to the new constitution had been threatened with ecclesiastical censure. Such was the infatuation which provoked royal indignation and vengeance.

Although the retreat of the French armies had been no where attended with such terrible consequences as in the kingdom of Naples, this event was, however, felt throughout the whole of Italy.

The archdukes of the house of Austria had always exhibited great mildness as sovereigns of Tuscany, and the reign of Leopold was particularly celebrated for his virtue. No less than 40,000 of the inhabitants of the mountains, on learning the disasters of Macdonald and Moreau, immediately flew to arms, and attacked the French on every side. The garrison, alarmed for its safety, immediately abandoned the capital; on which the populace felled the tree of liberty, and the ancient magistrates resumed their respective functions.

Soon after, a column of Austrians and Aretins obliged the invaders to abandon Lucca. Leghorn also was evacuated, in consequence of a capitulation between Darcoubet and General de Lavilete, the former governor.

The same effects in the Roman republic as in the other states of Italy, had resulted from the fortune of the campaign. In retreating from the city of Naples, Macdonald had left at Rome about 3500 men of all descriptions, civil and military. The Roman state regarded the defeat of the French army on the Trebia as the signal of insurrection, as had been the case in the city of Naples. When, in the beginning of August, the insurgents approached, the government seemed to be totally disorganized. There was no money in the treasury, nor arms in the magazines; and the city was wholly unprepared for a siege, an event which was by no means expected. The insurgents constantly increased in numbers, having received reinforcements both from Tuscany and Naples. Two different sallies were made by General Garnier, the commandant, but he was repulsed with loss. He resolved, however, to defend the city to the last extremity.

The inhabitants received the greatest molestation from the post of Frescati, in consequence of which the Roman national guard, with the Princes Santa Croce and Borghese at their head, having united themselves with the French, determined on a third assault, on the 20th of August, which was accompanied with very flattering success, the intrenchments being forced; and the triumph of the conquerors was testified by the capture of twenty pieces of cannon, and other trophies of war. In a short time, the post of Frescati was re-taken; different bodies of Austrian and Russian troops approached the city, and the British squadron blocking up the port of Civita Vecchia summoned Rome to surrender. A council of war was held, when it was finally determined to negotiate with the British, the squadron belonging to this country being under the command of Commodore Trowbridge. By virtue of the positive orders which he received from Naples, this officer made a formal demand of the French governor, to deliver up the Neapolitan patriots who had taken refuge in Rome. General Garnier replied, "that he would never consent to an action so unworthy; but that the French would rather sacrifice their own lives with those of their friends."

The first name on the sanguinary list was that BOOK III. of the Princess de Belmonte; and when the commodore became acquainted with the resolution of the French commandant, it is said that he made no secret of his approbation, as he was no stranger to what had happened at Naples. He considered the honor and dignity of a British officer as superior to all orders and instructions whatever. This being well understood, a capitulation was signed on the 27th of September, agreeably to the articles of which, ROME and its dependencies surrendered to the arms of BRITAIN for the first time since the foundation of that celebrated metropolis of the world.

CHAP. XIV.

It was agreed on by the twelfth article of capitulation, that "such citizens of Rome as shall now form, or have heretofore formed, a part of the constituted authorities of the Roman republic, and those also who shall have served the republican cause by their patriotic works, or taken up arms for that purpose, shall be at liberty to depart with their property at the same time with the French troops, and on the same terms as they do." It was agreed on by other articles, "that transports should be provided by the English commander, and victualled, for the conveyance of the above descriptions of persons to Villa Franca, Antibes, or Toulon; and that such Romans as chose to remain shall suffer no molestation." It was stipulated by the last article, that, "in case of any difficulty arising with respect to the interpretation of the articles, they shall be explained in favor of the French and their allies."

During the short existence of the Neapolitan republic, the Duke of Cansano had been sent as ambassador to Rome, and many Neapolitans of high rank were residing in that city at the time of its investment. Even before its surrender, the British commander took a deep interest in the fate of these unfortunate exiles. He hastened their departure from the port of Civita Vecchia; and when inevitably forced back to that place, the invincible humanity of Commodore Trowbridge again enabled the vessel to put to sea, and the proscribed fugitives at last reached Toulon. In this manner the honor of the British name was vindicated.

General Macdonald having arrived at Florence on the 24th of May, speedily endeavored to form a junction with the troops that were stationed in Tuscany, which formed an army of 40,000 effective men, including Macdonald's original force, and the reinforcements under the command of General Victor, by whom he was joined with his division. General Macdonald transferred his headquarters to Lucca, seemingly with the design of entering the Genoese territory by the way of Sarzana; but finding himself possessed of such strength, he unexpectedly commenced his march towards Modena, on the 8th of June, making a fierce attack upon the Austrians on the 12th, who were encamped in great force near that place, under the command of General Hohenzollern, who was obliged to abandon Modena to the republicans, and retreat to Mirandola, after a sanguinary conflict. General Macdonald now made preparations for marching to the relief of Mantua; but Kray having given orders, that the bridges on the Po should be demolished, he posted himself on the opposite bank of the river, determined to oppose the passage of the French. General Macdonald, although wounded in a recent action, continued his march, and turning to the westward, made his entrance into Parma on the 14th of June, and Piacenza on the following day, immediately investing its citadel, and obliging General Otto to fall back on the castle of St. Giannis. General Moreau in the mean time marched his army to Genoa, where he joined the Ligurian division under General Perpignan, in order to commence offensive operations along with Macdonald.

Suwarrow, alarmed at the career of Macdonald, threatened to storm the citadel of Turin; but having been gallantly repulsed by Fiorella, who commanded in that place, he left General Kaim to continue the siege; and, collecting his troops at Alexandria, which consisted of seventeen battalions of Russians, twelve of Austrian dragoons, and three regiments of cossacks, he contrived, by forced marches, to arrive with his advanced guard to the support of General Otto, then in full retreat, after experiencing a considerable loss. Having reinforced the right wing of the imperialists, by means of a body of troops under Prince Pangrazion, a sudden attack was made with fixed bayonets, June 17, on the left of the French, while their right wing and flank were assailed with equal impetuosity by the Russian general, Prince Korsakow. Hereupon Macdonald, who had advanced against the centre, and was proceeding in pursuit of the fleeing Austrians, perceiving himself assailed on all sides, after a furious contest, fell back behind the Tydone, where he received the enemy with a brisk fire of artillery and small arms.

Early the next morning, the allies crossed the little stream, on the banks of which they had encamped the preceding evening, and advanced in four columns against the French, who were drawn up in a line of battle along the course of the Travia, one of the most rapid rivers in Italy. As the country was intersected with hedges and ditches, the march was tedious, and the attack difficult. At length the vanguard, under the command of Prince Pangrazion, with four squadrons of the Karaczay horse and four regiments of cossacks, reached the left wing a little after noon, and having turned the flank, immediately assailed it with fixed bayonets. So terrible was the charge, and so copious the effusion of human blood, that numbers of the republicans remained dead on the field of battle, while the adjutant-general, two colonels, and 600 privates of the Polish regiment of Dembrowsky, were made prisoners, and two pieces of cannon taken. A fresh attack having been made on the centre, the French were driven over the Trabia; Macdonald, however, soon after re-crossed the river, but was so gallantly received by a Russian column, that he was forced to retire to, and remain on the opposite bank, by an uninterrupted fire of cannon and musketry, which continued until eleven o'clock at night. The whole country between the Trabia and the Tydone was covered with the dead and the dying, and the carnage was on all sides terrible.

The third day's battle did not commence until two hours before noon, June 19; as the French waited for the assistance of a regiment of Ligurians, under the command of General Lapoype. The expected reinforcements not having arrived, Macdonald resolved to lose no further time; and the republicans being put in motion, the left wing attempted once more to cross the river, but was driven back by Prince Pangrazion. The assault was renewed soon after with redoubled violence on the column commanded by General Sweykowsky, on which the action became equally obstinate and bloody. In the course of two subsequent attacks, the French at length found means to ford the Trabia, under cover of their numerous batteries, and the fate of the combat was for some time doubtful. At length, after a horrible slaughter, a column, which had been ordered to assail the flank of Marshal Lieutenant Ott, was forced to return; and Prince Pangrazion, having advanced with a body of infantry, while the Austrian general, Melas, brought up the artillery at a critical moment, Macdonald retreated to the right bank of the Trabia. On this occasion, upwards of 12,000 of the enemy lay extended in the field, 700 were taken prisoners, and three stands of colors and several pieces of artillery fell into the hands of the allies. The vanquished army retired during night, in two columns, to Piacenza, where the four generals, Olivier, Rusca, Sulm, and Cambran, with several field-officers and near 5000 soldiers, who had been wounded in the late actions, were left behind. The rest evacuated Piacenza, and marching in two columns, the first under General Victor, ascending the Val de Taro, took the road of Sestri, and resumed its wonted position in the territory of Lucca, to secure the passes of the Apennines on the side of Sarzana; and the second, commanded by General Macdonald in person, marched for Modena. Both these generals, Victor and Macdonald, had been wounded during the conflicts on the Trabia.

Suwarrow continued his pursuit of the enemy, whom he followed to Fiorenzello, where he rested a night, and received the first intelligence of his having been foiled by his rival. When a compliment was made to this field-marshal, respecting his victory on the Trabia, it is said that he made answer in the words of the Sovereign of Epirus—"Such another, and we are undone!"

In the mean time, General Moreau advanced as far as Tortona, and suddenly, on the 20th of June, engaged the Austrians, under the command of General Bellegarde, who had been left to superintend the blockade of Alexandria. He maintained his position for some time, but was driven with precipitation beyond the Bormida. Finding that the plan of co-operation had been defeated, which he and Macdonald had concerted between them, he again retreated into the Ligurian territory, about the end of June.

When the Russian field-marshal was informed of this event, he abandoned the pursuit of Macdonald. He was, however, gratified to hear that the citadel of Turin, which for a considerable time had engrossed the attention of a large detachment of his army, had surrendered on the 22d of June. Never was the superiority of the modern art of war more conspicuous than upon the present occasion; for, though this fortress, at the beginning of the eighteenth century, had resisted a formidable army, it was now obliged to capitulate, after the trenches had been opened only a few days, in consequence of the irresistible fire of 300 pieces of cannon, which dismounted the artillery within the place, and rendered all the efforts of the besieged unavailing.

In the mean time, Macdonald pursued his march towards Tuscany. Klenau, who had been left by Suwarrow in pursuit of the retreating enemy, had come up with the rear at Bologna, June 30; but General Hulin, instead of laying down his arms, entered into a treaty, by which he was permitted to evacuate that city with his detachment and baggage; after which he joined his commander, who, by this time, had surprised Modena.

General Macdonald resolved to evacuate the Tuscan territory, being pressed by the Austrian Generals Ott, Klenau, and Hohenzollern; and, retiring to Lucca early in the month of July, he sent his heavy cannon to Leghorn, under a strong escort, and commenced his march to the Genoese through the difficult defiles of Sarzana. Klenau marched into Florence on the 8th of July, and the capitulation of Leghorn (before mentioned) took place on the 16th, which was the more valuable acquisition, as the artillery and camp equipage of Macdonald, who at length effected a junction with Moreau, was there deposited.

The Italian fortresses, being now destitute of a covering army, were obliged to yield. Fort Urbino and St. Leon capitulated in succession, and the citadel of Alexandria, in which General Gardanne had made a stout resistance, also changed masters, July 21, as soon as the second parallel had been completed by Field-marshal Bellegarde.

On the 23d of July, the batteries against Mantua were furnished with 111 heavy cannon, and a most formidable and tremendous fire was opened upon that city. General Kray was soon enabled to employ near 500 pieces of different kinds, including mortars, and, being reinforced by a body of the allies, this strong fortress, garrisoned by more than 10,000 men, was surrendered on the 28th, by General Latour Foissac, who commanded there. This general had served under, and was supposed to be attached to, the old government; consequently, his surrender was ascribed, by the Parisians, to treason. It is therefore evident, that the republican government was not so mild as it was represented. By the articles of the capitulation, the garrison was allowed to march out with the honors of war, and six pieces of cannon in front; while the non-commissioned officers and soldiers were to be sent to France, under condition of not serving until exchanged. The governor was to be permitted three waggons, "which were not to be examined;" and he was also presented with a pair of colors, "in consideration of the energy of his defence." By the fall of Mantua, the investment of which required such a considerable force, Kray and Suwarrow regained the perfect freedom of action.

Nothing decisive or important took place in Switzerland, between the Archduke and Massena, during this interval; on the eastern frontier of which country a second Russian army made its appearance, early in the month of August, which was commanded by General Korsakow. Before they formed a junction with the Austrians, Massena repeatedly attacked the Austrian posts from Zurich to Mount St. Gothard, with no inconsiderable advantages; and Lecourbe eminently distinguished himself on this, as on many former occasions, by a spirit full of activity and enterprize. The Archduke being strengthened by the union of the first Russian columns at Schaffhausen, the momentary triumphs of the French were effectually checked; and the martial balance still continued to be doubtfully suspended.

The troops of the republic occupied the Bochetta, confined and nearly besieged within the narrow limits of the Genoese territory in Italy, bounded and protected by a continued chain of mountains. The caprice of the directory transferred the chief command of the French army from General Moreau to General Joubert, who, when he took upon him the command, expressed the high opinion he entertained of the talents of his predecessor, whom he requested to defer his departure for some time, that he might concert with him his subsequent plan of operations. Moreau readily agreed to this proposal, consenting to act as a volunteer under Joubert's orders;—a remarkable instance, on both sides, of that magnanimity which rises superior to all personal jealousies.

The two generals resolved to march into the plains, after reconnoitering the position of the enemy. In virtue of this resolution, the corps of Bellegarde, at Trezzo, was furiously attacked on the 13th of August. General Joubert, at the same time, marched in person along the right side of the Scrivia, while Moreau descended by the defiles of the Bochetta, to co-operate in raising the siege of the citadel of Tortona.

Suwarrow, forming a proper judgment of their designs from these movements, determined to attack them without loss of time, which took place early on the morning of the 14th, in the vicinity of the town of Novi. The vast and extensive plain of Piedmont terminates at this place in a long ridge of hills, which rise so suddenly, and are so very steep, that, although the height be not great, the ascent is very difficult. The French were strongly intrenched on these hills. Scarcely had General Kray commenced the action on the left of the enemy, when General Joubert, eager to animate the charge of infantry by his presence, advancing forward with rather too much rashness, was pierced through the heart by a musket-ball, and he expired almost without a sigh. He still continued to animate his men to the last, exclaiming, after he had fallen, "March! march! and fight for the republic." In point of situation, the French had, no doubt, the advantage, but, in numbers, were greatly inferior to the forces of the combined powers. The slaughter was truly terrible, and no impression could be made on either side. Suwarrow personally charged the centre of the enemy three different times, and the unconquerable valor of the French as often repulsed him.

Moreau, having resumed the command on the death of Joubert, was now opposed to Suwarrow, and accomplished deeds the most astonishing. General Melas, in the mean time, gained the heights of Novi on the side of Pietalle, and, marching along the banks of the Scrivia, by indefatigable labor, at last succeeded in turning the right flank of the republican army, by which manœuvre the victory was decided. The French generals quitted the field to the enemy, from the danger of being surrounded, retreating by the way of Ovada, with the loss of the greater part of their artillery. In an attempt to cover this retreat, the rear-guard suffered severely, and night alone rescued them from destruction. It is probable that a more sanguinary contest never took place during the whole of this horrid war, as the loss on both sides was moderately computed at 20,000 men, in killed and wounded.

The French once more retired within the line of their posts; and Suwarrow ordered the troops under his own immediate command to Asti, leaving Melas and Klenau to watch the motions of General Moreau; his design being to cover the siege of Coni, and to stop the progress of Championnet, who was then on his march to succeed Joubert, with large reinforcements.

When Suwarrow left Italy, in virtue of a new arrangement in the imperial courts, the main object of Kray and Melas was, to prevent the premeditated union of Moreau and Championnet before Coni. The army of the latter, being nearly insulated, was attacked near Fossano, on the 18th of September, by the Austrian commanders, Bellegarde, at the same time forcing his way through the chain of posts above Turin. This combined operation was so successful, that the greater part of the French were under the necessity of retreating to Suza with considerable loss. Championnet, however, went to Genoa in person, to receive from Moreau the command of the army of Italy.

To relieve Massena from the joint pressure of the Austrians and Russians, the army of observation, formerly commanded by Bernadotte, received orders to penetrate once more into Germany. Having encamped in the neighbourhood of Mentz, General Muller, to whose charge this army was now confided, accordingly established his head-quarters at Mannheim, and pushed his advanced guards as far as Heydelberg; while Baraguay D'Hilliers, advancing with a body of troops drawn from the neighbouring garrisons, imposed a contribution upon Frankfort, passed the Maine, and joined his countrymen in the territory of Darmstadt, August 28.

When the Archduke Charles was informed that the French were preparing to seize on the rich harvests of Germany, now left defenceless by his absence, he immediately sent forward a strong detachment; and, having conferred the command on General Hotze, prepared to recross the Rhine in person. General Stzarray was sent to the relief of Phillipsburg, now bombarded by a column of the French army, but who immediately retired on his approach.

Suwarrow made preparations for attacking the passes of Mount St. Gothard, and ascending the valley of the Levantine, with the Austrian generals Auffenberg and Laudohn; also, for repulsing Lecourbe, and pressing on Lucerne and Berne, to force Massena to abandon his position and cross the Aar, with the view of securing his rear. Lecourbe, surrounded on all hands, was obliged to abandon the important posts which he had held so long, the Russians extending themselves along the Lake of Zurich. Massena's army was superior to the enemy, before the arrival of Suwarrow; and of that superiority, while it remained, he determined to avail himself. He therefore ordered, on the 24th of September, a division of the army to cross the Limmat, where the Russians, under Korsakow, lay encamped. Another division was directed to storm the heights on the west of Zurich, and a third to engage the Austrian advanced posts on the Linthe. Here General Hotze lost his life while reconnoitering the enemy, which threw the Austrians into confusion, when they fell back hastily towards Lichtenstein and St. Gall, thus separating themselves from the centre of the army. The attack on Zurich was equally successful. The Russians were forced to abandon the heights with terrible slaughter, and the town was carried sword in hand. Korsakow retreated to Schaffhausen by the way of Bulach, with the loss of his artillery and baggage. The French following up their advantages, the allies were under the necessity of crossing the Rhine, the lake of Constance being placed between them and the enemy.

Suwarrow, enraged at the news of this total and unexpected defeat, thus wrote to General Korsakow—"You shall answer with your head, if you make another retrograde step: I am coming to repair your errors." Having arrived in the valley of Muten, the Russians took possession of the bridge, after a most obstinate resistance, October 3. With much difficulty and constant fighting, the commander-in-chief penetrated as far as Schweitz, and carried the post of Brunnen by assault the next day, (October 4,) after meeting with a desperate opposition from Lecourbe, which was the last of his triumphs. Had he ventured through the valley of Glaris, he would have found Massena with a superior army, and the danger of his being surrounded would have been imminent. He left, indignantly, the cantons of Schweitz and Glaris, retreating into the valley of the Grisons, by the Flemsthal, with the Austrian divisions under Auffenberg and Iellachich. This retreat was not accomplished without prodigious labor and loss, as the French closely pursued him behind, harassing and nearly destroying the rear-guard, and taking part of the baggage and heavy artillery, which it was not possible for Suwarrow to carry off.

The Archduke having received information of the death of General Hotze, and the reverse of fortune in Switzerland which followed that event, abandoned his project of crossing the Rhine, instantly marching to the southward with the greater part of his army, and only leaving behind him sufficient to cover Mannheim and Philippsburg. He held a council of war at Donaueschingen, on the 4th of October; and the Austrian army re-entered Switzerland in a few days after. General Muller again crossing the Rhine in a few days after the departure of the Archduke, recovered

AS SOON as Massena had ascertained that the haughty spirit of Suwarrow was humbled, by a retreat, he marched, with the utmost speed, against Korsakow, hitherto kept in check by General Ferino; and, having come up with the allies, commenced a terrible attack. The right wing, partly unable to withstand the shock, and partly intimidated by the late events, immediately gave way; but the left, chiefly composed of emigrants, and led on by the Duke D'Enghien, displayed their wonted valor, and proved that the French nobles, when brought into the field, were the most formidable adversaries of the French republicans. No sooner had the retreat of this portion of the army become inevitable, than the corps of Condé acted as the rear-guard; while Bauer, a Russian general, who had formerly distinguished himself in Poland, burst through the French infantry with his cavalry, and rejoined his countrymen, after leaving Constance, for the third time, in the possession of the enemy.

At length, the Russians rapidly retired from the field of action. Korsakow filed off by the lake of Constance, with the principal part of his forces; and Suwarrow, on the other side, who had for some time established his head-quarters at Coire, marched to Feldkirch, uniting the cordon on the right side of the lake, and joining the different divisions of his army at Lindau, more than a third of which had been sacrificed by the caprice of their commander, in a distant climate and foreign quarrel, far from their friends, families, and native home. After prodigious efforts, the armies on both sides being almost equally exhausted, were compelled to a kind of suspension of hostilities, waiting in silent expectation for the arrival of reinforcements, to renew these dreadful scenes of carnage, desolation, and death.

On the news of the first successes of Suwarrow, and rejoicings of the court of St. Petersburg, the Emperor Paul was highly offended that the states of Germany were not actuated in the defence of the same cause, with zeal similar to his own; in consequence of which, he issued an official notification, dated from St. Petersburg, on the 15th of September, addressed to all the members of the Germanic empire, and representing, "that, having been constantly animated with zeal for the cause of sovereigns, and desirous of putting an end to the devastations and disorders carried into the most distant countries by the impious government under which France groaned in silence, he had taken the firm resolution of sending his forces by sea and land to succour the oppressed; to re-establish, without suffering the least division, the monarchy of France; the ancient government of the United Provinces and the Helvetic Cantons; to preserve the integrity of the Germanic empire; and find his recompence in the happiness and tranquillity of Europe. Providence blessed his arms, and hitherto the Russian troops had triumphed over the enemies of thrones, religion, and social order; and he invites all the members of the Germanic empire to unite their forces with his, and rally round him; in which case he will not sheathe his sword till he has seen the downfall of the monster which threatens to crush all legal authorities." This declaration, however, could scarcely be received by those to whom it was addressed, till the victories mentioned in it were changed into sad defeats.

The hostile armies were nearly in the same situation, in the beginning of November, which they had occupied about six months before. The head-quarters of the Archduke were at Schaffhausen and Donaueschingen, and his former situation at Basle was resumed by Massena. Suwarrow fell back to Memmingen, having collected his troops in the vicinity of Lindau; and Coire, with the other posts, were evacuated, which he held in the Grisons. The Voralberg was still occupied by General Linken, who succeeded Hotze, and he kept up his communication with Feldkirch by means of the post of Mayenfeld.

The retreat of the Russians being resolved on, the Archduke Charles, determining to act in Switzerland on the defensive, sent what reinforcements he could collect, in the Tyrole and Carinthia, to strengthen Melas and Kray, the former of whom had invested the important fortress of Coni, hitherto regarded as impregnable, while the covering army was under the command of the latter officer, and Klenau was employed in the blockade of Genoa. Championnet, at last resolving to make one grand effort for the relief of Coni, endeavored to attempt the cutting off of the right wing of the Austrians on the side of Genoa, for which he made a number of feigned attacks on the left. General Melas, however, apprehending his design, added strength to the posts which were most in danger; and, on the 4th of November, the hostile armies prepared for a general engagement. The utmost bravery was exhibited by the combatants on both sides, and the mutual charges were furious, and sustained with firmness, none of them being gainers, and none of them willing to yield the advantage. Grenier's column, being overpowered by superior numbers, was broken by the exertions of General Ott; and the whole republican army were forced back to Valdizcio, after falling into confusion, which was wholly inevitable. General Melas having attacked them in the afternoon, Championnet retired to Contala, with additional loss, which place he abandoned in the night, leaving Coni to defend itself, after losing 8000 men in this bold attempt, although it was not crowned with any success.

The French, under St. Cyr, had been severely checked by General Kray, while on his march to form a junction with Championnet, forcing him to retreat beyond the mountains of Novi. The account of the fall of Ancona was received about the same time, which had been blockaded by Russian and Turkish ships on sea, and on land by a body of Austrians under General Frolich, being strengthened by a numerous corps of insurgents. General Monnier surrendered to Frolich, who took possession of the place only in the name of the Emperor of Germany, which, when it came to be reported, was extremely offensive to the court of St. Petersburg.

The trenches before Coni were now formally opened, and a tremendous fire was kept up on that fortress, from nineteen batteries, mounting 200 pieces of cannon. A powder-magazine was set on fire, by a bomb accidentally falling upon it, which blew up a redoubt. The flames spread with rapidity, all hope of extinguishing which expired, in consequence of the uninterrupted explosion of bombs and shells. As the French commandant had not the most distant expectation of relief, and as a prolongation of hostilities must inevitably destroy the place, he at last resolved to submit; a capitulation was signed, and the garrison surrendered as prisoners of war. Coni, in this manner, justly considered as the key of Piedmont, fell into the hands of the Austrians, and nothing of the splendid conquests of the French in Italy now remained, but the Ligurian territory.

Suwarrow, having assembled the scanty remains of his own troops at Coire, ordered the wreck of the army of Korsakow, and the corps of Condé, to form a junction with him. After some delay, he proceeded to Bohemia, where he spent the winter. Afterwards, this veteran field-marshal, having lost 60,000 of his best warriors, retired to his native country, where he soon perished, either by poison or a broken heart.

General Championnet died at Nice, in consequence of a contagious malady, which had swept away a multitude of the French soldiers in Italy.

NOTWITHSTANDING the desolation of other republics, Holland still remained under the new government, supplying France with loans and resources of every kind; by which means she continued to support her own declining credit. Therefore, in the grand plan of military operations, concerted between the confederate courts, it was determined that Great Britain should attempt a powerful diversion of the French arms, by the actual invasion of Holland, aided by a body of about 20,000 auxiliaries, to be furnished by Russia, exclusive of the force employed by the Emperor Paul in Italy and Switzerland. The benefits to be derived from this expedition were great and obvious: the ancient alliance between the two states would be renewed; the power of France diminished; and the Prince of Orange, at this time in exile, on account of his attachment to England, restored to the rank of stadtholder and captain-general of the forces by sea and land.

Though apparently of the utmost consequence that this expedition should have been undertaken at an early period of the campaign, the convention between Great Britain and Russia was not signed at St. Petersburg till the 11th of June. By article IV. it was stipulated, that, on the arrival of the corps of 17,593 men at Revel, the sum of 44,000*l.* sterling was to be advanced immediately, and 44,000*l.* more paid in two months: the same sum was also to be furnished at the commencement of every month. By Article VI. his Britannic majesty engaged to provide and maintain, at his own expence, the necessary number of horses. And by Article VIII. it was agreed, that two months additional subsidies should be paid for the troops after their return to their own country.

BOOK III. It was agreed, in a separate article, that the emperor should lend his ships, frigates, and transports, on the following conditions, viz.

CHAP. XV.

1. Upon their quitting the port of Cronstadt, the sum of 58,927*l.* 10*s.* sterling was to be advanced for the expences of equipment for three months, over and above the subsidy of 19,642*l.* 10*s.* per month, to be paid always on the first day thereof.

2. As the squadron was already furnished with provisions for three months, the same was to be paid for by estimate.

3. The officers and sailors were to be fed at the expence of Great Britain; and

4. The officers were to be indemnified for the preparations made for the campaign.

Instead of keeping the object in view a secret, it was publicly known; and a considerable body of troops having been assembled on the coast of Kent, the necessary dispositions were made for effecting a descent. It was determined that there should be two successive expeditions, by two divisions of the army. The first, under General Sir Ralph Abercromby, an officer of great reputation and experience, sailed from the Downs early in August; and the other, under the Duke of York, whose rank as commander-in-chief, and dignity as prince of the blood, were calculated to confer splendor on the intended enterprise. These two divisions were composed of thirty battalions of infantry, besides cavalry and artillery, making, in conjunction with the Russians, an army of 45 or 50,000 men.

In the interim, the hereditary prince of Orange repaired to Lingen, on the Emms, where he assembled all the Stadtholderian party capable of bearing arms; magazines were at the same time formed at Bremen, and an active intercourse kept up with the partisans of his family. His serene highness, the Prince of Orange, had also prepared a proclamation, (dated at Hampton Court, July 28, 1799,) in which he informed his "dear countrymen," that the long-wished-for moment had arrived, when they were to be delivered from their several calamities. "His majesty, the King of Great Britain," he observed, "moved by his affection and friendship towards the republic of the United Provinces, and pitying your misfortunes, has taken the generous resolution, as soon as the general circumstances of Europe would admit, to employ, in concert with his allies, vigorous measures for your deliverance." He stated, that the troops sent to their assistance did not repair as enemies, but as friends and deliverers, in order to rescue them from the odious oppression under which they were kept by the French government, and to restore to them "the enjoyment of their religion and liberty; those invaluable blessings for which, with the divine protection, they and their ancestors had fought and conquered. Hesitate not, therefore," he added, "brave inhabitants of the United Provinces, to meet and assist your deliverers. Receive them among you as friends, and protectors of the happiness and welfare of your country. Let every difference of political sentiments and opinions vanish before this great object. Do not suffer the spirit of party, or even the sense of the wrongs you have experienced, to induce you to commit any acts of revenge or persecution. Let your hearts and your hands be united to repel the common enemy, and to re-establish the liberty and independence of your common country."

His serene highness concluded by assuring them, that as soon as the first efforts, which they were making towards their delivery, had acquired some consistency, "his dearly-beloved son, who was in possession of all his confidence, and deserving of theirs, would put himself at their head, and, following the steps of his illustrious ancestors, spare neither his property nor his life, in order to assist, for their sakes, in bringing this great undertaking to a successful issue."

The hereditary prince soon after published a declaration, nearly similar in substance to his father's, in which he promised forgiveness to all who should return to their duty, and assist in liberating their country. He also warned the present rulers not to offend any one, either belonging to the ancient legal government, or who should have distinguished himself as a partisan of the house of Orange; and so sanguine were the expectations of success, that "all who had been formerly employed in the departments of police, finance, and justice, were enjoined to take upon them the provisional administration of their former offices."

The first division of the army embarked on board 140 transports, and, on the 13th of August, sailed from Margate, Ramsgate, and the neighbouring ports; after which they proceeded, under the convoy of Vice-admiral Mitchell, to join Lord Duncan, who was cruising in the north seas. Two grand objects were embraced upon this occasion; the first was the possession of the Helder, which would not only confer on the invaders a sea-port and arsenal, but contribute greatly to the attainment of the second object, namely, the possession of the Batavian fleet, most of the seamen and some of the officers of which were discontented with the new government, while the naval commander himself was supposed not to be wholly averse from the cause of the Stadtholder.

From the first moment of embarkation, the weather proved so adverse to the designs of the English, that apprehensions were entertained of a deficiency of water, and a certain period was actually fixed, on the expiration of which it would not have been deemed prudent to hazard an attack. Five days, however, before this fixed period, the weather became so favorable, that the fleet was enabled to stand in for the Dutch coast.

Notwithstanding a landing could not be immediately effected, General Abercromby seized on this opportunity to disperse the proclamation of the Prince of Orange, as well as another of his own, in which it was stated, "that his majesty, the King of Great Britain, the ancient ally of the United Provinces, had entrusted him with the command of a body of troops," and that it was not "as enemies, but as friends and deliverers, that the English now entered their territories. This undertaking," he continued, "had no other object in view, but to deliver the inhabitants, heretofore free and happy; from the oppression under which they groaned; to protect their religious worship against the persecuting intolerance of incredulity and atheism; to rescue their administration from the violence experienced from anarchy and rapaciousness; and to re-establish them in the possession of their ancient liberty and independence, so closely connected with the privileges of that constitution, by means of which their ancestors fought and conquered under the standards of the Princes of Orange—privileges, whose influence had proved to the United Provinces a perennial source of prosperity, under the auspices of the amity and alliance of Great Britain."

At the same time, his excellency found means to transmit a summons to the commanding officer of the Dutch troops; while Lord Duncan sent a letter to the admiral of the Batavian fleet, on the supposition that the forces were about to land immediately, stating, that as more than 20,000 men had disembarked at the Helder, "he had now an opportunity of manifesting his zeal to the Prince of Orange, by declaring for him, together with all the ships that might choose to follow his example." The answers were, however, unfavorable; the former having replied, "that he would oppose the progress of the army with the brave troops under his command;" and the latter, "that the enemy might expect a defence from him worthy of his nation and his honor."

Although the squadron had been once more forced to sea, yet, through unceasing efforts, the shore of the Helder was again descried, and the troops began to disembark by day-light, August 27, all the bomb-vessels, sloops, and gun-brigs, being stationed so as to open a well-directed fire, in order to scour the beach, and prevent all opposition from the enemy.

General Daendels having assembled a body of infantry, cavalry, and artillery, near Callanstorg, made repeated attempts to dislodge the right of the British, now posted on a ridge of sand-hills, stretching along the coast from north to south, and incapable of forming more than a battalion in line of battle; but the narrowness of the position was, upon the whole, favorable to troops entirely destitute of horse and artillery; so that the enemy, instead of being able to make any impression, were, after a sharp but irregular engagement, which lasted for some hours, obliged to retire to another position, six miles in the rear. According to the official account, the English lost 500 men.

General Abercromby determined immediately to attack the Helder; and the brigades commanded by the Major-generals Moore and Burrard were accordingly destined for this undertaking. Late, however, in the evening, the garrison of the fort, consisting of about 2000 national troops, was withdrawn, and the English took possession of the works next morning, August 28.

This was but a prelude to the great success which followed. Having shipped pilots at the Helder, Vice-admiral Mitchell, who succeeded to the command in the absence of Lord Duncan, got under sail with his squadron, for the purpose of reducing the Dutch fleet, which he was determined to follow to the walls of Amsterdam, unless they surrendered to the British flag, or capitulated to the Prince of Orange. Accordingly, August 30, he formed the line of battle, as follows:—

At five o'clock in the morning, orders were given to prepare for action; and, notwithstanding two ships and a frigate ran on shore, the English passed the Helder point and Mars Diep, continuing their course along the Texel, in the channel that leads to the Vleiter, the Dutch being then at anchor at the Red Buoy.

The Dutch government had not been inert in preparing the means of defence and resistance. Their naval force consisted of nine ships of the line, and a great number of frigates, under the command of Admiral Story, who had saved himself by an early flight from the battle off Camperdown. Their military did not exceed 20,000 men, to which must be added about 15,000 French, under General Brune, the directory not

CHAP. XV. The English admiral sent Captain Reinnie, of the Victor, with the following summons to the Batavian commander:— 1799.

*Isis, under sail, in line of battle,
August 30.*

"SIR,

"I desire you will instantly hoist the flag of his serene highness, the Prince of Orange. If you do you will be immediately considered friends of the King of Great Britain, my most gracious sovereign; otherwise take the consequences.—Painful it will be to me for the loss of blood it will occasion, but the guilt will be on your own head.

"I have the honor to be, Sir,

"Your most obedient humble servant,

(Signed)

"ANDREW MITCHELL,

"Vice-admiral and commander-in-chief of his majesty's ships employed on the present occasion."

To Rear-admiral Storey, or the commander-in-chief of the Dutch squadron.

An hour was allowed, but in less than that time the following answer was returned, the sailors on board the Dutch fleet having mutinied, in consequence (as supposed) of the proclamation of the Prince of Orange and the successful exertions of his adherents:

On board the Washington, anchored under the Vleiter, Aug. 30.

"ADMIRAL,

"Neither your superiority, nor the threat that the spilling of human blood could be laid to my account, could prevent my showing to you, to the last moment, what I could do for my sovereign, whom I acknowledge to be no other than the Batavian people and its representatives, when your prince's and the Orange flags have obtained their end. The traitors whom I commanded refused to fight, and nothing remains to me and my brave officers but vain rage, and the dreadful reflection of our present situation. I therefore deliver over to you the fleet which I commanded. From this moment it is your obligation to provide for the safety of my officers and the few brave men who are on board the Batavian ships, as I declare myself and my officers prisoners of war, and remain to be considered as such.

"I am, with respect,

"S. STOREY."

To Admiral Mitchell, commanding his Britannic majesty's squadron in the Texel.

Thus one ship of 74 guns, four of 68, two of 54, two of 44, a frigate, and a sloop of war, were surrendered by Rear-admiral Storey.

No sooner were the intentions of England known, than the executive power published a proclamation to the "Batavian people;" in which, after intimating that this was the moment in which they ought to render themselves "worthy of their ancestors," it was stated, "that the safety of the state imperiously required all those to be treated as foes who, by their speech or conduct, should appear to approve of enterprises directed against the commonwealth."

The French government, now alarmed at recent events, transmitted a letter, in which it was observed, "that the republic, so far from ceasing to respect the independence of its first ally, was resolved to defend it against all attacks, and by every means in its power."—"Receive, citizens, directors," added Sieyes, then president, "this solemn assurance, and transmit it to your fellow-citizens. They know how to distinguish the sincere, the constant ally, whom policy, as well as liberty, attaches to the success of Batavia, from the jealous nation, from the inimical government, which, wishing to usurp the commerce of the universe, and fearing the efforts of the industrious Dutchman, endeavors to reduce Holland once more under its dependence, by destroying the association to which she is indebted for her prosperity, and entailing upon her all the calamities and opprobrium of slavery."

Great consternation prevailed throughout all the United Provinces in consequence of the surrender of the fleet. The president of the directory repaired to the legislative assembly, and made a speech upon this occasion, in which he expressed his indignation at "so infamous a treason."—"Have the Batavian people," he exclaimed, "so long cherished those monsters in order that they should at last be betrayed in so base a manner! May the enemy always receive such vile wretches, whom we do not acknowledge, either as Dutchmen or as fellow-citizens! May the punishment of the crime fall upon the heads of those who were the authors of it! Revenge will assuredly overtake them in due time. Meanwhile, my fellow-citizens, deeply as it may be felt by every patriotic heart, it ought not to render us dejected. We know the duties which we owe the country and the people; these we will fulfil; and sooner shall the land of our forefathers, and the soil on which we stand, be converted into a heap of ruins, than the enemy triumph over our firmness. The Batavian soldiers, united with our French brethren, at this moment fighting for the defence of their country's liberties, will soon prove that generous valor boils in their veins. On these our expectations rest."

General Brune now published the following ridiculous address, which was immediately circulated in the Dutch and French languages:

"Magistrates of the Batavian republic, behold the shades of Van Tromp, De Witt, De Ruyter, and Barneveld, burst through their sacred tombs, that you may be animated by their spirit, and denounce death against those who are traitors to their country! Be on your guard respecting the emigrants; oppose yourselves to the impious Orange faction; unite with the people, and overwhelm the English!"

While the Dutch and French were thus exerting themselves to make an obstinate defence, the British flag was flying in the Texel, and the colors of the Prince of Orange were displayed from the steeple of the Helder, and the squadrons in the Nieuvo and Mars Diep.

General Abercromby, who had hitherto occupied the sand-hills, advanced, on the 1st of September, and assumed a position, with the right to Petten, on the German Ocean, and the left to the Oude Sluys, on the Zuyder Zee. By this evolution a more fertile country was open to the English, who consequently obtained plenty of fresh provisions, while the canal of Zuype, immediately in front, contributed greatly to strengthen their position.

While General Abercromby was waiting for reinforcements, General Brune, who had collected a large body of forces, marched by Haerlem to Alkmaar, in three columns, at which place he arrived September 2. That on the right, composed of Dutch troops, led by General Daendels, directed its attack on the village of St. Martin; the centre, commanded by General Demonceau, marched against Krabbendam and Zuyper Sluys; while the left, which was the only one composed of French, commenced its operations against the position occupied by the second brigade of guards. These operations took place on the 10th, by the dawn of day, when they were every where repulsed, "owing," said the British commander, in his dispatches, "to the strength of our position, and the determined courage of the troops." About ten o'clock the enemy was obliged to retire towards Alkmaar, leaving behind many of their dead and wounded, besides one piece of cannon, a number of waggons, pontoons, and portable bridges.

Although two of the enemy's detachments had penetrated, upon this occasion, within a few yards of the positions occupied by the British troops, they experienced a degree of resistance that reflected great honor on the army. Major-general Moore, who commanded on the right, and received a slight wound during the action, exhibited equal spirit and judgment: Colonel Spencer also defended the village of St. Martin with great gallantry; while Lieutenant-colonel Smyth, who commanded two battalions of the 20th, stationed near Krabbendam and Zuyper Sluys, evinced a degree of fortitude worthy of record. Perceiving that the enemy was likely to obtain possession of his post, notwithstanding the blood was flowing in a copious stream, in consequence of a severe wound in his leg, he ordered his attendants to support him, and, in this position, intreated the regiment "to remember Minden." His soldiers, ignorant of the allusion, but at the same time charmed with the undaunted resolution of their commander, received the proposition with three cheers, and immediately charging with the bayonet, completed the rout of the foe.

On the day of this engagement the Duke of York sailed from Yarmouth with the second division, being soon followed by most part of the Russians under Generals Herman and Tchertchekoff. The hereditary Prince of Orange had, during these transactions, made a feeble attack on the frontier of the province of Overijssel, summoning the fortress of that name, but his small army was hastily dispersed on the approach of the national guards of Arnheim and Oldenrad; he then embarked at Embden, to join the commander-in-chief.

On the arrival of the Duke of York at the Helder, he had the satisfaction to witness the landing of eight battalions of Russians, consisting of 7000 men, under General Herman: he also found the hereditary prince collecting and forming the deserters from the Batavian troops, as well as volunteers from the Dutch ships, into regular battalions.

When his royal highness had reached the headquarters at Schagen-Brug, the army appeared to be in high spirits. Being determined to embrace the first opportunity of making an attack upon the whole of the enemy's positions, the British field-marshal issued orders for that purpose the moment the reinforcements had arrived. After the necessary arrangements, the allied army moved forward in four columns, about two hours before day, September 19, through a country which, in every direction, presented the most formidable obstacles, being cut and intersected with wet ditches and deep canals, while the bridges were all removed, and the roads either rendered impassable, or obstructed by felled trees half interred in the earth, and placed in a horizontal position. The enemy was strongly posted on the heights of Camper Duyn, Walmenhuysen, Schorledan, and along the high sand-hills which extend from the sea, in front of Petten, to the town of Bergen; while several of the intermediate villages were strengthened by means of intrenchments. The column under General Herman commenced an attack about three o'clock in the morning, and, by eight, obtained possession of Bergen; but the Russians, by rashly advancing too far, were in danger of being surrounded; and General Van Damme, at the point of the bayonet, recovered the village of Bergen, having obliged the late captors to evacuate it, after a most vigorous resistance, in the course of which General Herman was taken prisoner, and General Tchertchekoff was dangerously wounded.

His royal highness the commander-in-chief expressed himself in the following manner, relative to this event:

"The Russian troops, advancing with an intrepidity which overlooked the formidable resistance with which they were to meet, had not preserved that order which was necessary to preserve the advantages they had gained; and they were, in consequence, after a most vigorous resistance, obliged to retire from Bergen, and fall back upon Schorel, which village they were also forced to abandon, but which was immediately retaken by Major-general Manners' brigade, notwithstanding the very heavy fire of the enemy.

"Here this brigade was immediately reinforced by two battalions of Russians, which had co-operated with Lieutenant-General Dundas, in the attack of Walmenhuysen, by Major-general D'Oyley's brigade of guards, and by the 35th regiment, under the command of his highness Prince William. The action was renewed by these troops, for a considerable time, with success; but the entire want of ammunition, on the part of the Russians, and the exhausted state of the whole corps engaged in that particular situation, obliged them to retire, which they did in good order, upon Petten and Zuyper Sluys."

It is understood that this candid statement gave great offence to the monarch who then swayed the Russian sceptre; and a feeble attempt was made at recrimination, by stating that the troops had been brought into the field immediately on being landed from the transports, and before they had recovered from sea-sickness, &c.

Some writers have declared, that General Herman's troops were not supported by the commander-in-chief as they had reason to expect, and that they were consequently destroyed, and not defeated. This assertion has never been proved; and, from his royal highness's statement, it is evident that this detachment was more valiant than wary. Its failure decided the fate of the action; for, although Lieutenant-general Dundas succeeded in his attack on the village of Walmenhuysen, while Sir James Pulteney carried Ouds Carspel, at the head of the Lange Dyke, by storm, and Sir Ralph Abercromby had captured Hoorne nearly at the same time, yet the troops, thus victorious on every other point, were recalled, the army being under the necessity, in consequence of one partial failure, of resuming its former position. The capture of sixty officers, upwards of 3000 men, and sixteen pieces of artillery, the last of which were destroyed, on account of the intricate nature of the country, afforded some consolation for this unpropitious event.

After this expedition had been deferred some time, it was determined to resume offensive operations; for which purpose the army was once more put in motion, and an attack took place on the whole of the enemy's line. The troops were again divided into four columns, under the Generals Abercromby, Essen, Dundas, and Pulteney; and the plan was combined in such a manner as to enable the principal corps to communicate with each other by means of intermediate detachments; but the chief effort was directed against the enemy's left, consisting entirely of French, with an intention of procuring the total evacuation of North Holland. After an obstinate engagement, which commenced at six o'clock in the morning, October 2, and lasted during the space of twelve hours, the Gallo-Batavian forces, estimated at about 20,000, and commanded by the Generals Brune, Van Damme, Boutet, and Daendels, the last of whom was slightly wounded upon this occasion, were obliged to give way. The Russians conducted themselves with their accustomed spirit; and, though all the British troops fought with their wonted valor, yet those led by the Lieutenant-generals Sir Ralph Abercromby and Dundas sustained the brunt of the action; the former having advanced against Egmont-op-Zee, to turn the enemy's left flank, while the latter marched straight to Bergen.

On the succeeding morning the result of this attack was visible; for the enemy during the night had evacuated the strong positions on the Lange Dyke and the Koe Dyke, as well as the extensive range of elevated sand-hills. On the 4th of October, the allies took possession of Egmont-op-Hoof, Egmont-op-Zee, and Bergen. The town of Alkmaar, the head-quarters of the French general, and the seat of the states of North Holland, opened its gates, while a number of troops deserted to the standard erected by the Prince of Orange; but it is painful to add, that, in express disobedience to the orders of the commander-in-chief, many of the inhabitants were plundered.

On the 6th of October, the Duke of York, anxious to improve these advantages, and afford no repose to the enemy, renewed the attack, for the purpose of driving him from Beverwyck and Wick-op-Zee. The advanced posts were accordingly pushed forward, and the villages of Schermerhoorn, Acher-sloop, and Limmen, occupied without resistance by the British; but the column of Russian troops, under Major-general Essen, in attempting to gain a height near Bacum, was attacked by a strong body of the enemy. Sir Ralph Abercromby having advanced to its support, found himself opposed by General Brune's whole force; on which a general action ensued, which only terminated with the day.

Both sides fought with desperate valor, and the Anglo-Russians remained masters of the field: still the engagement proved indecisive in point of complete success, for the enemy was not driven from his position between Beverwyck and Wick-op-Zee. This last conflict was as severe as any of the former; and, in proportion to the numbers engaged, attended with as great loss. Of the British 1200 were killed, wounded, or taken; of the Russians, about 700. The enemy's loss was also very great in killed and wounded, though never ascertained, as it was never acknowledged: 500 were made prisoners. From these the Duke of York obtained information of the enemy's having been reinforced by 6000 infantry, and of his having strengthened the position of Beverwick, and strongly fortified, in the rear of it, points which it would be necessary to carry, before Haerlem could be attacked. The enemy had also a large force upon Purmirind, which, as the allied army advanced, would be placed in the rear.

These obstacles would have been overcome, had not the state of the weather, the ruined condition of the roads, and the total want of the necessary supplies, presented difficulties which required serious consideration. The Duke of York, therefore, having maturely weighed the circumstances under which his army was placed, thought it advisable, with the concurrence of General Abercromby and the lieutenant-generals, to withdraw the troops from this advanced position to their former station at Schagen-Brug, from whence, on the 9th of October, his royal highness dispatched his secretary, Colonel Brownrigg, to London, in order to give a circumstantial account of affairs in Holland, and to receive his majesty's further instructions.

In the mean time, the enemy had crossed the British line of defence at Schagen-Brug, by daily, though partial attacks, the most serious of which was made by General Daendels in person. This general, on the 10th, attacked the right wing of the British forces, upon an advanced post near Winkle, under the command of Prince William of Gloucester, with 6000 men and six pieces of cannon, endeavouring to force this post by every exertion. To resist this formidable attack, the prince had only 1200 men and two pieces of cannon; yet he obliged the Dutch general to retreat, with the loss of 200 men killed, and one French general. But General Daendels being almost immediately reinforced by 4000 Dutch troops, the Prince of Gloucester was under the necessity of falling back to Cohorn. The loss of the English in this action did not exceed three killed, and about twelve wounded. The prince, during the engagement, had his horse shot under him, but he received no injury himself, though exposed to the greatest personal danger, under a heavy fire, being frequently in front of the line, animating the exertions of his troops by his example. It is probable that it was in this action, which has been entirely omitted by former historians, that Daendels was wounded. These writers, it is remarkable, have dwelt only upon the losses sustained, and not the advantages which were gained by the British commander-in-chief. On the other hand, the government scribblers betrayed equal folly and partiality: one of them, mentioning this expedition, thus wrote: "To an enemy of 45,000 men, full of emulation, from the general to the last soldier; to a squadron commanding the Zuyder-Zee; to the support which there are hopes of obtaining from a great portion of the inhabitants, and to the ancient and unalterable attachment of the Dutch regular troops to the Stadtholder, what do the Batavian directory, the revolutionary faction, and their extravagant guardians on the banks of the Seine, oppose? About 20,000 French, commanded by a printer's boy of Limosin—by that Brune who juggled and pillaged Switzerland, who received his military and political education in the tennis-courts of the French revolution." It is true, Brune was a printer; but candor, which should always guide the historian's pen, must allow, that the printer (no matter where he received his military skill) was a match for a PRINCE. The Dutch general, Daendels, over whom Prince William triumphed, was an attorney.

Prudence dictated a return to England, to the great regret of the allied troops, who were unacquainted with the obstacles that opposed their career. As they could not be embarked in the face of a superior army, without considerable loss, the commander-in-chief, in conjunction with the vice-admiral, entered into a negotiation with General Brune, in consequence of which, after a variety of discussions, an armistice was at length agreed upon. The articles, nine in number, were signed October 18, by Major-general Knox, duly authorised by his royal highness the Duke of York, and General Rostollan, duly authorised by Gen. Brune. On this occasion it was stipulated, that the combined English and Russian army should evacuate the territories of the Batavian republic by a certain period, (November 30); that the Dutch admiral, de Winter, should be considered as exchanged; that the mounted batteries at the Helder should be restored in their present state; that "eight thousand prisoners of war, French and Batavians, taken before the present campaign, and now detained in England, should be restored, without condition, to their respective countries;" and finally, that Major-general Knox should remain with the French, to guarantee the execution of this article.

These terms, although justified by the critical situation of the troops, were doubtless humiliating; but the proposition of restoring the Batavian fleet, surrendered by Admiral Storey, was received with just indignation by the Duke of York, his royal highness having threatened to cut the sea-dykes, and inundate the whole country, if this point should be any further urged.

Thus terminated an expedition which threatened the total subversion of the Batavian government, and from which so many important advantages were anticipated; but its failure may, in a great measure, be ascribed to the publicity that attended the preparations. The Duke of York said, "that he had, from day to day, additional reason to apprehend that any attempt towards a prosecution of the campaign in Holland could not be attended with decisive advantages," &c.: he declared his conviction "that the most advisable measure to pursue was, to remove with the army to England, resting confident that he shall have the satisfaction of knowing that his conduct, in not waiting for previous instructions from home, has met with his majesty's gracious approbation."

Though unfortunate in this instance, the British arms were peculiarly successful in another quarter. In the east, England not only obtained a considerable accession of strength, and a large extent of dominions, but she at the same time added greatly to her security by the extinction of a powerful rival.

Hyder Ali, a soldier of fortune, after rising from the ranks to a high station in the army of one of the native princes, by a bold and successful usurpation, acquired the sceptre of the Mysore, and founded a new dynasty. Possessed of most of the great qualities befitting an able general and an enlightened sovereign, his treachery to his prince inspired but a transitory horror in a country where power alone is supposed to constitute right; and the able manner in which he governed his newly-acquired dominions, seemed a sufficient apology for the means by which he had attained them. At his death, his son and successor, Tippoo, who assumed the appellation of sultaun, or emperor, found himself in possession of extensive territories, a full treasury, and an army which had dared, more than once, to contend even with the English, by far the most powerful European nation settled in Asia. Though his father's success originated in his natural genius alone, Tippoo is said not only to have received the best education that could be obtained in the East, but also to have imbibed a tincture of the arts and sciences of Europe.

Two great principles of action seem to have influenced the life and fortune of the King of Mysore; the first was a flaming zeal, bordering on fanaticism, for the religion of Mahomet; the second an invincible hatred to the English, whom he affected to denominate polytheists, and considered as a mercenary band of commercial spoilers, who, by uniting intrigue with trade and the profession of arms, had obtained an alarming preponderance in the East. Tippoo, however, found his rage unavailing; for his dominions were invaded, his capital besieged, his sons taken as hostages, and a partition-treaty executed by his enemies under the walls of his own palace, in consequence of the plans of the East India Company, and the exertions of its servants.

Deprived of part of his treasures, stripped of a large portion of his territories, humbled, but not subdued, the Mysorean prince determined on revenge. Not content with augmenting his army, and collecting able officers from all parts, he intrigued, by means of his ministers, in most of the neighbouring courts, and solicited, by turns, every Mahometan power in Asia to enter into a holy war for the extirpation of the enemies of all true believers. Nor was he inattentive to the affairs of Europe; for he courted the friendship of the republic of France with the same assiduity as he had formerly sought that of the monarch, Louis XVI. But the French revolution, which at one period seemed auspicious to the views of the sultaun, proved, at this time, fatal to his hopes; as the conquest of Egypt, although it denoted the approach of a victorious ally, was the signal for his destruction.

The dissimulation of the sultaun was carried to an extraordinary length, but his intrigues against the English became at last notorious. The governor-general, Lord Mornington, disdaining to wear the mask of friendship, wrote to him in a style of great displeasure. "In no age or country," remarked his lordship, "were the baneful and insidious arts of intrigue ever cultivated with such success as they are at present by the French nation. I sincerely wish that no impression had been produced on your discerning mind by that dangerous people; but my situation enables me to know that they have reached your presence, and have endeavoured to pervert the wisdom of your councils, and to instigate you to war against those who have given you no provocation." The governor-general concluded this judicious letter with informing the sultaun "that the peshwa and the nizam concurred with him in the observations now offered and recommended to his most serious consideration; and he proposed, in their behalf and his own, to send Major Doveton (an officer well known to the sultaun) to explain more fully and particularly the means of removing all existing distrust and suspicion, and of establishing peace and a good understanding on the most durable foundations."

No answer arriving from the sultaun for more than a month, Lord Mornington addressed a second letter, urging the necessity of taking the contents of his former one into the earliest consideration. Five days after the second letter, a dispatch from the sultaun reached Calcutta, filled with the most treacherous professions of attachment, and complaints of the military preparations by the English; and, after another long interval, an answer was received by Lord Mornington to his two letters, in which this faithless prince congratulated the governor-general on the glorious victory of Aboukir, and expressed his firm hope "that the English, who ever adhere to the paths of sincerity, friendship, and good faith, and are the well-wishers of mankind, will at all times be successful and victorious; and that the French, who are of a crooked disposition, faithless, and the enemies of mankind, may be depressed and ruined." He positively denied that any secret correspondence had ever been carried on between him and the French, and expressed his surprise at the military preparations avowedly made by the governor-general; but declined to receive Major Doveton, declaring, "that no means more effectual than the engagements already entered into, could be adopted for giving stability to the foundations of friendship and harmony."

Lord Mornington returned an immediate reply to the sultaun, January 9, 1799, informing him, in very explicit terms, of the accurate advices which he had received, of his secret transactions with the French, and of his flagrant violations of the subsisting treaties. "Even under all these circumstances of provocation," said his lordship, with laudable moderation, "we are ready to renew and confirm the bonds of amity on such conditions as shall preclude the continuance of those jealousies which must subsist so long as a final and satisfactory adjustment of all the causes of suspicion shall be delayed." He then called upon the sultaun to assent to the immediate admission of Major Doveton, as a measure advantageous to all parties.

After waiting, with exemplary patience, twenty-five days for an answer, the governor-general at length, on the 3d of February, ordered the army to begin its march towards the Mysorean territory. The reply of Tippoo Sultaun was received at Madras, February 13. After the usual professions of attachment, he declared himself (but in cold and distant terms) willing to admit Major Doveton's embassy, but desired that he might come unattended.

On the 22d of February, the governor-general published a declaration, very ably re-capitulating the reasons which compelled him to engage in hostilities with the Sultaun of Mysore. It stated, "that the governor-general waited with the utmost solicitude for an answer to the reasonable and distinct proposition contained in his letter of the 9th of January; that the sultaun, however, remained silent, although apprised that dangerous consequences would result from delay. In the mean while, the season for military operations had already advanced to so late a period, as to render a speedy decision indispensable to the security of the allies. It must be evident to all the states of India, that the answer of the sultaun has been deferred to this late period of the season, with no other view than to preclude the allies from the benefit of those advantages which their combined military operations would enable them to secure. The allies are therefore resolved to place their army in such a position as shall afford adequate protection against any artifice or insincerity, and shall preclude the return of that danger which has so lately menaced their possessions. Retaining, however, an anxious desire to effect an adjustment with Tippoo Sultaun, Lieutenant-general Harris, commander-in-chief of his majesty's and the honorable company's forces on the coasts of Coromandel and Malabar, is authorized to receive any embassy which Tippoo Sultaun may dispatch to the head-quarters of the British army, and to concert a treaty on such conditions as appear to the allies to be indispensably necessary for the establishment of a secure and permanent peace."

A very fine and well-appointed army was now, through the indefatigable exertions of the governor-general, seconded by the efforts of the civil and military departments, not only formed, but put in motion. This army was commanded by officers of great courage, skill, and experience; and, being in a short time joined by the troops of the nizam, they marched forward in full confidence of success. But, while General Harris approached the eastern frontier of Mysore, the sultaun had himself commenced hostilities on the western side, by the attack (March 6) of General Stuart, who commanded the Bombay army, while yet in the territory of the peshwa, and encamped on the high mountain of Sedaseer. Upon this occasion the sultaun received a severe repulse; and, on being informed that General Harris, with the grand army, had entered Mysore, he forthwith returned to the defence of his own country.

By this time the allies had penetrated as far as Bangalore. On the 23d, as the British commander approached Sultaun-pettah, a cloud of dust to the westward announced the vicinity of the Mysorean army; retiring, as the allies marched forward, the enemy attained, on the 27th, the heights of Malavelly, from which they were, on the same day, driven with considerable loss. On the 3d of April, the army came within sight of the lofty towers of Seringapatam, having hitherto experienced, to the general surprise, a resistance altogether trivial. By reports from the sultaun's camp, it was understood that he was extremely dejected and undetermined; and that his plans of defence had been as suddenly abandoned as they were hastily formed. On the 5th, the British army encamped at the distance of 3500 yards from the western fort of the city, which was soon after completely invested. Till this period the sultaun had shown no disposition to submit to terms; still, in all probability, cherishing the delusive hope that powerful succours from France would arrive in time to rescue him from this humiliation.

On the 9th of April, being apparently alarmed at his situation, Tippoo Sultaun had the effrontery to write, in the following terms, to the commander, General Harris:—"The governor-general, Lord Mornington, sent me a letter, the copy of which is inclosed—you will understand it. I have adhered firmly to treaties: what, then, is the meaning of the advance of the English army, and the occurrence of hostilities? Inform me." In reply, the sultaun was properly referred to the previous letters of Lord Mornington, and the declaration of war on the part of the allies.

On the 14th of April, the Bombay army, under General Stuart, crossed the Cavery, and took a strong position on its northern bank. That river, which separated the camp from the fort of Seringapatam, was at this time almost dry, and its bed a naked rock. The armies of the allies having now formed a complete junction, and the enemy's advanced works beyond the river being taken, the sultaun made another attempt to arrest the progress of the siege by negotiation, and wrote a second letter to General Harris, desiring him to nominate commissioners, and open a conference for peace. In answer to this overture were sent the preliminary articles of the only peace that would now be granted him. These were, to cede half his territories in perpetuity to the allies; to pay two crores of rupees by way of indemnification for the expences of the war; to renounce all connection with France; to receive ambassadors from the allies; and give hostages for the performance of these stipulations. Such were the severe terms which the perverse obstinacy of the sultaun had now made it necessary for him to accept, or by the refusal to risk his life and crown. For some days he maintained a sullen silence; but, a vigorous sally of the garrison on General Stuart being repulsed, and the guns of two towers on the western side dismounted, the unfortunate sultaun, on the 28th, made another and last effort to retard the operations of the siege, by declaring, in reply to the notification of General Harris, "that he wished to send ambassadors to open a conference for peace.—The points in question," said he, "are mighty, and cannot be brought to a conclusion without the intervention of ambassadors. I am, therefore, about to send two gentlemen, who will personally explain themselves to you."

He was immediately informed, that no ambassadors would be now received, unless he sent a part, at least, of the specie demanded, and the hostages required for his sincerity. The sultaun, reduced to despair by this answer, seemed determined to bury himself under the ruins of his capital; and, as if to shut every avenue to future negotiation, he barbarously ordered the prisoners he had taken to be put to death; a circumstance not mentioned in General Harris's public dispatches. The fire of the batteries, which began to batter in breach on the 30th of April, had, on the evening of the 3d of May, so much shattered the walls, that a general assault was deemed practicable. The troops were accordingly (early in the morning of the 4th) stationed in the trenches, that no extraordinary movement might occasion alarm; and, in order to take the enemy by surprise, it was determined to make the attempt in the heat of the day, the season of indolence and repose. At one o'clock, the troops under General Baird moved from the trenches, and, crossing the rocky bed of the Cavery, under a heavy fire from the stupendous works which defended this great and magnificent capital, passed the glacis and the fossé; then ascended the breaches with the most heroic gallantry, surmounting every obstacle which the valor of the enemy could oppose to their progress. In a short time all was confusion and consternation, and the British colours were displayed on the summit of the breach. Resistance continued, however, to be made from the palace of Tippoo for some time after all firing had ceased from the works: two of his sons were there, who, on assurance of safety, at length surrendered. It was at the same time reported that Tippoo Sultaun was slain. The most active measures were immediately adopted to put an end to the horrors of the assault, and diligent search was made for the body of the sultaun, which was with difficulty found, encompassed and almost covered with heaps of dead: it was conveyed to the palace, and, being recognized by the family, was the next day interred, with the honors due to his rank, in the mausoleum of his father.

Thus, after a short but brilliant career, fell the house or dynasty of the celebrated Hyder Ali Khan. On the ensuing day, Kerim Saheb, the brother of the late sultaun; Abdul Khalic, the elder of the princes formerly hostages with Lord Cornwallis; and, in a short time, the remainder of the family of Tippoo, surrendered themselves, and demanded protection. The dominions of the sultaun were disposed of in conformity to an arrangement soon after concluded upon by the conquerors. To the company were allotted the province of Canara; the districts of Coimbatore and Daraporam, with an extensive district extending along the Malabar coast, including Mangalore; also the fortress, city, and island of Seringapatam: to the nizam was assigned a large tract of country contiguous to his own dominions: and to the Mahrattas, who had taken no active part in the war, were, by a liberal policy, given Soonda, Harponelly, and a portion of Bidenore: the fortresses belonging to the latter were, however, retained in the hands of the English, and a strong barrier opposed to the future incursions of that powerful and warlike people, extending from the eastern to the western Ghauts.

On a careful investigation it was found that the surviving representative of the ancient royal Hindoo family of Mysore, expelled by the high fortune of Hyder Ali from the throne, was a boy of five years of age. To him it was deemed both just and politic to restore the kingdom of Mysore, which was, by the late partition, comprised nearly within the same limits by which it was bounded previous to the usurpation of Hyder; and by an article of the treaty of Mysore, the dependency of that kingdom upon the British government was formally recognised, and the right of British interference distinctly acknowledged. Thus the interests of the infant Rajah Kishennai Wuddiar, were said to be identified with those of Great Britain; and, at all events, such interference were better exercised openly and avowedly than in the way of clandestine and unauthorized coercion. The family of Tippoo Sultaun were, in a short time, removed to Vellore, in the Carnatic, and an annual revenue, amounting to about 600,000 rupees, was allowed for their future maintenance.

In another hemisphere, the British arms were equally successful, and a flourishing settlement was wrested from the hands of the Dutch. A body of troops having been collected in the islands of Grenada, St. Lucie, and Martinico, by Lieutenant-general Trigge, were embarked soon after on board a small squadron, consisting of two line-of-battle ships and five frigates, under the command of Vice-admiral Lord Hugh Seymour. On their arrival off the mouth of the river Surinam, August 20, Governor Frederici was summoned to surrender that colony; but, as he had requested forty-eight hours to consider the proposal, measures were taken to force him to an immediate compliance. Accordingly, the depth of water not being sufficient for the line-of-battle ships, the troops were removed into the small craft; and these, with four frigates, having anchored two miles further up, a detachment landed and took possession of the redoubts and battery at Bram's-point, which had been previously abandoned. At length, the capitulation being signed and ratified, the armament proceeded to New Amsterdam, which was occupied immediately; and, in the course of two days more, the tower of Paramaribo and the neighbouring forts were garrisoned by the troops. Thus a flourishing and extensive settlement was obtained, by Great Britain, without firing a single gun; but the colonists reaped nearly all the advantages arising from this event; for, while the English government was at the expense of their protection, they found a good market, and a ready conveyance for those commodities which would otherwise have remained in their possession.

The commercial relations of France, in reference to other countries, and even its own colonies, were become very difficult, owing to the superior naval force of Great Britain. The directory sent out General Hedouville to be governor of St. Domingo, soon after it was evacuated by the English; but this island still evinced indications of a spirit of independence, in order to the re-establishment of that authority which justly belonged to the parent country. The general finding, on his arrival, that all the genuine powers of government were vested in Toussant, very soon returned to France, having made some fruitless attempts to induce the people to rally round the constitutional act. When he departed, Toussant immediately sent his own aid-de-camp with dispatches for the directory, criminating Hedouville, maintaining his own attachment to France, and hoping that St. Domingo, "delivered from the dangers to which it had been exposed, would continue its progress under the protection of constitutional laws, and the auspices of that liberty which it had obtained." This native chief (who has been mentioned in a former book) succeeded in a wonderful degree in tranquillizing the island; but General Regaud, another native chief, whose influence in the southern departments was very great, and whose name has already appeared in this work, strongly opposed Toussant, when some bloody engagements took place between them, which having proved detrimental to Regaud, an order was received from the directory, making choice of the other as governor of St. Domingo, which immediately restored the peace of the island.

During this year, the British navy continued to display its wonted zeal and superiority; the names of St. Vincent, Nelson, Smith, and Mitchell, having made the English flag respected in Syria, Egypt, the Mediterranean, on the coasts of Spain, and in the ports and shallow seas of Holland. Notwithstanding the fleets of the two allied powers appeared at one time fearless of a contest, yet it was deemed more prudent to return to port, and be exposed to the mortification of a blockade, than to experience the vengeance of so formidable an adversary. Few actions, therefore, between single ships, remain to be recorded in the naval occurrences of this campaign.

On the 28th of February, an action was fought by Captain Edward Cooke, in the Sybille of 44 guns, off the sand-heads of Bengal river, against La Forte, of 50 guns. After a close and spirited engagement, of near two hours duration, at the conclusion of which the republican ship had lost all her masts, she struck her colors, and was immediately taken possession of; but it is greatly to be lamented, that the gallant English commander received a mortal wound during the fight, and survived his victory but a few days.

Another action was declared by Admiral Earl St. Vincent (a consummate judge of this species of merit) to be "equal to any enterprise recorded in the naval history of Great Britain." Captain Peard, of the Success, during a cruise in the Mediterranean, happened to chase a Spanish polacca into the harbour of La Selva; and, as there was no appearance of any batteries, it was determined to cut her out. He accordingly sent in his ship's boats for this purpose, under the command of Lieutenant Facey, who was in the barge, assisted by Lieutenant Stupart in the launch, and Lieutenant Davison, of the marines, in the cutter. On their arrival, June 9, they immediately attacked the enemy, which proved to be an armed vessel, called the Bella Aurora, mounting ten carriage guns, and having 113 men; surrounded by a netting, and supported by a small battery and a large body of musketry on the shore. Notwithstanding these formidable means of defence, the engagement commenced, in the face of day, on the part of only forty-two men, who, after entering the prize sword in hand, carried her out in triumph.

In the course of this year, five sail of the line, one ship of fifty-two guns, one of forty-two, and another of forty, were taken from the French, and two of thirty-six from the Spaniards, besides many vessels of inferior force, no less than twenty frigates, corvettes, and luggers, belonging to France, and ten to Spain, being either taken or run on shore; but not so much as a single frigate or sloop of war was lost by the English.

Le Généreux, of seventy-four guns, and La Ville de Marseilles, were captured, with Admiral Perée, by Rear-admiral Lord Nelson's squadron, in the Mediterranean. Le Guillaume Tell, Le Athenienne, and Le Dego, all of sixty-four guns, were taken at Malta; also La Vengeance, of fifty-two, by La Seine of forty-two, Capt. Milne, after a gallant action in the Mona passage.

The Dutch navy was almost extinguished this year. In addition to the twelve ships surrendered by the gallant Storey, and an equal number, which surrendered within the Texel, the Batavian republic lost a fifty-gun ship, viz. Hertog Van Brunswick, in the straits of Sunda; and as the sailors were obviously disaffected to the new government, all further exertions by sea were wholly interdicted.

While twelve ships, belonging to the Emperor Paul co-operated with the British fleet in the German ocean, the Turco-Russian squadron, commanded by the Captain Bey, Cadir Bey, and Vice-admiral Oreschakoff, after conquering Cerigo, Zante, and Cephalonia, appeared before Corfu. Having landed a body of men on the little island, called Lo Scoglio di Vido, it was carried after a short resistance; on which an attack took place on the out-works of the adjoining town, and fort St. Salvador was captured by the allies. A flag of truce was then sent by the commanding officer of the French garrison at Corfu, to the Russian vice-admiral, with proposals for delivering up the place; in consequence of which the garrison was admitted to a capitulation, March 2. The Leander, of fifty guns, which had been captured by a French seventy-four, soon after the action of the Nile, (1798) and which happened to have anchored in the harbour of this place at the time of the surrender, was soon after, in a very handsome manner, restored by the Emperor of Russia to the service of Great Britain.

Domestic Situation of France.—The Directorial Revolution.—Another Revolution.—The Consular Government established, and Bonaparte created First Consul.—His Letter to the King of Great Britain.—A spirited Reply.—Declaration of the French Government.—Debates in Parliament.—Union of England and Ireland.

WE shall now call the reader's attention to the domestic situation of France, which, during the progress of summer, seemed to be approaching fast to some eventful crisis. In the latter part of the preceding book, the directorial revolution has been slightly mentioned; as the particulars have been reserved for the commencement of this.

It had long been the subject of profound meditation to subvert the directorial government; but no method had yet presented itself which could be pronounced free from desperate hazard. It must be observed, that the liberty of the press had been placed under the special protection of the directory, in conformity to a law of the 19th Fructidor. The council of five hundred ventured at last to declare, that under this pretext many egregious abuses had been perpetrated, by the agents of those who were in power, and who from this security set denunciation at defiance. A message was sent to the directory on the motion of Boulay de la Meurthe, who had once been its zealous advocate, implying that the council fully expected such information as the constitution prescribed, at this critical and alarming juncture. An address to the nation at large was published at the same time, on the motion of Français de Nantes, which was considered in the light of an appeal to the country against the despotism and usurpation of the executive power. The directory were not blind to the approaching storm. The current of public opinion ran strongly against them; and their own destruction would probably have been accelerated by any fresh acts of violence against the councils. Sieyès was regarded as the head of the opposition, the vengeance of which was chiefly levelled against the directors Merlin, Lepeaux, and Treillard; for Barras, considering it more prudent to second the views of Sieyès, had already come to a good understanding with the leaders of the opposition, who likewise carried on a secret and confidential intercourse with the chiefs of the military force in and near the metropolis.

As the council had received no reply to their message on the 15th of June, 1799, it declared itself permanent, and nominated a commission of eleven members, to which it imparted very extraordinary powers. As the director Treillard was a man of a mild and pacific disposition, both unqualified and unwilling to take part in those scenes which appeared to be fast approaching, a pretext was devised for removing him from the office of a director, which he embraced with eagerness, and resigned his office, which was filled by Gohier, president of the tribunal of revision; and the council had now a majority even in the directory itself.

An act of accusation against Merlin and Lepeaux, the two refractory directors, was next proposed; but previous to the adoption of this measure, they were invited by the council to give in their resignation. This plan was adopted after some acrimonious language, and they left the palace of the Luxemburg amidst the curses of the people. Two persons, at once obscure and insignificant, were chosen in their room, viz. Roger Ducos, and Moulin, who, it was imagined, would neither dispute nor oppose the will of Sieyès, as might have been the case with men of more talents and consequence. Français de Nantes presented a report from the committee of eleven, in which was delineated in glowing colors the late directorial government, many of whose vile instruments were denounced, in a particular manner Scherer, who had fled from the just vengeance of the law and of the people. General Bernadotte succeeded him as war-minister, and Scherer, as the reader has been already informed, was promoted to the command of the Italian army.

The council received a message from the new directory on the 26th of June, giving a circumstantial account of the disorders and exigencies of the state, and inviting the council to adopt the speediest and most efficacious measures for warding off from the body-politic its impending dissolution. A levy of conscripts was decreed in consequence of this message, with a coercive loan of one hundred millions. An address to the nation was likewise published, in which they were invited to co-operate with their representatives, in the necessary, but difficult labor, of political regeneration. The restraints on the liberty of the press were considerably relaxed, in consequence of which, both jacobins and royalists attacked government with unlimited censure, of which the directory complained to the council, pronouncing it a conduct the direct tendency of which was to bring about the dissolution of the state; for the suppression of which grievance a commission was appointed.

Although the public voice was in favor of the proposition for accusing the four ex-directors, it was finally rejected. It was very plausibly insinuated, that if the first magistrates of the republic were to perish on a scaffold, the weight and dignity of government would be lost in the estimation of the country; faction would incessantly threaten their successors with a similar fate; and with such an example before them, it would not be possible to feel sufficient confidence for the execution of such bold and decisive measures as existing circumstances might often render necessary for the salvation of the republic. It was, however, a subject deeply lamented, that men should escape the punishment which their crimes unquestionably deserved, whether these were to be regarded as the result of treachery or of misconduct.

On the anniversary of the fall of that monster Robespierre, the jacobins had the audacity to hang their tribune with black, while it was justly celebrated by the constituted authorities, in the Champ de Mars, as a day of thanksgiving. Sieyes was at that time president of the directory; and in his public speech on this occasion, he drew a bold and animated picture of the horrid crimes of the chief actors in those dreadful scenes, which were so peculiarly characteristic of the reign of jacobins. When a message was soon after sent by the council to the directory, in which the jacobins were denounced, a report was sent to the council by Fouché, the minister of police, in which it was represented, that the societies of Paris and the departments were directed by foreign agents, who endeavoured to estrange the public mind by continual calumnies, and by openly violating the constitution.

The report of the minister was more completely developed in the speech delivered by the celebrated Abbé Sieyes, in the Champ de Mars, on the anniversary of the 10th of August, when he exhibited the members of those societies, in a strain of the most fervid eloquence, as "traitors subsidised by the common enemy, or slaves only to their passions, anxious either for the speedy restoration of royalty, or preferring rather the return of that terror so justly abhorred by the French." The favorite topic of discussion in the societies, was the necessity of saving the country, which was not capable of saving itself; but while they were thus debating, the directory opportunely passed a decree, in virtue of which their doors were immediately shut, seals were put upon all their papers, and a military guard was stationed before each place of meeting. Domiciliary visits were likewise permitted for a month, in order to rid the metropolis of those swarms of wretches who had poured into it from all the departments, for the purpose of sharing in the new revolution, which was to be accomplished by the instrumentality of these old and inveterate enemies.

Measures so bold, filled the faction against which they were levelled with astonishment and rage. Movements of a revolutionary nature were excited at Bourdeaux, Toulouse, and different other places, although they were instantly repelled by the interposition of the military. The leaders of the party, however, in the council of five hundred, exerted every nerve, in order to regain their former ascendancy. Matters being put in a state of preparation, the dangers to which the republic was exposed was strongly represented by General Jourdan. According to him, Italy was lost, Batavia invaded, and the frontiers of France itself threatened by the enemy. A vast royalist conspiracy, which was ready to burst forth, existed within. He urged to the council the necessity of continuing the sitting, and recommended the revival of the celebrated plan of Barrere, that the country should again be called on to rise in a mass, for the purpose of defending its liberty and independence. He concluded by moving, that the republic should be declared to be in danger.

Lucien Bonaparte strenuously opposed this motion, who recommended that the fullest and most entire confidence should be reposed in the directory, protesting against the schemes of permanence, federation, and other measures of a revolutionary nature, which had been suggested by Jourdan and his associates. "Great as the evils were which the nation suffered, and greater still as were those which it apprehended, constitutional remedies were at hand; and he deprecated the adoption of such measures as were calculated to lead insensibly to the commission or sufferance of crimes, the bare idea of which would make the assembly start back with horror." Jourdan's motion was at length negatived by a majority of 74, there being 171 for, and 245 against it.

A prodigious majority of the people of Paris, who justly relied on the talents and firmness of Sieyes, were highly pleased with this decision; but the deputies who voted against the motion of Jourdan, were insulted by an abandoned mob, who surrounded the hall of the assembly, and whom the military found it difficult to restrain from acts of outrage and violence.

The full force of her past and present evils was felt by the whole of France, and the necessity there existed of establishing a better order of things, had become extremely apparent. She stood in need of a government qualified to restore the political edifice, or rather construct it afresh, on a more solid and permanent basis. But the grand question was, by what interposition, almost miraculous, could this be accomplished? By what means more than human could confidence be restored, courage re-animated, evil discord healed, and authority confirmed, since it was now every where spurned at and despised?

In the preceding book it has been mentioned, that General Bonaparte, resolving to leave Egypt, deserted his army, and suddenly arrived in Paris. Of the circumstances attending his unexpected return, we shall at present treat; and the state of the deserted army shall be the subject of another chapter.

No sooner had Bonaparte entered Paris, than all the different factions were eager to strengthen themselves by obtaining his suffrage. Urged on by his own lofty and ambitious hopes, he determined, in this perplexing situation, to sever the gordian knot by his sword, and to take the most prodigious responsibility on himself, by seizing on the slackened reins of the state with a firm and daring hand.

The period of action was fixed for the 9th of November; and, in conformity to the plan which had been pre-concerted with Sieyes and a small number of confidential friends, the council of elders, with the exception of the jacobinical members, were summoned to meet early in the morning; when it was decreed, on the motion of Regnier, to remove the sittings of the legislative body to St. Cloud, with the execution of which General Bonaparte was charged, who had also the legislative guard placed under his orders. Having received official information of this appointment, he went immediately to the palace of the Thuilleries, attended by Generals Berthier and Lefevre, declaring to the council, "that the decree their wisdom had issued, the arms of himself, and the generals his associates, would carry into execution. We will have a republic founded on the right basis, on civil liberty and national representation.—I swear it in my own name, and in that of my fellow-soldiers."

The gates of the Thuilleries were shut at eleven o'clock, and guards placed at the chief posts in and about Paris. He next reviewed the troops in the courts and gardens of the palace, which had the appearance of a camp, and published a proclamation, addressed to the whole soldiery, inviting them to second him with their wonted courage, firmness, and energy. "In what state did I leave France? In what state have I found it? I left you peace, and I find war! I left you conquests, and the enemy are possessing your frontiers! I left you arsenals well supplied; you are without arms; robbery has been reduced to a system; the resources of the state are drained; and the soldiery is without the necessary means of defence.—Where are the hundred thousand comrades whom I left covered with laurels?"

The directory called an extraordinary meeting, when made acquainted with this unexpected sitting of the council of ancients. Gohier, then president, Moulins, and Barras, were at the palace of the Luxemburg; but Sieyes and Roger Ducos had previously gone to the Thuilleries. A message being sent to the military commandant of Paris, he appeared; and being desired to explain the cause of the tumult, he observed, that an irreversible decree had invested Bonaparte with the command of all the troops in Paris, which made himself nothing more than a subaltern; in consequence of which, they must apply to the general-in-chief for whatever information they required.

The adoption of violent measures first suggested itself to Gohier and Moulins, when a proposition was made to arrest Bonaparte in his own house; but it was soon found, that the guard had deserted to the Thuilleries, and that the directorial palace itself was invested by a troop of soldiers. These three directors being no longer supported, either by public opinion or public force, saw the supreme authority dropping from their hands. About noon, Barras sent in his resignation to Bonaparte, having obtained permission to retire under a guard, to his magnificent villa of Grosbois. He was the only individual who had continued a member of the directory since the first existence of the constitution; and his character was rather distinguished for dissipation and corruption, than for cruelty or oppression. Moulins and Gohier were confined to their apartments in the Luxemburg. The former, however, made his escape during the night, and the latter was next day permitted to retire to his own house.

At noon, the sitting of the council of five hundred was opened as usual. They knew nothing but from vague report of the causes by which the conduct of the elders had been determined. The procès verbal having been read over, every member was anxious to be heard; but Lucien Bonaparte, the president, and one of the general's brothers, shortened the debate, by reading the decree by virtue of which the council of elders, agreeably to the spirit of the 103d article of the constitution, transferred the sittings of the legislature to St. Cloud, and declared the meeting dissolved, in spite of every attempt at opposition.

General Bonaparte then issued two proclamations:—one informing the national guard, that the legislature had removed to St. Cloud, to protect it from the danger with which it was threatened by the disorganization of the administrative government, the other acquainting the soldiery that he had taken the command of the army, in order to execute measures for the substantial benefit of the people. A third proclamation recommended it to the inhabitants of Paris to remain quiet, declaring that the measures to be adopted were designed for the re-establishment of internal order, for restoring liberty, and fixing the republic on a permanent basis. The most profound tranquillity reigned throughout Paris, arising from faith in these public avowals, and a universally prevailing conviction that the result of these measures would be highly beneficial.

Next morning the senate assembled in the great gallery at the palace of St. Cloud, the orangery being occupied by the council of five hundred, which opened on the garden. Gaudin moved, that a committee of seven should be chosen, to make a report instantly on the situation to which the state was reduced; but as soon as he concluded, a violent clamor ensued; some urging a renewal of the oath of fidelity to the constitution, which was made in due form, and carried by acclamation.

In the mean time, Bonaparte was occupied in delivering an oration to the council of elders, and requesting them to associate their wisdom with his firmness. He maintained, that the constitution of the year 3 was nothing but a ruin, that it had been the sport of every party, who had in their respective turns trampled it under their feet; and he maintained, that every species of tyranny had been committed and sanctioned by the constitution. In the course of his speech, he made use of the memorable words, "we will save the republic and liberty!" when a voice inquired, "Who will answer for it?" Upon this Bonaparte turned to the military, and asked, with bold enthusiasm, "Soldiers! say if ever I deceived you when I promised you victory."

He next went to the council of five hundred, who, having renewed their oaths of fidelity to the constitution, were discussing with great warmth the questions relating to the election of a successor to Barras, making an appeal to the people, and of returning to Paris in a mass, when General Bonaparte presented himself at the door of the orangery, attended by a number of officers and soldiers without arms. Having advanced a few steps into the room, as if desirous to address the assembly, a hundred voices exclaimed, "Down with the tyrant! down with the dictator! kill him! kill him!" Different members left their seats, and rushed forward with threatenings of immediate vengeance; and a man of the name of Arena, who was one of the deputies, aimed a blow at him with a poniard, which one of the grenadiers parried, and received on his arm. Bonaparte stood for a moment speechless, and struck with astonishment; for though he doubtless expected to meet with opposition, he was by no means prepared for a scene so frantic and violent. The officers in his train at length stepped forward to snatch him from danger, and he was prevailed upon to return to the soldiers, who were drawn up in the palace-court.

The president, Lucien Bonaparte, ascended the tribune at this moment, and proclaimed, that the general, his brother, had no design but to acquaint the council with the present alarming situation of affairs; and he insisted that he should be called into the assembly to explain the motives of his conduct. Exclamations and reproaches, however, swallowed up his voice; and so dreadful was the consequent confusion, that the president threw off his robes of office, and solemnly declared that he held it no longer. Poniards and pistols were instantly presented to his breast, in order to compel him to resume his office; when General Lefevre, who was commissioned by Bonaparte, being made acquainted with the imminent danger to which the president was exposed, entered the hall at the head of a military detachment, and having surrounded Lucien, conducted him into the court of the palace.

It must indeed be acknowledged, that the troops were animated by the presence of their general; but it is just at the same time to admit, that they were far from being unanimous or resolved in their sentiments. They listened to the president, however, with the most profound attention, whilst he declared, in very moving expressions, that both he and his brother had been threatened with assassination; that the assembly of five hundred had no longer any existence; that the minority had become rebels, and were holding the poniard of sedition and despotism over the heads of the unarmed majority; and he invoked the assistance of the military to drive those rebels from the council-chamber, where they were at that moment exercising acts of violence and despotism, and on the eve of subverting the republic. The president having concluded his speech, the soldiers instantly drew their swords, making the air resound with the cries of "Vive la republique!"

General Bonaparte resolved to turn this favorable moment to a good account, and therefore repeated aloud his order to march, which was instantly obeyed. The chamber was still the seat of anarchy and confusion, when the pas de charge was suddenly heard, and the voices of the speakers were drowned in the noise of drums and clarionets. Officers and soldiers were instantly at the doors of the assembly, one of whom desired the deputies to withdraw, declaring that he would not be responsible for their lives; with which invitation many of them complied. Others continued to repeat their invectives; but, having sounded the pas de charge a second time, the hall was instantly cleared by the grenadiers at the point of the bayonet; the representatives flocking into the garden, and leaving the military in possession of the palace. The most jacobinical of the malcontents fled with precipitation to the metropolis.

The first vague accounts of these transactions filled the city of Paris with alarming apprehensions; but no sooner did they receive an accurate and circumstantial detail of facts, than the people of Paris rejoiced at the overthrow of the jacobins, and the pleasing prospect of a much better government, having justice and humanity for its basis, under the guardian care of which every citizen might find safety and protection, who wished to be obedient to the laws.

During the arduous conflict between Bonaparte and the council of five hundred, the elders were by no means unanimous in the adoption of measures which would subvert in the issue the directorial government; and it was believed that remedies might be found for the disorders of the state, without having recourse to extremities of such a dangerous nature. The contest, however, being at an end, they agreed to the propositions, that an executive provisional commission should be nominated; that the legislative body should be adjourned to the 21st of December; and that an intermediary commission should be formed, in order to preserve the rights of the national representation.

The council of five hundred, and that of the antients, met again in the evening; but the former now exhibited a conduct very different from what they manifested but a few hours before. Lucien Bonaparte congratulated the members then present on their happy deliverance from the yoke of jacobins and assassins, although the vanquished party were extremely anxious to extend a second time their horrible and sanguinary dominion over the affrighted country. Applauses were the only interruption he met with on this memorable occasion. Boulay de la Meurthe demonstrated, by very forcible and conclusive arguments, that a total change in the constitution was absolutely necessary. Nothing stable was possessed by France, either in its agents or its means, during the existence of the directorial government. Under that tyrannical system, property was insecure, commerce and the arts were in a state of stagnation; confidence was a shadow; and so excessive was the oppression of the people, that to point out the evils of the state, and the remedies for curing them, were equally dangerous. He unfolded, with no ordinary degree of sagacity, the radical defects of that constitution, and explained the reasons why it was morally impossible for harmony to exist between the legislative and executive branches of the constitution. These two, instead of uniting, were constantly at variance, representing two enemies who were continually at loggerheads. This orator concluded by saying:

“In short, upon investigating the public service, is there a single part which is organised, or which is carried on in a regular and invariable mode? On the contrary, every thing is in chaos, and all our efforts to extricate ourselves have ended in nothing; and never can end in any thing, except to plunge us deeper in the abyss of ruin. Is it astonishing, therefore, that neither public nor private liberty has yet existed in France, where all command and none obey; where nothing, in short, exists, but the phantom of a government? The basis of the constitution, or the general principle of it, are indeed good; they are the principles of every good government; the sovereignty of the people, the unity of the republic; equality of rights, liberty, and the representative system. But the constitutional organization arranged on this basis, is essentially vicious. It is in the conviction of the demagogues, as well as of ourselves, that the actual order of things can no longer continue. They would willingly take advantage of that movement, and govern France as in 1793; while we are anxious for the establishment of a plan of liberty allied with order, and productive of happiness. We wish liberty for all, they only for themselves.”

When Boulay de la Meurthe concluded his speech, the project, of which the council of elders had already approved, was brought forward. It said, that the directory no longer existed; that certain deputies, sixty-one in number, were no longer members of the national representation; that an executive commission should be provisionally appointed, composed of Sieyes, Ducos, and Bonaparte, who should be denominated consuls of the French republic; that commissions of twenty-five members each should be named by the two councils, to prepare the requisite changes in the organic dispositions of the constitution,—the design of which was, to consolidate, guarantee, and inviolably consecrate the sovereignty of the French people; that they should also be charged with the formation of a civil code. In a word, a proclamation was issued, declaring to the people of France the events which had taken place, and the causes which led to the present changes. Thus ended this great revolution, which was accomplished in twenty-four hours, and received with enthusiasm by all descriptions of people, except by the jacobins.

Agreeably to the provisions of the new constitution, Bonaparte created himself first consul, Cambaceres and Lebrun being the second and third. The last of these were chosen only for five years, for the purpose of establishing a regular rotation of elections, in regard to those subordinate magistrates. Sieyes was rewarded by the legislative commission with an estate in the neighbourhood of Paris, worth the annual sum of about 16,000 francs.

The three consuls entered on their functions the next day, and the legislative commissions began their sittings at the same time. In order to attain popularity, they repealed some odious laws, particularly the law of hostages, and the forced loan of 100 millions.

The military tribunals, hitherto employed to inflict the penalty of death on such of the emigrants as had returned to their native country, were suspended. The refractory priests, hitherto persecuted, were recalled from their exile, and admitted to the exercise of their functions, without any other formality than a simple declaration, that they would submit to the laws of the republic. The churches were opened for public worship, and the ancient religion began to be treated with respect. With consummate policy, public honors were conferred on the remains of Pius VI.; and that general who boasted in Africa, with all the zeal of a mussulman, that France had overthrown the head of the catholic faith, now ordered a pompous funeral service to be celebrated to the memory of the deceased pontiff.

Lucien, the first consul's brother, was chosen minister of the interior; and Charles Maurice Talleyrand minister for foreign affairs. Of this character, who, in conjunction with Sieyes, is supposed to have projected that revolution, of which Bonaparte arrived in France so seasonably to undertake the execution, we shall subjoin a biographical sketch.

Descended from one of the most ancient families in France, Talleyrand was born at Paris, on the 7th of March, 1754. He is the younger son of a younger branch of the Counts of Peregorde, who, three centuries ago, were sovereigns of a country in the south-western part of France, yet called Peregorde. Though nobly born, the circumstances of his parents were not such as to afford him the prospect of hereditary possessions; and, being club-footed from his birth, at an early period of his life he was destined for the church. He commenced his education at the college of Louis le Grand, where, in 1769, he obtained the first prize for learning in his class; but, as his early depravity was proportionate to his genius, he was at the same time publicly reprimanded for the glaring irregularity of his conduct. During the Easter week, in 1768, at which period he was only fourteen years of age, he went to a public brothel, got involved in a quarrel, refused to give his adversary satisfaction, was in consequence thrown out of a two-pair of stairs window into the street, and had both his legs broken by the fall. Refusing to state his name and place of abode, he was carried to an hospital, where he remained four days before it was ascertained what had become of him. The superior of the college having learned the cause of his accident, Talleyrand was refused re-admission; and it is recorded of him, that, when informed of his disgrace, though lying on a bed of sickness, he flew into a passion, and swore that it should not be for want of his active endeavours and philosophical zeal, if, five-and-twenty years afterwards, christian teachers and christian pupils were still found in France; or if churches were not changed into theatres, and colleges into brothels.

Two years before the period of this event, Talleyrand's father had died, and he was now under the care of his uncle, the Count de Peregorde. This nobleman had him secretly brought from the hospital to his palace, Rue de l'Université, Fauxbourg St. Germain; and, in the autumn of the year, he was placed under the care of the same governor who superintended the education of his cousin, the Prince de Chalais. His talents continued to unfold themselves with celerity and splendor; but, if possible, his depravity made a still more rapid progress.

In the neighbourhood of the count's palace resided a Madame Gauchier, a widow, with five children, three of whom were daughters. A scanty pension allowed her by government, her husband having been a captain and knight of the order of St. Louis, proved insufficient for the support of her family, and she and her daughters had taken up the business of mantua-makers. By splendid presents and flattering offers, the unsuspecting innocence of the girls was soon seduced; and in less than six months, Maria and Amy, the one aged eighteen, the other sixteen, were in a state of pregnancy. For the alleged purpose of procuring abortion, some drugs were presented by their lover; but, so deleterious were their effects, that they immediately deprived Amy of her life and Maria of her reason; and, on the same day, the wretched mother followed the remains of one of her daughters to the grave, and accompanied the other to a mad-house! Talleyrand, however, remained unsuspected; the poor widow still received his visits with distinction, consulted him as a friend, and revered him as a benefactor. But the friendly veil of ignorance was at last withdrawn. On her fourteenth birthday, during the carnival of 1770, her third daughter, Sophia, disappeared; and, in such a manner did Talleyrand plan the retreat of his new victim, that she was not discovered until Midsummer. At length, tempted by the reward of 3000 livres, offered by the Duke of Penthièvre, his female accomplice disclosed the place of her concealment, and poor Sophia was discovered in the arms of her seducer. She, too, had become pregnant, and in her room was found a box of pills, which, by her confession, were intended to produce abortion. These pills were analysed, compared with the substances which were found in the corpse of the poisoned Amy, and had evidently been composed of similar ingredients! Talleyrand, also, from a combination of juvenile indiscretion and depraved vanity, had boasted of his intrigues with, and gloried in the ruin of, the two elder sisters. Sophia was taken into the convent of the Ursulines, near Paris; but, notwithstanding every attention which she experienced, an untimely death succeeded a premature delivery; and, in two days, her dissolution was followed by that of her mother, from a broken heart, and the same tomb received them both.

When Count de Peregord was informed of these shocking events, he convoked a family council, for the purpose of determining on the future disposal of his nephew. Some proposed that he should be exiled to the colonies for life; but it was at length agreed, that a petition should be presented to the king for a lettre de cachet. This was obtained; and, in October, 1770, Talleyrand was seized at a gambling-house, and thrown into the Bastille, under the name of L'Abbe Boiteux. In December following, he was removed to the castle of Vincennes, where he remained in solitary confinement for twelve months. By inflicting severe penances on himself, and expressing a desire to enter the order of La Trap, the most rigid of all monastic institutions, he succeeded in convincing the chaplain of the castle, that his life was not only a life of repentance, but of edification; and, on the strength of such assurance, Talleyrand was liberated, and sent to finish his studies with the jesuits of Thoulouse, where, in 1773, he was received as a member of the Gallican clergy.

The Egyptian expedition of Bonaparte was suggested by Talleyrand, by which means he gained two important points; he flattered the unbounded ambition of the Corsican, and thus obtained his friendship; and by sending away the object of the directory's dread and jealousy, he conferred an obligation on the directors, and thus insured his own continuance in place.

In one of the first councils of state, after Bonaparte's usurpation of the consulate, Talleyrand submitted proposals for a general pacification; in consequence of which, the King of England, with the Emperors of Germany and Russia, were insulted by the receipt of letters from the Corsican's own hand.

About the end of December, Lord Grenville received a letter from M. Talleyrand, signifying, that he had, by order of his government, dispatched a messenger with a letter from the first consul to his majesty the King of England. Of this extraordinary epistle, the following is an accurate transcript:

" FRENCH REPUBLIC—SOVEREIGNTY OF THE PEOPLE—LIBERTY—EQUALITY.

" BONAPARTE, FIRST CONSUL OF THE FRENCH REPUBLIC, TO HIS MAJESTY, THE KING OF GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND.

" Paris, 5th Nivose, 8th year
(December 25, 1799.)

" CALLED by the wishes of the French nation to occupy the first magistracy of the republic, I think it proper, on entering into office, to make a direct communication of it to your majesty.

" The war, which for eight years has ravaged the four quarters of the world, must it be eternal? Are there no means of coming to an understanding?

" How can the two most enlightened nations of Europe, powerful and strong beyond what their safety and independence require, sacrifice to ideas of vain greatness, the benefits of commerce, internal prosperity, and the happiness of families? How is it that they do not feel that peace is of the first necessity as well as of the first glory?

" These sentiments cannot be foreign to the heart of your majesty, who reigns over a free nation, and with the sole view of rendering it happy.

" Your majesty will only see, in this overture, my sincere desire to contribute efficaciously, for the second time, to a general pacification, by a step, speedy, entirely of confidence, and disengaged from those forms which, necessary perhaps to disguise the dependence of weak states, prove only in those which are strong, the mutual desire of deceiving each other.

" France and England, by the abuse of their strength, may still for a long time, to the misfortune of all nations, retard the period of their being exhausted. But I will venture to say it, the fate of all civilised nations is attached to the termination of a war which involves the whole world.

(Signed) " BONAPARTE."

In a few days Lord Grenville informed M. Talleyrand "that he had laid before the king the two letters transmitted to him; and that his majesty, seeing no reason to depart from those forms which have long been established in Europe for transacting business with foreign states, had commanded him to return, in his name, the official answer enclosed.

" OFFICIAL NOTE FROM LORD GRENVILLE TO THE MINISTER FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS AT PARIS.

" London, January 4, 1800.

" THE king has given frequent proofs of his sincere desire for the re-establishment of secure and permanent tranquillity in Europe. He neither is, nor has been, engaged in any contest for a vain and false glory. He has had no other view than that of maintaining, against all aggression, the rights and happiness of his subjects.

"For these he has contended against all unprovoked attacks; and for the same object he is still obliged to contend; nor can he hope that this necessity could be removed by entering at the present moment into negociation with those whom a fresh revolution has so recently placed in the exercise of power in France; since no real advantage can arise from such negociation to the great and desirable object of general peace, until it shall distinctly appear that those causes have ceased to operate which originally produced the war, and by which it has since been protracted, and, in more than one instance, renewed.

"The same system, to the prevalence of which France justly ascribes all her present miseries, is that which has also involved the rest of Europe in a long and destructive warfare, of a nature long since unknown to the practice of civilised nations.

"For the extension of this system, and for the extermination of all established governments, the resources of France have, from year to year, and in the midst of the most unparalleled distress, been lavished and exhausted. To this indiscriminate spirit of destruction, the Netherlands, the United Provinces, the Swiss cantons, his majesty's ancient friends and allies, have successively been sacrificed. Germany has been ravaged; Italy, though now rescued from its invaders, has been made the scene of unbounded rapine and anarchy. His majesty has himself been compelled to maintain an arduous and burdensome contest for the independence and existence of his kingdoms.

"Nor have these calamities been confined to Europe alone. They have been extended to the most distant quarters of the world, and even to countries so remote, both in situation and interest from the present contest, that the very existence of such a war was, perhaps, unknown to those who found themselves suddenly involved in all its horrors.

"While such a system continues to prevail, and while the blood and treasure of a numerous and powerful nation can be lavished in its support, experience has shown that no defence but that of open and steady hostility can be availing. The most solemn treaties have only prepared the way for fresh aggression; and it is to a determined resistance alone that is now due whatever remains in Europe of stability, for property, for personal liberty, for social order, or for the free exercise of religion.

"For the security, therefore, of these essential objects, his majesty cannot place his reliance on the mere renewal of general professions of pacific dispositions. Such professions have been repeatedly held out by all those who have successively directed the resources of France to the destruction of Europe; and whom the present rulers have declared to have been all, from the beginning and uniformly, incapable of maintaining the relations of amity and peace.

"Greatly, indeed, will his majesty rejoice whenever it shall appear that the danger to which his own dominions, and those of his allies, have been so long exposed, has really ceased; whenever he shall be satisfied that the necessity of resistance is at an end; that, after the experience of so many years of crimes and miseries, better principles have ultimately prevailed in France; and that all the gigantic projects of ambition, and all the restless schemes of destruction, which have endangered the very existence of civil society, have, at length, been finally relinquished. But the conviction of such a change, however agreeable to his majesty's wishes, can result only from experience and the evidence of facts.

"The best and most natural pledge of its reality and permanence, would be the restoration of that line of princes, which for so many centuries maintained the French nation in prosperity at home, and in consideration and respect abroad. Such an event would at once have removed, and will at any time remove, all obstacles in the way of negociation or peace. It would confirm to France the unmolested enjoyment of its ancient territory, and it would give to all the other nations of Europe, in tranquillity and peace, that security which they are now compelled to seek by other means.

"But, desirable as such an event must be, both to France and the world, it is not to this mode exclusively that his majesty limits the possibility of secure and solid pacification. His majesty makes no claim to prescribe to France what shall be the form of her government, or in whose hands she shall vest the authority necessary for conducting the affairs of a great and powerful nation.

"His majesty looks only to the security of his own dominions and those of his allies, and to the general safety of Europe. Whenever he shall judge that such security can, in any manner be attained, as resulting either from the internal situation of that country, from whose internal situation the danger has arisen—or from such other circumstances, of whatever nature, as may produce the same end—his majesty will eagerly embrace the opportunity to concert with his allies, the means of immediate and general pacification.

"Unhappily no such security hitherto exists; no sufficient evidence of the principles by which the new government will be directed; no reasonable ground by which to judge of its stability. In this situation it can, for the present, only remain for his majesty to pursue, in conjunction with other powers, those exertions of just and defensive war which his regard to the happiness of his subjects will never permit him, either to continue beyond the necessity in which they originated, or to terminate on any other grounds than such as may best contribute to the secure enjoyment of their tranquillity, their constitution, and their independence.

(Signed) "GRENVILLE."

In as short a time as the distance and other circumstances would admit, Lord Grenville received a note from M. Talleyrand, inclosing, by command of the first consul, an answer to his last communication, "equally official," as follows:—

M. TALLEYRAND TO LORD GRENVILLE.

"Paris, 24th Nivose, 8th year
(Jan. 14, 1800.)"

"THE official note, under date of the 14th Nivose, the 8th year, addressed by the minister of his Britannic majesty, having been laid before the first consul of the French republic, he observed, with surprise, that it rested upon an opinion which is not exact, respecting the origin and consequences of the present war. Very far from its being France which provoked it, she had, it must be remembered, from the commencement of her revolution, solemnly proclaimed her love of peace and her disinclination to conquests, her respect for the independence of all governments; and it is not to be doubted, that, occupied at that time with her own internal affairs, she would have avoided taking part in those of Europe, and would have remained faithful to her declarations.

"But, from an opposite disposition, as soon as the French revolution had broken out, almost all Europe entered into a league for its destruction. The aggression was real long time before it was public. Internal resistance was excited: its opponents were favorably received; their extravagant declamations were supported; the French nation was insulted in the person of its agents; and England set particularly this example by the dismissal of the minister accredited to her. Finally, France was, in fact, attacked in her independence, in her honor, and in her safety, long time before war was declared.

"Thus it is to the projects of subjection, dissolution, and dismemberment, which were prepared against her, and the execution of which was several times attempted and pursued, that France has a right to impute the evils which she has suffered, and those which have afflicted Europe. Such projects, for a long time without example with respect to so powerful a nation, could not fail to bring on the most fatal consequences.

"Assailed on all sides, the republic could not but extend universally the efforts of her defence; and it is only for the maintenance of her independence that she has made use of those means which she possessed in her own strength and the courage of her citizens. As long as she saw her enemies obstinately refuse to recognise her rights, she counted only upon the energy of her resistance; but, as soon as they were obliged to abandon the hope of invasion, she sought for means of reconciliation, and manifested pacific intentions; and, if these have not always been efficacious—if, in the midst of the critical circumstances of her internal situation, which the revolution and the war have successively brought on, the former depositaries of the executive authority in France have not always shown as much moderation as the nation itself has shown courage—it must, above all, be imputed to the fatal and persevering animosity with which the resources of England have been lavished to accomplish the ruin of France.

"But if the wishes of his Britannic majesty, in conformity with his assurances, are in unison with those of the French republic for the re-establishment of peace, why, instead of attempting the apology of the war, should not attention be rather paid to the means of terminating it? And what obstacle can prevent a mutual understanding, of which the utility is reciprocal and is felt; especially when the first consul of the French republic has personally given so many proofs of his eagerness to put an end to the calamities of war, and of his disposition to maintain the rigid observance of all the treaties concluded?"

"The first consul of the French republic could not doubt that his Britannic majesty recognised the right of nations to choose the form of their government, since it is from the exercise of this right that he holds his crown. But he has been unable to comprehend how to this fundamental principle, upon which rests the existence of political societies, the ministers of his majesty could annex insinuations which tend to an interference in the internal affairs of the republic; and which are no less injurious to the French nation and to its government, than it would be to England and to his majesty if a sort of invitation were held out in favor of that republican government of which England adopted the forms in the middle of the last century; or an exhortation to recede to the throne, that family whom their birth had placed there, and whom a revolution compelled to descend from it.

"If, at periods not far distant, when the constitutional system of the republic presented neither the strength nor the solidity which it contains at present, his Britannic majesty thought himself enabled to invite a negotiation and pacific conferences, how is it possible that he should not be eager now to renew negotiations to which the present and reciprocal situation of affairs promises a rapid progress? On every side the voice of nations and humanity implores the conclusion of a war, marked already by such great calamities, and the prolongation of which threatens Europe with an universal convulsion and irremediable evils. It is, therefore, to put a stop to the course of these calamities, or, in order that their terrible consequences may be a reproach to those only who shall have provoked them, that the first consul of the French republic proposes to put an immediate end to hostilities, by agreeing to a suspension of arms, and naming plenipotentiaries on each side, who shall repair to Dunkirk, or any other town as advantageously situated for the quickness of the respective communications; and who should apply themselves, without any delay, to effect the re-establishment of peace and good understanding between the French republic and England. The first consul offers to give the passports which may be necessary for this purpose.

(Signed) "C. M. TALLEYRAND."

To this note the following official answer was returned:

"LORD GRENVILLE TO M. TALLEYRAND.

"Downing-street, January 20, 1800.

"THE official note transmitted by the minister for foreign affairs in France, and received by the undersigned on the 18th instant, has been laid before the king.

"His majesty cannot forbear expressing the concern with which he observes in that note, that the unprovoked aggressions of France, the sole cause and origin of the war, are systematically defended by her present rulers, under the same injurious pretences by which they were originally attempted to be disguised. His majesty will not enter into the refutation of allegations now universally exploded; and, in so far as they respect his majesty's conduct, not only in themselves utterly groundless, but contradicted both by the internal evidence of the transactions to which they relate, and also by the express testimony, given at that time, of the government of France itself.

"With respect to the object of the note, his majesty can only refer to the answer which he has already given.

"He has explained, without reserve, the obstacles which, in his judgment, preclude, at the present moment, all hope of advantage from negotiation. All the inducements to treat which are relied upon in the French official note; the personal dispositions which are said to prevail for the conclusion of peace, and for the future observance of treaties; the power of insuring the effect of those dispositions, supposing them to exist; and the validity of the system newly established after so rapid a succession of revolutions—all these are points which can be known only from that test to which his majesty has already referred them, the result of EXPERIENCE and the EVIDENCE of FACTS.

"With that sincerity and plainness his anxiety for the re-establishment of peace indispensably required, his majesty has pointed out to France the surest and speediest means for the attainment of that great object. But he has declared, in terms equally explicit, and with the same sincerity, that he entertains no desire to prescribe to a foreign nation the form of its government; that he looks only to the security of his own dominions and of Europe; and that, whenever that essential object can, in his judgment, be in any manner whatever sufficiently provided for, he will eagerly concert with his allies the means of immediate and joint negotiation for the re-establishment of general tranquillity.

"To these declarations his majesty steadily adheres; and it is only on the grounds thus stated, that his regard to the safety of his subjects will suffer him to renounce that system of vigorous defence to which, under the favor of Providence, his kingdoms owe the security of those blessings which they now enjoy.

(Signed) "GRENVILLE."

The whole of this very extraordinary correspondence was immediately communicated to parliament, by a message from the king; and, on the 28th of January, Lord Grenville moved an address to the throne; speaking of the first consul of France, he remarked, "He had multiplied violations of all moral and religious duties; he had repeated acts of perfidy; his hypocrisies were innumerable; and, in the declarations which affirmed the French to be true musselmen, he had given us a correct idea of his sincerity and his principles." The address was opposed by the Duke of Bedford, who observed, "that there were no terms sufficiently strong to censure the littleness which attacked the personal character of Bonaparte in order to ruin him in the estimation of the French nation. Could these railing accusations," asked his grace, "enable us to negotiate with more effect, or in any degree facilitate the prospect of peace?" He concluded with moving an amendment to the address, expressive of disapprobation, censure, and regret, for the evil counsels by which his majesty had been induced to reject the advances made for that purpose.

Lord Romney, though he professed to approve the general conduct of ministers, thought they had, in this instance, taken wrong ground, and had acted improperly in their abrupt rejection of the overtures of France. "No bad consequences could have ensued from entering into a negotiation, and our preparations might have gone on with equal vigor for the succeeding campaign. If the terms of Bonaparte had been unreasonable, they might have been refused; and the odium of prolonging the war would have devolved on France." His lordship said, he could not, in consistency with his sentiments, vote either for the address or the amendment. Lord Carlisle, who approved the rejection of the overtures in present circumstances, admitted the letters of Lord Grenville to be violent, and apparently indiscreet. But the Earl of Liverpool maintained "that ministers had adopted the only course of security and honor by their replies to the proposition of Bonaparte. Until the French repealed their decrees, of which one was that they had a right to interfere with every government upon earth, and another, that they had a right to annex any part of Europe which fell into their hands to the republic, no good could be derived from any negotiation: All the commerce of the world was now brought into our harbours: should we depart from a system which had placed us in so prosperous a situation?" In answer to the latter part of his argument, Lord Carlisle admonished the noble earl that this reasoning was decisive against entering into a negotiation with France at any time and under any circumstances; and he begged to ask the noble Lord "whether it was arguing like a philosopher or a statesman, to insist that war must be continued in infinitum, in order that all the ships of the world might come into the port of London?" In the result, though manifest symptoms of dissatisfaction appeared on the part of many of the ministerial lords, the address was carried by a great majority.

In the house of commons, Mr. Dundas moved (February 3) a similar address, which he supported, after the example of Lord Grenville, in stigmatising the character and conduct of Bonaparte; in whose hands, he affirmed, "that all power was now consolidated and concentrated. It was not," he said, "France in arms, which was to be dreaded by Great Britain, but the permanent existence of a government founded on bad principles and bad faith. Such a government must, therefore, be overthrown, or its powers reduced, before this country could safely consent to treat. He admitted that twice within these four years England had entered into negotiation with France. But the feelings of ministers were repugnant to the measure, and its success would have proved a calamity."

Mr. Whitbread observed, "that every expression which could revile, every topic which could prejudice, and every art which could blacken, had been used for the purposes of political slander. But, even allowing Bonaparte to be precisely what he had been described, was he the only person who could be accused of a violation of honor or good faith? In the subversion of the Venetian republic, a transaction he would not defend, was not Austria equally concerned? Were not both parties alike culpable? England was now smarting under the treachery of Prussia, who took an enormous subsidy from us, and then broke through all engagements. Did not three of the first powers in Europe divide and appropriate to themselves the unfortunate kingdom of Poland, whilst England was a tame spectator? Yet Austria and Russia were still our good and true allies. Is not Bonaparte as upright as these? If he had broken treaties, so had they; if he had killed his thousands, Suwarrow had killed his ten thousands. Ministers very modestly required that Bonaparte should acknowledge himself an usurper, recant his principles, and descend from the exalted situation which he filled, in order that the house of Bourbon might be re-instated. But was it really their wish to lavish the blood and treasure of England to effect that restoration? We were now contending either for this, or for the extermination of jacobinical principles. If for the former, we were fighting for an unattainable object; if for the latter, against opinions which could not be eradicated by force; and, in both cases, the contest must endure as long as time itself."

Mr. Erskine remarked, "that, whether it were politic or impolitic to accede to the armistice proposed by France, or even to the unqualified overture of negotiation, under no circumstances, and at no time, could such an answer as was actually returned be either wise or decent from the ministers of any nation to any possible professions of conciliation and peace. It was rash, insolent, and provoking, without necessity. Had ministers been able, by eight years of invective, to mitigate the evils of the French revolution? On the contrary, had we not, by persisting in an hostile line of conduct, and declaring France incapable of maintaining the relations of peace and amity, placed her out of the pale of social community; and by this means heightened, and even created, many of the evils which we deplored? Could it be a matter of wonder, if France, thus denounced as a public enemy, should be actuated by the spirit of retaliation, and, in her ungoverned rage, desolate whatever territory she occupied? Or that, warring against so formidable a confederacy, the rights of nations should be so little respected? Was not the world agitated with portentous violence, because the ministers of Great Britain had resolved to re-establish an order of things, which had reached its distant period, and expired?" Mr. Erskine treated with contempt the idea, "that the present overture from the first consul was to be rejected as insincere. Surrounded with perils, at the head of an untried government, menaced by a great confederacy, of which England was the acknowledged chief, compelled to press heavily on the resources of an exhausted people, peace was undoubtedly his interest; and he might be reasonably expected to make great sacrifices for the re-establishment of the national tranquillity."

In every view he disapproved the answer which had been sent by ministers to Bonaparte. It appeared to him to be pregnant with danger, and to entail an awful responsibility upon those who advised and those who supported it."

The attention of the house was then attracted by a labored and eloquent oration from the chancellor of the exchequer, Mr. Pitt, who stated to the house, that the foundation of the reasoning of the last speaker, and his grand argument for immediate treaty, was the supposed impossibility of overturning the French revolution; and that it would not only be imprudent, but impious, to struggle any longer against the order of things, which (upon he knew not what idea of predestination) he regarded as immortal. Mr. Pitt acknowledged, that he did indeed consider the revolution as the severest trial which the visitation of Providence had ever yet inflicted on the nations of the earth: but he could not help reflecting with satisfaction, that this country, even under such a trial, had not only been exempted from those calamities which had covered almost every other part of Europe, but appeared to have been reserved as a refuge and asylum to those who fled from its persecution; as a barrier to oppose its progress; and, perhaps, ultimately, as an instrument to deliver the world from the crimes and miseries which have attended it. Mr. Pitt, in adverting to the origin of the war, affirmed that the refusal to recognise M. Chauvelin, in the capacity of ambassador from the republic, in no sort accelerated that event. He maintained, on the contrary, that an opportunity was afforded for discussion, as fully as if a regular and accredited minister had been resident here; but that all the explanations on the side of France were inadmissible. He justified the rejection of M. Chauvelin's new credentials. We had a right to reply to M. Chauvelin, when he tendered them, 'We have had no satisfaction for the injuries we have received; no security from the dangers with which we are threatened: under these circumstances we will not accept your new credentials: the former you have yourselves recalled by the sacrifice of your king.' Mr. Pitt, after uttering in this strain a long and furious invective against the French republic, observed, "that it was after receiving the most insulting declarations from the government of France, under the name of explanations, that M. Chauvelin was required to depart: and even after that period (he was almost ashamed to record it) we did not on our part shut the door against other attempts to negotiate. But this transaction was immediately followed by the declaration of war; not proceeding from England in vindication of her rights, but from France as the completion of her insults. And, on a war thus originating, could it be doubted by an English house of commons, whether the aggression was imputable to this country or to France? or whether the manifest aggression on the part of France was the result of any thing but the principles which characterise the French revolution?"

"The only objection to this simple statement of facts was to be found in the insinuation contained in the note from France, that this country had, previous to the transactions to which he had referred, encouraged and supported the combination of other powers directed against the French nation.

"Upon investigating the subject, the proofs which contradicted such an insinuation were innumerable. In the year 1792, Russia conceived, as well as ourselves, a natural and just alarm for the balance of Europe, and applied to learn our sentiments. In our answer we imparted the principles on which we then acted; and we communicated this answer to the court of Berlin, with whom we were connected in defensive alliance. On the 29th of December, 1792, a dispatch was sent from Lord Grenville to his majesty's minister in Russia, stating 'the line of conduct to be followed previous to the commencement of hostilities, with the view, if possible, to avert them, and the nature and amount of the forces which the powers engaged in this concert might be enabled to use, supposing such extremities unavoidable.' As to the first, it appeared most advisable that the powers not hitherto engaged in the war should propose to the French nation terms of peace; that those terms should be the withdrawing their arms within the limits of the French territory—the abandoning their conquests—the rescinding any acts injurious to the sovereignty or rights of any other nation—and the giving, in some public and unequivocal manner, a pledge of their intention no longer to foment troubles or excite disturbances against other governments. In return for these stipulations, the different potentates of Europe who should be parties to this measure, might engage to abandon all measures or views of hostility against France, or interference in her internal affairs; and to maintain a correspondence and intercourse of amity with the existing powers in that country with whom such a treaty may be concluded. If, on the result of this proposal, so made by the potentates acting in concert, these terms should not be accepted by France, or, being accepted, should not be satisfactorily performed, the different powers might then engage themselves to each other to enter into active measures, for the purpose of obtaining the ends in view; and it may be to be considered, whether, in such case, they might not reasonably look to some INDEMNITY for the expences and hazards to which they would necessarily be exposed."—As to the second point, viz. "that of the forces to be employed," Mr. Pitt thought it unnecessary then to speak.

The minister, on finishing this recital, asked,

"whether it was possible to conceive any measure to be adopted, in the situation in which we then stood, which could more evidently demonstrate our desire, after repeated provocations, to preserve peace on any terms consistent with our safety? or whether any sentiment could now be suggested which would have more plainly marked our moderation, forbearance, and sincerity?"—He declared, "that he was, upon this account, far from challenging the applause of his country; for he confessed that ministers were too slow in anticipating the danger resulting from revolutionary principles, against which, nothing but vigorous and open hostility can afford complete and adequate security. You cannot," said this eloquent orator, "look at the map of Europe, and lay your hand upon that country against which France has not either declared an open and aggressive war, or violated some positive treaty, or broken some recognised principle of the law of nations. The all-searching eye of the French revolution looks to every part of Europe, and every quarter of the world, in which can be found an object either of acquisition or plunder. Nothing is too great for the temerity of its ambition; nothing too small or insignificant for the grasp of its rapacity. Even to INDIA messengers were sent, for the purpose of inculcating war in those distant regions on revolutionary principles. An insatiable love of aggrandisement—an implacable spirit of destruction against all the civil and religious institutions of every country;—this is the first moving and acting spirit of the French revolution. This is the spirit which animated it at its birth, and this is the spirit which will not desert it till the moment of its dissolution.—From the alliance of the most horrid principles with the most horrid means only, could such calamities have been brought upon Europe. Groaning under every degree of misery, the victim of its own crimes, France still retains new and unexampled capacities of annoyance and destruction against all the other powers of Europe."

After dwelling very long on this part of his subject, Mr. Pitt adverted to the different negotiations for peace which had taken place. "It had," he said, "been affirmed, that the negotiation of 1796 was broken off on the single point of the possession of the Netherlands; and, therefore, upon this ground only has the war since that time been continued. But it was not on the decision of this question of policy and expediency that the issue of the negotiation then turned. What was required of us by France, was not merely that we should acquiesce in her retaining the Netherlands; but that we should, as a preliminary to all treaty and all discussion, recognise the principle, that whatever France, in time of war, had annexed to the republic, must remain inseparable for ever, and could not become the subject of negotiation.

In refusing such a preliminary, we were only resisting the claim of France to arrogate to itself the power of controlling, by its own separate and municipal acts, the rights and interests of other countries, and moulding, at its discretion, a new and general code of the law of nations." In the year 1797, Mr. Pitt said, under the pressure of a necessity which he should not disguise, we made another attempt to negotiate. "It was not now a demand that France should restore any thing, Austria having made peace upon her own terms. So far from retaining any French possessions in our own hands, we freely offered them all; requiring only, as a poor compensation, to retain a part of what we had acquired by arms from Holland, then identified with France. This proposal also was proudly refused, in a way which had been reprobated by the general voice of the country." Having made further remarks on the subsequent conduct of France respecting Switzerland, America, and Egypt, he came at length to the consideration of the question before the house. "A characteristic of the republic of France, as striking as its power of destruction, was its instability, which was of itself sufficient to annihilate all confidence in its rulers. Such had been the incredible rapidity with which the revolutions in France had succeeded each other, that the names of those who have successively exercised absolute power under the pretence of liberty, were to be numbered by the years which had elapsed.

"Having taken a view of what France was," said the minister, "let us now examine what it is. A supreme power is placed at the head of this nominal republic, with a more open avowal of military despotism than at any former period. The different institutions, republican in form and appearance, which were before the instruments of that despotism, are now annihilated. They have given way to the absolute power of one man, concentrating in himself all the authority of the state, and differing from other monarchs only in this, that he wields a sword instead of a sceptre. What, in these circumstances, is the confidence we are to derive, either from the frame of the government, or from the character and conduct of the person who is now the absolute ruler of France?"

Mr. Pitt then took a minute survey of the public conduct of Bonaparte, from the commencement of his civil and military career to the present period, in France, in Italy, and in Egypt. "His acts of perfidy," he said, "were commensurate with the number of his treaties; and, if we trace the history of those deeds which have been stained by the most atrocious cruelty, and marked the most strongly with the characteristic features of the revolution, the name of Bonaparte will be found allied to more of them than that of any other which can be handed down in the narrative of the crimes and miseries of the last ten years. But it will, perhaps, be argued, that, whatever may be his character, or whatever has been his past conduct, he has now an interest in making and observing peace. This was to him a doubtful proposition: that it was his interest to negotiate, he readily would acknowledge; and to negotiate with this country separately, in order to loosen and dissolve the whole system of the confederacy on the continent; to palsy at once the arms of Russia or of Austria, or of any other country that might look to Great Britain for support. But on what grounds are we to be convinced that he has an interest in concluding a solid pacification? What other security has he for retaining his newly-acquired power than the sword? He is a stranger, a foreigner, and an usurper. He appeals to his fortune; and, placing his whole reliance on military support, can he afford to let his military renown pass away? to let his laurels wither? to let the memory of his trophies sink in obscurity? What grounds have we to believe that this new usurpation, more odious and more undisguised than all that preceded it, will be more durable? I say not that we will in no case treat with Bonaparte; but, in the language of the answer returned to the French note, I say that we ought to wait for EXPERIENCE and the EVIDENCE OF FACTS before we are convinced that such a treaty is admissible. Considering the importance of obtaining complete security for the objects for which we contend, we ought not to be discouraged too soon; but the limits, beyond which it would be wrong to persist, can be determined only by estimating and comparing fairly, from time to time, the degree of security to be obtained by treaty, and the risk and disadvantage of continuing the contest. If there appeared signs of a stable government, not now to be traced; if the danger of the contest should increase, while the hope of ultimate success should be diminished; these considerations would have their due weight. But, if the question is no longer between monarchy and even the pretence and name of liberty, but between the ancient line of hereditary princes on the one hand, and a military tyrant, a foreign usurper, on the other; if the armies of that usurper are likely to find sufficient occupation on the frontiers, and to be forced at length to leave the interior of the country at liberty to manifest its real feeling and disposition; what reason have we to anticipate that the restoration of monarchy, under such circumstances, is impracticable? And can it be supposed to be indifferent to us or to the world, whether the throne of France is to be filled by a prince of the house of Bourbon, or by him whose principles and conduct I have endeavoured to develop? Is it nothing whether a system shall be sanctioned which confirms, by one of its fundamental articles, a general transfer of property from its ancient and lawful possessors; which holds out one of the most terrible examples of national injustice? and which has, by this very act of injustice, furnished the great resource of revolutionary finance and revolutionary strength against all the powers of Europe? It is true, indeed, that even the gigantic and unnatural means by which that revolution has been supported, are so far impaired, the influence of its principles and the terror of its arms so far weakened, and its power of action so much contracted and circumscribed, that, against the embodied force of Europe, prosecuting a vigorous war, we may justly hope that the remnant and wreck of this system cannot long oppose an effectual resistance. At this moment I see no possibility of such a peace as would be attended with any of the advantages of established tranquillity; and, as I cannot be content with its nominal attainments, I will not grasp at the shadow when the reality is beyond my reach—Cur igitur pacem nolo? Quia infida est, quia periculosa, quia esse non potest."

Mr. Fox immediately rose in reply. "All parties are agreed in opinion, that the present is a new era of the war: yet the right honorable gentleman does not seem to think any new arguments necessary to induce us to persevere in it. All the topics which have so often misled us—all the reasoning which has so invariably failed—all the lofty predictions which have been so constantly falsified by events—all the hopes which have amused the sanguine, and all the assurances of the distress and weakness of the enemy which have satisfied the unthinking, are again enumerated and advanced as arguments for our continuing the war. Were we not told, five years ago, that France was not only on the verge of ruin, but actually sunk in the gulf of bankruptcy; that she could not hold out another campaign; and that we had nothing to do but to persevere for a short time, in order to save ourselves for ever from the consequences of her ambition and her jacobinism? After having gone on from year to year, upon assurances like these, and after having seen the repeated refutations of every prediction, are we again to be gravely and seriously told, that we have the same prospect of success on the same identical grounds? And upon those assurances and predictions which have so uniformly failed, we are called upon, not merely to refuse all negotiation, but to countenance principles and views as distant from wisdom and justice as they are in their nature wild and impracticable. I must lament, in common with every genuine friend of peace, the harsh and unconciliating language which ministers have made use of in their answer to a respectful offer of negotiation. Such language has ever been reprobated and considered as extremely unwise by the most celebrated diplomatic characters. I must lament that such licence has this night been given to invective and reproach; and that the right honorable gentleman has entered with such severity and minuteness of investigation into all the early circumstances of the war, which, whatever they were, are nothing to the present purpose."

After many pertinent observations, the right honorable gentleman added:—"But ministers have declared the restoration of the house of Bourbon to be an event which would immediately remove every obstacle to negotiation. If the restoration of that house be the wish of the French nation, I, for one, shall be perfectly content to acquiesce; but, as an Englishman, actuated by English feelings, I cannot wish for the restoration to the power which they abused. I feel for their situation; I respect their distresses; but I cannot forget that the history of the century is little more than an account of the calamities arising from their intrigues, their perfidy, and their ambition.

"The restoration of the house of Bourbon is, however, denied to be a sine qua non. The right honorable gentleman, in language which I do not understand, talks of limited possibilities, which may induce ministers to treat with France, though this restoration should not take place. But these must depend upon EXPERIENCE and the EVIDENCE of FACTS; and, in order to convince the house that new evidence is requisite, he goes back to all the earliest acts and crimes of the revolution; to all the atrocities of the governments which have passed away; and contends that he must have experience of the adoption of a purer and better system, by which he may be sure that France shall be capable of maintaining the relations of peace and amity. It seems, therefore, that the war is to be continued till all the peaceable virtues are excited, and for the very purpose of exciting them. What can we say of such a test, but that it is hopeless? It is the nature of war to inflame animosity, not to generate moderation; to exasperate, not to sooth; to widen, not to approximate; and, during the continuance of hostility, it is ridiculous to require evidence of a peaceable demeanor.

"But it is held to be a degradation to treat with an usurper, a military despot, whose power it is taken for granted will be short-lived. Was not the government erected by Julius Cæsar a military despotism? and yet it lasted for five or six hundred years. Cromwell was an usurper, yet France and Spain did not refuse to treat with him upon that account. It may be said, that the splendor of his talents and the success of his arms gave weight and authority to his government. But may not the same be affirmed of Bonaparte? Is not he a man of great abilities? and are not the French as likely to acquiesce in his government as the English were in that of Cromwell? For this the right honorable gentleman professes to wait. But will not the very test required, the acquiescence of the people of France in his government, give him an advantage-ground in the negotiation which he does not possess now? Is it quite sure that he will then treat on the same terms as now? Will he not have one interest less than at present to desire peace? and is it politic to overlook a favorable occasion of terminating this destructive war for a chance so extremely doubtful? These are the considerations I would urge on his majesty's ministers, against the dangerous experiment of waiting for the acquiescence of the people of France.

"But the right honorable gentleman has another salvo in store:—'If the allies of this country shall be less successful than may reasonably be expected, in stirring up the people of France, and in the further prosecution of the war; or if the pressure of the war should be heavier upon us than it would be convenient to the nation for a continuance to bear,' then the right honorable gentleman would consent to treat even with Bonaparte. I have often blamed the minister for being disingenuous and insincere: on the present occasion I certainly cannot charge him with any such thing: he has made to-night a most honest confession: he is open and candid: he tells Bonaparte what he has to expect:—'I mean,' says he, 'to do every thing in my power to raise up the people of France against you. I have engaged a number of allies, and our combined efforts shall be used to excite insurrection and civil war in France: if I succeed, well; but if I fail, then I will treat with you. My resources being exhausted, and my solid system of finance vanished into air, you will see me renounce my high tone, my attachment to the house of Bourbon, my abhorrence of your crimes, my alarm at your principles.' Is this a politic language for one state to hold to another? And what sort of peace does the right honorable gentleman expect to receive in that case? Does he think that Bonaparte would grant to baffled insolence, to humiliated pride, to disappointment and imbecility, the same terms which he would be ready to give now?

"Sir, what is the question to-night? We are called upon to support ministers in refusing a frank, candid, and respectful offer of negotiation; and to countenance them in continuing the war. But let us for a moment suppose that ministers had been inclined to adopt the line of conduct which they pursued in 1796 and 1797, and that the address purported to contain thanks to his majesty for accepting the overture, and for opening a negotiation to treat for peace. I appeal to all the members of this house; I desire them to lay their hands upon their hearts, and to say whether they would not have cordially voted for such an address. Had the address breathed the spirit of peace, your benches would have resounded with praises and rejoicings; and I ask for the votes of none but those who, in the secret confession of their conscience, admit at this instant, while they hear me, that they would have cheerfully and heartily voted with the minister for an address directly the reverse of this. If every gentleman of that description should vote with me, I should be this night in the greatest majority that ever I had the honor to vote with in this house.

"We have heard to-night many acrimonious invectives against Bonaparte, against the whole course of his conduct, and against the unprincipled manner in which he seized upon the reins of government: I will not make his defence. I think all this sort of invective, which is used only to inflame the passions of this house and of the country, exceedingly ill-timed, and very impolitic; but I repeat, that I will not make his defence. I am not sufficiently in possession of materials upon which to form an opinion on the character of this extraordinary man. On his arrival in France he found the government in a very unsettled state, and the whole affairs of the republic deranged, crippled, and involved: he thought it necessary to reform the government, and he reformed it in a way which may be deemed most natural to a military man; by seizing on the whole authority himself. It will not be expected from me, that I should either approve or apologise for such an act; but, why the right honorable gentleman should be so violently indignant upon this occasion, I cannot discover. Is it not the system which was so happily and so advantageously established of late all over Ireland? and which, even now, the government may at its pleasure proclaim over the whole of that kingdom; and this at a time when the people of Ireland are called upon to discuss the interesting and momentous question of a legislative union? This the right honorable gentleman thinks precisely the period, and these the circumstances, in which she may best declare her free and unbiassed opinion. What right have ministers, then, to exclaim against military despotism in France? But it seems Bonaparte has broken his oaths; he has violated his oath of fidelity to the constitution of the third year. I confess myself of the number of those who think that such oaths ought not to be exacted: they are seldom or never of any effect; and I am not for sporting with a thing so sacred as an oath. Who ever heard, that, in revolutions, the oath of fidelity to the former government was regarded? The violation of their oaths of allegiance was never imputed to the people of England when they expelled the house of Stuart, and will never, in similar circumstances, be imputed as a crime to any people. But who brings forward this charge of perjury? he, who desires the whole French nation to violate the oaths they have so recently taken, and who makes the success of his project depend entirely upon that national act of perjury.

The address, however, was carried, by 262 against 66 voices.

The union of England and Ireland, to which Mr. Fox alluded, was, at this time, the chief subject of debate in the latter kingdom. The Irish parliament met, for the last time, January 15, 1800. His excellency, Lord Cornwallis, made no allusion in his speech to the premeditated union between the two countries. As it was well understood, however, that it would be revived at a very early period of the session, it was resolved by the members in the opposite interest, to oppose it on its first appearance: and when Lord Loftus proposed an address of thanks, Sir Lawrence Parsons moved an amendment. Here a violent debate ensued, when Mr. Grattan supported the amendment with the whole powers of his astonishing talents and eloquence.

"The constitution which he (the minister) is now attempting to destroy, is one of the pillars of the empire; dear from its violation—dear in its recovery. Its restoration cost Ireland her noblest efforts. It is the habitation of her loyalty, as well as of her liberty; her temple of fame, as well as of freedom. But the field of imagination was that in which the British minister delighted to rove; and by holding out visionary prospects and promises, he hoped ultimately to accomplish his designs. Where, indeed, he is to extinguish our power of legislation, to abrogate our highest court of judicature, to extort from us, by a financial agreement, a perpetual tribute, he is altogether a matter-of-fact man; but when he is to provide a compensation for all this prodigality of concession, then he becomes altogether poetic and prophetic; fancy gives him her wand—Amalthea takes him by the hand—Ceres follows in his train; the English capitalist and manufacturer will leave his mines, his machinery, his comforts, and his habits; he will conquer his prejudices and prepossessions, and will come over to Ireland, with a generous design to give her commerce for her lost constitution. A man who reasons, may be answered by reasoning; but the minister in all this does not argue, but foretel; now you cannot confute a prophet, you can only disbelieve him. It forms the genuine harmony of the state, when the rich encourage and employ the poor, and the poor with confidence look up to the watchful care and guardian protection of the rich; both concurring to the same end, form that grand column of society, where all below is strength, and all above is grace. How does the minister's plan accomplish this? He takes away our gentlemen and nobles, and supplies their place by English factors, and commercial adventurers. This minister proposes to you to give up the ancient inheritance of your country, to proclaim an utter incapacity to make laws for your own people;—and is this no attack upon the honor and dignity of the kingdom? The thing which he proposes to buy, cannot be sold—LIBERTY! and his propositions are built upon nothing but your dishonor. I have heard of parliaments impeaching ministers, but here is a minister who impeaches parliament; nay, the parliamentary constitution itself; and he proposes to you to substitute the British parliament in your place; to destroy the body which restored your liberties; and to restore that body which destroyed them. Against such a proposition, were I expiring on the floor, I should beg to utter my last breath, and to record my dying testimony.”

This brilliant declamation was answered, in a speech less eloquent than argumentative, by the new chancellor of the exchequer, Mr. Corry; and the debate was prolonged till ten o'clock the next morning, when there appeared to be 96 votes only in favor of the amendment, to 138 who supported the address in the original form: majority, 42.

A message was delivered to each house of parliament on the 5th of February, from the lord-lieutenant, intimating, that it was the king's desire that the resolutions passed by the British parliament should be submitted to the consideration of the Irish legislature, and expressing a hope, that the grand object to which they had a reference, might be completed by the joint wisdom of the two parliaments, and the loyal concurrence of the people. On this interesting occasion, Lord Castlereagh, the secretary of state, arose, and gave a comprehensive view of the measure proposed, recommending it by arguments similar to those which had been employed by Mr. Pitt, and other advocates of the union in the British parliament, whilst the members of opposition contested these with equal ability.

The whole of this important business being concluded, Lord Castlereagh, on the 27th of March, moved an address to his majesty from the commons, declaring their approbation of the resolutions transmitted to them, “which they considered as wisely calculated to form the basis of a complete and entire union of the two legislatures; that by those propositions they had been guided in their proceedings; and that the resolutions now offered were those articles, which, if approved by the lords and commons of Great Britain, they were ready to confirm and ratify, in order that the same might be established for ever by the mutual consent of both parliaments.” This address having been agreed to by both houses, it was instantly transmitted to Britain by Lord Cornwallis.

The Duke of Portland, on the 2d of April, informed the house of peers, by a message from the king, “That it was with the most sincere satisfaction his majesty found himself enabled to communicate to this house the joint address of his lords and commons of Ireland, laying before his majesty certain resolutions, which contain the terms proposed by them for an entire union between the two kingdoms. His majesty, therefore, earnestly recommended to the house to take all such further steps as might best tend to the speedy and complete execution of a work so happily begun, and so interesting to the security of his majesty's subjects, and to the general strength and prosperity of the British empire.” After returning an address of thanks, the papers were fully investigated on the 21st, when Lord Holland delivered a very animated speech against the principle of the union; adverting to the solemn assurance of ministers, “That, however desirable in their judgments the union of the two countries might appear, it ought not to be accepted, unless it were the pure and spontaneous offer of the parliament of Ireland, uninfluenced by corruption and menace.” He appealed to the feelings of all, if intimidation and corruption had not been practised, for the purpose of securing a majority in both houses of the Irish parliament. The objections of Lord Holland were over-ruled, and the house went into a committee; the articles of the union, as drawn up by the Irish legislature, were distinctly discussed and agreed to, with very trifling alterations, and without any remarkable opposition. The royal assent was given to this important bill on the 2d of July.

State of the deserted Army in Egypt.—Charges against the First Consul, of deliberate Murder, and of poisoning his sick Soldiers.—Kleber's Indignation at Bonaparte's Departure.—The Consul's Proclamation to the Army of the East.—Capture and Treaty of El-Arisch.—Renewal of Hostilities.—Murder of Kleber.

CHAP. II.

WHILE Bonaparte, on his return to France, was conspiring against the republican form of government, which he had so often and so solemnly pledged himself to protect, his absence occasioned no small degree of sensation in Egypt. The army, abandoned to its fate, considered his conduct as treacherous; and the soldiers, losing all their respect for his person, loaded him with execrations. At this period they began to investigate his late conduct, and justly censure some of his actions. Charges of the deliberate murder of his enemies, and even of his own soldiers, were brought against him, and though the republican writers endeavoured to exculpate their hero by stating, that those charges were bare assertions; yet, unfortunately for the credit of Bonaparte, the most damning proofs of his infamy are on record. Mr. Morier, secretary to the Earl of Elgin, then the British ambassador at Constantinople, was the first who gave publicity, in Europe, to this horrible transaction, and his testimony was amply supported by that of Dr. Wittman and Sir Robert Wilson.

It was also alleged at this time, that Bonaparte in his retreat from Acre, had poisoned 580 of his own wounded soldiers! This detestable deed was first discovered to the world by Mr. Morier and Sir Robert Wilson, who collected full particulars on the subject:—

"Bonaparte," said he, "finding that his hospitals at Jaffa were crowded with sick, sent for a physician, whose name should be inscribed in letters of gold; but which, from weighty reasons, cannot be here inserted; on his arrival he entered into a long conversation with him respecting the danger of contagion, concluding at last, with the remark, that something must be done to remedy the evil, and that the destruction of the sick at present in the hospital, was the only measure which could be adopted! The physician, alarmed at the proposal, and bold in the confidence of virtue and the cause of humanity, remonstrated vehemently, representing the cruelty as well as the atrocity of such a murder; but finding that Bonaparte persevered and menaced, he indignantly left the tent, with this memorable observation: 'Neither my principles, nor the character of my profession, will allow me to become a human butcher; and, General, if such qualities as you insinuate, are necessary to form a great man, I thank my God that I do not possess them!'

"Bonaparte was not to be diverted from his object by moral considerations: he persevered, and found an apothecary, who, (dreading the weight of power, but who since has made an atonement to his mind, by unequivocally confessing the fact) consented to become his agent and to administer poison to the sick! Opium, at night, was distributed in gratifying food; the wretched unsuspecting victims banquetted, and, in a few hours, five hundred and eighty soldiers, who had suffered so much for their country, perished thus miserably by the order of its idol!

"If a doubt should still exist, as to the veracity of this statement, let the members of the Institute at Cairo be asked, what passed at the sitting after the return of Bonaparte from Syria? they will relate, that the same virtuous physician, who refused to become the destroyer of those committed to his protection, accused Bonaparte of high-treason in the full assembly, against the honor of France, her children, and humanity: that he entered into the full details of the poisoning of the sick, and the massacre of the garrison, aggravating the crimes, by charging Bonaparte with strangling, promiscuously, at Rosetta, a number of French and Copts, who were ill of the plague; thus proving, that this disposal of the sick was a premeditated plan. In vain Bonaparte attempted to justify himself; the members sat petrified with terror, and almost doubted whether the scene passing before their eyes was not illusion."

The fact is farther authenticated by the French general, Danican. That gentleman met at a lazaretto, in Sicily, with a number of French soldiers, just come from Alexandria. From one of them, who had witnessed the poisoning scene at Jaffa, he received the following anecdote.—"A grenadier, who had lost two brothers, was amongst the unfortunate wretches slightly afflicted with the pestilential disease. From what he had previously observed in the hospital, he had become more suspicious than his comrades in distress, and he had scarcely taken the potion administered when he immediately discharged it, made his way out of the hospital, and, escaping the guard, whom he contrived to pass unseen, he gained the column under the command of Kleber, at whose feet he threw himself, and in the intercession almost of despair, conjured him to let him mount one of the camels, describing what he had escaped from, and venting the most energetic maledictions on the commander-in-chief. The poor wretch, in the most piteous manner, assured General Kleber, that he would keep at a distance from the army, so that they should not be in any danger of catching his disorder. Kleber granted his request; the grenadier was saved and recovered, and was alive when the English landed under the brave Abercromby."

General Kleber felt much indignation that Bonaparte should try to dupe him and the French nation, by ascribing his departure to honorable motives. Kleber's letter, addressed to the directory, is an interesting picture of Egypt at the time of the desertion of Napoleon. He stated, that Bonaparte left that country for France without telling any person whatever; that he was to have met him at Rosetta the next day, but found only his dispatches; not knowing whether he had the good fortune to reach Toulon, he sent a copy of the letter, transferring to him the command of the army, and one to the grand vizier at Constantinople, though he knew that officer was already at Damascus. He told them that the army was reduced a full half, and that their want of military stores was no less alarming than the prodigious diminution of their numbers; that their attempt to establish a foundry had failed, and their powder manufactory kept no pace with their hopes, nor probably ever would; that the troops were naked, which was one of the greatest causes of the dysentery and the ophthalmia which so constantly prevailed; and that the medical men reported, that although the army was so diminished, their sick list was larger than the preceding year; that General Bonaparte had given orders for new clothing the army, but that the poverty of the finances caused this useful design to be postponed. He said, that a few months after their arrival, Bonaparte levied as heavy a military contribution as the country could support, and to repeat it at this time, would only lead to an insurrection; yet, with all this, Bonaparte left no money behind him, nor any thing capable of being turned into money; but that he left a debt of eleven millions, four of which was due as pay to the army; and that the Nile being very low, many provinces would claim the exemption, which he could not in justice object to; that the Mamelukes were dispersed, not destroyed; that Mourad Bey was in Upper Egypt with a numerous body of men; and Ibrahim Bey, at Ghazah, where also had arrived 30,000 men, part of the army of D'jezzar Pacha and the grand vizier; the latter of whom was encamped near Acre, and the English were masters of the Red Sea. Such was the situation in which Bonaparte had left him.

to command the army. El-Arisch being a paltry fort in the desert, the difficulty of victualling it would not allow its being garrisoned by more than 250 men, and that in a short time it must surrender without a shot being fired at it; that the Arabs, who alone could furnish provisions in the desert, now kept away and concealed themselves. Alexandria, he observed, is not a fortress, but an entrenched camp, and could make but a feeble resistance. In this state he was at a loss what to do; he thought he should continue the negotiations begun by Bonaparte, as by that means he would gain a little time; that he would propose the restitution of Egypt to the grand vizier, in the idea, that the grand signior should appoint a pacha as before, and that his troops should remain in the country, and occupy the strong holds, and collect the duties till the French made peace with England; he feared this would not be attended to; he was aware of the importance of Egypt, but that they wanted a navy; and peace with the Porte was the only way of getting rid of an enterprise no longer capable of attaining the object for which it was undertaken; that so far from home he could scarcely think of any thing but the safety and honor of the army he commanded; he sent an estimate of what they stood in need of, and a recapitulation of the debts left unpaid by Bonaparte; just as he was closing his dispatches, he added, he had received advice that fourteen or fifteen Turkish vessels were at anchor before Damietta, waiting for the fleet of the capoutan pacha, having on board from fifteen to twenty thousand men, besides which, there were 15,000 at Ghazah, and the grand vizier was marching from Damascus; that he could not possibly get together more than 5000 men able to take the field against him, but that he would try his fortune if he did not gain time by negotiation.

After stating the wants of the army, General Kleber particularised in his letter the estimate of debts owing by Bonaparte when he fled, which shewed he kept no faith with those he invaded, or those he led to invade them. The army was in arrears upwards of four millions of livres, and the total amounted to more than eleven millions. On their first arrival requisitions had been made in all the towns for the subsistence of the troops, which had never been paid for; and extraordinary contributions had been levied upon the tradesmen, merchants, &c. The effects of the Mamelukes were also seized; and their wives made to pay an extraordinary imposition. The eleven millions did not include what was due to the provinces for the supplies in kind, with which the troops were furnished during their march.

He concluded by observing, that as long as the army of Egypt was engaged in hostilities, there could be no foreign trade; nor could the receipts be possibly made to answer the expenses, and that peace alone could place the receipts on a satisfactory footing.

After leaving Egypt, Bonaparte shewed no intentions to induce the Parisians to think that the French arms were not quite victorious in that quarter, and that the British possessions in India would not shortly be annexed to France. So well did he dissemble any concern he might be supposed to have for his comrades, that he ordered a company of comedians to be sent to Egypt to entertain the deserted army. Those who were willing to go, were to send their applications to the commissary of the government. Fouché was ordered to put in requisition the women of the town at the Palais Royal. Near 600 females were assembled, to be sent to the army of the east, with the comedians. Little did the Frenchmen in Paris imagine that the army was threatened with destruction, at the time the first consul had conferred the command on Kleber.

A proclamation to the army of the east acquainted them with Bonaparte's new rank in the state.

"THE CONSUL BONAPARTE TO THE ARMY OF THE EAST.

"SOLDIERS,—The consuls of the republic often think on the army of the east.

"France knows all the influence of your conquests for the restoration of her commerce, and the civilization of the world.

"All Europe has her eyes fixed upon you. I, myself, am frequently in thought among you.

"In whatever situation the chances of war may place you, be always the soldiers of Rivoli and Aboukir, and you will be invincible.

"Repose in Kleber that unbounded confidence which you had in me; he deserves it.

"Soldiers! think on the day when you will come back victorious to the sacred land; it will be a day of joy and glory for the whole nation.

(Signed) "BONAPARTE."

The army of Egypt, however, could not be cheered by vain promises: being entirely shut out from all communication with Europe, they stood in need of many implements of war. Notwithstanding the progress that had been made in mechanics and chemistry, the troops experienced a deficiency of fire-arms, gunpowder, and lead, which were but inadequately supplied by means of the manufactories of Cairo. In addition to this, the soldiers, unaccustomed to the food and climate of the country, were subject to frequent maladies, and while they all languished to return to their native land, numbers perished by fatigue, disease, and the sword of the enemy.

Notwithstanding some partial descents at Damietta and Cosseir had lately proved abortive, and Mourad Bey was again overthrown, the grand vizier, solicitous of rescuing a favorite province from those who had obtained possession of it by force of arms and false pretences, had assembled a numerous, although undisciplined, army for this purpose, and the pachas were repairing to his standard from every part of Asiatic Turkey as far as Mount Caucasus.

The situation of Kleber, the commander-in-chief, was exceedingly critical, the ports of Egypt being blockaded by the English, so as to prevent the arrival of succours from Europe. The plague had exhibited symptoms of unusual malignity, and within the space of a single year nearly one third of the republican army had been cut off. Kleber accordingly deemed himself at liberty to renew, or rather to continue, the negotiations begun by his predecessor; on the express invitation of Commodore Sir Sidney Smith, who possessed the entire confidence of the Turkish government, he deputed two confidential persons (General Dessaix and citizen Poussielque) who repaired on board the Tigre, on purpose to settle the terms, in consequence of which Egypt was to be delivered up.

During these discussions, the Ottoman army appeared before the fortress of El-Arisch with fifty pieces of cannon; and the garrison, like the rest of the troops, discontented at their situation, and considering themselves abandoned, surrendered after an attack of seven days, carried on under the direction of an English officer (Colonel John Douglas) although General Regnier had marched at the head of a strong detachment, on purpose to raise the siege.

This unexpected event contributed greatly to the success of the treaty, which was at length concluded, Jan. 24, between General Dessaix and Poussielque, administrator-general of finance, plenipotentiaries on the part of the general-in-chief, Kleber, and their excellencies Moustapha Reschid Effendi, Testudar, and Moustapha Ras-siche Effendi, Reijou, plenipotentiaries on the part of his highness the supreme vizier. The conditions were highly favorable to both nations; for, while the French were allowed to return home with all the honors of war, Egypt, the object of contention, was to be restored to the Ottoman Porte.

The treaty consisted of twenty-two articles; in which it was expressly stipulated, that there should be an armistice during three months, for the purpose of making necessary preparations for the embarkation of the army; that the forts of Cathié (Catich) and Salabié should be delivered up on the 10th day at farthest; that the town of Mansoura should be evacuated on the 15th day; Damietta and Belbeis, on the 20th; Suez, six days previous to the evacuation of Cairo, which was to be delivered up in forty days, or forty-five at farthest; the other places situated on the eastern bank of the Nile, should be evacuated on the 10th day, and the Delta fifteen days after the evacuation of Cairo. The prisoners on each side were to be mutually restored, and none of the inhabitants to be molested on account of their connection with the French, to whom provisions were to be furnished; and 3000 purses advanced, on purpose to facilitate the object of the treaty. A purse is about 40*l.* sterling; 3000 amounting to 120,000*l.* at a medium. It was also expressly agreed, that passports should be granted by the Sublime Porte as well as by Great Britain and Russia, and that nothing should be attempted against the army until its safe arrival in France.

Though this convention might have been productive of some good effects, as it would have stopped the effusion of human blood, and prevented an enormous expenditure of treasure, yet the British ministry, actuated by the apprehension of the consequences to be expected from the return of a disciplined army to Europe at this critical period, was determined to prevent it. Secret orders were, therefore, transmitted to Vice-admiral Lord Keith, who then commanded in the Mediterranean, disavowing the authority of Sir Sidney Smith, and enjoining him "not to consent, on any account, to the return of the French army to France, or to their capitulating in any other manner than jointly to the allied powers, whose forces were employed against them, and surrendering as prisoners of war."

These orders were afterwards revoked by a subsequent dispatch to Lord Keith, dated March 28, in which, after expressing his majesty's disapprobation of the terms entered into by the capitulation of El-Arisch, and declaring Captain Sir Sidney Smith not to be authorised, either to enter into or sanction any such agreement, the admiral received intimation, that "His majesty, from a scrupulous regard to the public faith, has judged it proper that his officers should abstain from any act inconsistent with the engagements to which Captain Sir Sidney Smith had erroneously given the sanction of his majesty's name."

Long before the receipts and even the date of these new orders, the war had been renewed. General Kleber having delivered up several places to the Turks, was, when acquainted that Lord Keith would not ratify the treaty, in a worse situation than when he began to negotiate.

The grand vizier, adhering to the conditions of the treaty, demanded that the citadel of Cairo should be delivered up at the expiration of forty days, which was near approaching. This the French general peremptorily refused. By giving up the only fortified place he held in Upper Egypt, and shutting himself in Alexandria, he would soon have been forced to capitulate without terms. He determined to keep the power he held, and the letter from Lord Keith was the reason he gave his army for renewing hostilities. The English admiral stated his orders not to sanction the treaty of El-Arisch, and informed General Kleber, "that all ships met returning to France would be detained as prizes, and all on board be prisoners of war."

In the morning of the 20th of March, the French troops cannonaded the Turkish advanced posts at Maturia, two leagues from Cairo; their camp was at Heliopolis. The grand vizier advanced, the French being drawn up in two lines; some Janizaries charged the French with much bravery, but were obliged to retreat. The French were 15,000 strong, with cavalry and dromedaries. The Turks could muster 80,000 troops in a few hours. For the short time the battle lasted it was fought with great fury; but the skill of the small number set the large at defiance. A dreadful fire of artillery and musketry threw the Turks into confusion, while the enemy rushed on them; 40,000 men fled in every direction, and they could not be rallied.

As the Turkish commander was not secure in his camp, he was forced to abandon it, the French having advanced to cut off his retreat; they took nineteen pieces of cannon and much camp equipage. The Turks lost about 8000 killed, besides wounded and prisoners. The people of Cairo favored the Turks, and the few French left in the city were put to death. This, most probably, would have induced Kleber to have demolished it, if it was not indispensable to him; with little difficulty he retook it, April 25, and laid it under a contribution of two millions of livres, which paid the arrears of the army, and enabled them to wait for the time of the usual imposts for the current expenses. The people, surprised to see the vizier, the greatest man they knew, defeated, were satisfied that the endeavours of the Turks to get the country would be ineffectual; they looked on Egypt as the property of the French, and began to have confidence in them.

Kleber, wishing to benefit by the good-will of the inhabitants in Cairo, prevailed on them to raise a corps of 500 men; these he trained to arms and clothed in the French uniform, intending to augment them as circumstances should require. He likewise induced the Christians and Mussulmen to enroll themselves in the demi-brigades, where they would sooner learn the French discipline. These enrollments became frequent in Upper Egypt; one brigade soon recruited 300 men. Kleber raised a Greek legion, which amounted to near 1500 men.

There being great difficulty in procuring carriages when wanted, as the Arabs who let out their camels generally disappeared, Kleber had a park of 500 camels, which, when the troops were not in the field, were employed on useful purposes. He purchased horses and camels for the cavalry and artillery; he established flying bridges over the Nile, and settled communications between the different stations of the troops.

BOOK IV.

CHAP. II.

The French general continued actively employed in doing every thing for the comfort and protection of the army; he laid plans for works to be raised at Cairo, to keep the inhabitants in check, and command the avenues to the city; and he stopped many peculations on the soldiery, whose situation he improved considerably.

The friendship of a formidable enemy was at this period conciliated by General Kleber, who entered into a treaty with Mourad Bey, and ceded to him the provinces of Girge and Assuan, on the express condition that he should hold them of the French Republic, and pay the same yearly subsidy that was formerly received by the Ottoman Porte.

The Turkish fleet appeared off Alexandria in May. Kleber, not knowing whether troops were on-board, marched with a body of troops from Cairo, and at Rhamanieh was informed that the capoutan pacha wanted merely if possible to open a negociation; he prohibited the landing of any Turkish agent, and returned to Cairo, leaving a flying camp to march to any part of the coast, or towards Syria.

The battle of Heliopolis was not followed by any steps against the Turks, still in power on the side of the desert, which, it seems, was owing to General Menou, who might have been the cause of the commander-in-chief's not proceeding to more active hostilities. This general, for six months, had orders to repair to Cairo for several purposes, but though by his answers he was always ready to depart, and was most anxious to meet the enemy, he remained at Rosetta.

When General Menou arrived at Cairo he objected to the command of that place; Upper Egypt, where he wished to travel, was offered to him, but this he likewise objected to; at length Kleber said to him in a letter, that having offered him the most desirable commands, he had only to add that of commander-in-chief. Menou chose Upper Egypt, but still remained at Cairo. At this time various reports injurious to Kleber, and meant to deprive him of the confidence of the army, were circulated through Cairo.

When General Kleber was leaving Cairo for Rhamanieh, he wrote to General Regnier to take the command of Cairo, and watch Upper Egypt while he was on the coast. The express lost his way, and Regnier did not reach Cairo till Kleber had gone. Menou asked for the command of Cairo, which Kleber gave him, and advised him to consult with General Regnier, if there was any movement on the side of Syria. When Regnier arrived at Cairo, he gave Menou every information he possibly could.

General Kleber, on his return, shewed Regnier a note he had ordered to be written in answer to a letter from Mr. Morier, secretary to Lord Elgin, sent from Jaffa; he conversed with Regnier relative to his plan of proceeding with the Turks; and told him that he purposed to decline all intercourse with the Turkish and English commander-in-chief, while he endeavoured to open a correspondence with Constantinople; by this means he hoped to be able to prevail on the Turks to consent to a neutrality till a general peace.

General Kleber having reviewed the Greek legion, came to Cairo to look over some repairs doing to his house; he was walking with his architect on the terrace in his garden, June 14, when he was several times stabbed by a poniard. The assassin followed Kleber from Ghazah, and having got into the house with the workmen, seized the moment when Kleber was deeply engaged in conversation. When the news got wind, the generals assembled at the house of General Damas, where the body was carried. The assassin was arrested and examined. The sheiks and agas of the city were also sent for in order to prove if this act of violence had a more extensive plan. A discussion then arose between Generals Menou and Regnier relative to a successor to Kleber. The former maintained that he was unqualified for the command; that he was less known by the troops than General Regnier, and added, that he had already refused the commander-in-chief on other occasions; he declared on his word of honor that he would sooner resign as a general officer than accept the command, and if it were imposed on him, he would order General Regnier to assume it.

General Regnier observed, that the law ordered the oldest general officer to take the command till the pleasure of government was known; that in the mean time he could issue his orders as commandant of Cairo; as Menou came to no resolution, he took him aside and told him that the business should be postponed to a time of less difficulty. Menou, however, insisted he could not take the command; that he was unknown to the troops, who were, perhaps, not in his favor from his change to the mussulman religion. "Change of religion," Regnier observed, "was no obstacle; it would make his authority more easy to the people of the country, and they would assist him with their best advice; at all events he ought to take the lead at present as commandant of Cairo."

The next day General Menou took the title of commander-in-chief ad interim, and General Regnier was appointed president of the commission to try the assassin.

After Kleber's interment, and the execution of the assassin, who was condemned to be impaled alive, and his body to be devoured by the birds of prey, General Menou assumed the title of commander-in-chief: the army saw him succeed their former general with great reluctance; in several corps murmurs were heard, but the generals appeased them, hoping that Menou's knowledge of business would cause him to direct the civil powers well, and that in actual service he would consult their military experience.

The French government had accounts of the renewal of hostilities in July, and this revived the hope of their being able to keep Egypt, as a Turkish army could not expect to recover it. The arrival of the news of Kleber's death was as mysterious as the general's assassination; it was announced in the Paris gazettes by two letters said to have been received over land from Constantinople; of the authors of, or the motives which led to, the murder of the French commander, no satisfactory account was ever obtained. General Menou accused the Turks of the guilt of it, and alleged that the assassin was a fanatic, dispatched from Ghazah by the aga of the janisaries for the wicked purpose.

Menou addressed a letter to Sir Sidney Smith, dated at Cairo, acknowledging the letter he wrote from on-board the Tigre; and telling him, that as an execrable murder deprived the French army of their leader, he had undertaken to command them; that the Turks, unable to conquer the French at El-Arisch, used daggers, which cowards alone make use of; that a janisary sent from Ghazah committed this horrid act; the murder should be made known to all nations, who were equally interested in avenging it; that he, like Sir Sidney, detested the horrors of war, and wished to see an end to its misery; but he would act in no wise contrary to the honor of the French republic and her armies; that 150 Englishmen were prisoners of war at Cairo; that as they had been taken on the coast and without arms, he was certain the consuls would have approved his conduct had he sent them back; but the Turks detained Citizen Baudet, Adjutant of General Kleber; though he went on a parley, and even among barbarians his person should have been held sacred. He said, he had been obliged against his will to use reprisals against the English, but they should be released the moment Citizen Baudet reached Damietta, and should be there exchanged for Mustapha Pacha and other Turkish commissaries; his honor was concerned in settling this business, and it regarded 150 of his countrymen; he stated that he hoped to see the war which had so long disturbed the peace of the whole world end with enthusiastic joy; the French and English nations should esteem and not destroy each other, and if they treat, it must be on conditions honorable to both.

Sir Sidney Smith, in his answer, expressed the most heartfelt sorrow for the tragical fate of General Kleber; he immediately communicated the news to the grand vizier and the Ottoman ministers, and nothing less than his details could make them credit the information; Sir Sidney added, that the grand vizier formally declared he had not the slightest intimation of those guilty of the assassination, and he expressed himself satisfied with the veracity of the declaration. He also observed, that when the capoutan pacha, who was then off Alexandria, joined the squadron, the exchange of the aid-de-camp Baudet might be carried into effect, but he could not see why he made the release of 150 English, shipwrecked at Cape Brulos, depend on what related to himself and the Porte only; he expected from his good faith and justice that Captain Bural, his officer and crew, would be allowed to return; he expressed his confidence in the good faith of General Menou, that he was equally averse with him to the war, and wished it was over, but that he in the mean time would prosecute hostilities as he has hitherto done, and strive to make himself worthy the esteem of his brave troops. As General Kleber, he said, in the late preliminaries agreed to, did not give him to understand the treaty should be ratified by the consuls; it appeared now like a refusal to evacuate Egypt; and the grand vizier required an answer on that head; the evacuation of Egypt being an object of so much interest to the cause of humanity, the mode of doing it was still open; if he refused they should exert all their means to compel them to accept conditions not perhaps so favorable as those already agreed on. As the admiral, under whose orders he acted, was at a great distance, he was authorized to agree to such arrangements as circumstances might require, and though he could not offer any new proposition, he would receive all that might be made; and he would adhere to the instructions of his court, which he knew dealt on the principle of equity and good faith.

Account of Abbé Sieyes and his Contemporaries.—Effects of the Consular Government.—Disturbances in the western Departments.—Bonaparte's Proclamation on the Occasion.—Surrender of the Chiefs.—Character of Count Louis de Frotté.—His Execution.

BOOK IV.

CHAP. III.

1799.

WE have, in the first chapter of this book, mentioned that Abbé Sieyes was, on the establishment of the consular government, rewarded with a pension. This act of "national gratitude," as it was termed, was generally understood to be a contrivance of Bonaparte's for lowering, and indeed for humbling Sieyes in the eyes of the French nation. The legislative bodies were instructed, not only to make an offer to him, but to pass a law for compelling the abbé to accept the estate of Crosne, in the department of the Seine and Oise.

Crosne is about four leagues from Paris, in a charming valley near Villeneuve St. George. Part of it joined the seat of the ex-director Barras. On another side it is bounded by the forest of Semart, famous for being the residence of hermits, and a hunting place of the former sovereigns of France. It fell to the nation by the failure of Serilly, the treasurer of war, who owed much money to the nation. Sieyes signified his acceptance of this estate by the following letter to the legislative bodies:—

"CITIZEN REPRESENTATIVES,—The minister of justice has just transmitted to me the law, decreeing to me a national reward.

"Permit me to express, how deeply I am penetrated with gratitude to you for so honorable a mark of your esteem.

(Health and respect.) "SIEYES."

Sieyes was born at Frejus, where Bonaparte landed when he returned from Egypt. He took orders, became a cure, was made a vicar-general, and then a canon; he afterwards rose to the chancellorship of the church of Chartres, and was invested with the employment of counselor commissary in Paris. This was never given but to the superior clergy of France. He possessed much knowledge in the belles-lettres; his favorite studies, however, were politics, metaphysics, and economics. He spent most of his time in Paris, and associated with d'Alembert, Diderot, Condorcet, and the other littérati. It is probable that Sieyes might not have risen from obscurity if the revolution had not made him display his talents. He sent out the publication entitled, "What is the Tiers Etât?" This work was the most fashionable book in Paris.

When numbers of troops were drawn about the capital, the deputies in the popular interest had reason to be fearful for their safety. Sieyes stated to the assembly, that no troops should be nearer than ten leagues to where the states-general were sitting, and proposed an address to the king, to order the troops to withdraw from Versailles. On the king's being attacked in his palace by the mob, a secret committee, consisting of the Duke of Orleans, Mirabeau, La Clos, and the Abbé Sieyes, was formed in a village near Paris. They meant to place the Duke of Orleans so that he must have the command of the populace, and possess a decisive weight in the national assembly; Sieyes was then a zealous royalist.

He was author of the "Declaration of the Rights of Man," decreed by the national assembly. When the convention voted the punishment of Louis, a number of members waited till they heard his opinion. It was understood that opinion would decide the fate of the king. Sieyes at length mounted the tribune—an awful silence prevailed—he interrupted it with "Je suis pour la mort!" (I am for death!) and instantly withdrew. He then lived quite concealed from the public eye, till the death of the execrable Robespierre, when leaving his retreat he published "Memoirs of his own Life." From that time he began his brilliant career, and he was fixed upon to regulate the external affairs of the republic. He suggested the idea of making separate treaties with the coalesced powers, in order to create disagreements that might hurt the royal confederacy. His plans for enlarging the republic were unfolded in 1795; he advised the keeping of the Austrian Netherlands, and went to the Hague to conclude the treaty with Holland. So highly were his services held, that he was elected one of the five members of the executive directory, which, however, he declined. He was afterwards appointed a member of the national institute.

In 1797 he narrowly escaped assassination from a pistol, by the Abbé Poulle, and was so abused by lampoons that he was compelled to leave Paris; but, on his return, he became one of the most active of the legislature. He was appointed ambassador to Berlin, where he served the republic by preserving the friendship of the King of Prussia, which continued firm during an arduous contest. He was paid much attention while he was there, and on the king's birth-day went to court, but was late: the chamberlain being consequently perplexed where to place him without disturbing the other ambassadors—"No matter," said he, "the first place will be that occupied by the ambassador of the French republic," and cheerfully took the first vacancy that offered. On his return to France the king attended him to the frontiers, and gave him his portrait richly ornamented with diamonds. On his arrival from Prussia he was elected a director, and found little difficulty in effecting the revolution with Bonaparte; his influence was great, and this he used to accomplish his designs without any suspicion of his being inimical to the constitution which he was determined to destroy. Several of the new governments were ascribed to Sieyes; and he did much towards the consular one. The great Edmund Burke said, that Sieyes had constitutions ready suited to every time and fancy, and that no fancier of constitutions need go unsatisfied. He opened his mind to Bonaparte too far to retreat, and accepted the estate of Crosne because he could make no better terms with him. He was afterwards chosen president of the conservative senate, and at last became a simple senator.

The ex-director, Roger Ducos, whose only merit was said to be, that he prevented the other two from jostling one another, was rewarded with a similar gift. This man was almost unknown till he was appointed director. He was chosen president of one of the councils.

The residence of the first consul (Bonaparte) was in the palace of the Thuilleries, the same suite of apartments that had been occupied by the unfortunate king and queen of France.

Cambaceres was the only one of the three consuls who voted on the trial of the king. His opinion was, that the king should not be executed, unless the republic was invaded by a foreign enemy. He had more suavity of manners than vigor of intellect, and like other lawyers, had been an organ to all parties.

Le Brun, the third consul, was a man of talents, and one of the members of the committee of ancients. He was secretary to the Chancellor Maupeou, the most arbitrary of the ministers of Louis XV. He was an avowed loyalist, and had the name of a poet.

The French, in general, were pleased with the change that had taken place in the constitution; for having been long ill-governed, they trusted, by this alteration, that the national affairs would be conducted with greater vigor and ability. The public funds kept rising, and tranquillity prevailed in Paris. The fortunate usurper was determined to avail himself of the new enthusiasm in his favor; that enthusiasm of which every one knows the French nation is so highly susceptible; and, by displaying an anxiety to relieve the wants of the people, he every day became more popular.

But tranquillity was far from being universal; the western departments still manifested a spirit of disaffection. At the close of the year 1799, the force of the royalists, or Chouans, in Brittany and Normandy, amounted to 60,000. They threatened the town of Quimper, of which they were at one period in possession. Several garrisons were disposed by government on the coasts of Flanders and Picardy for obstructing their progress. The army of loyalists in Normandy, under the command of Louis de Frotté, was considerable. A part of this army, called the division of Evreux, at Pacy, near Evreux, stopped the dispatches for government from Brest, and Mr. Ingaut, of St. Maure, a chevalier of St. Louis, and commandant of the division at Evreux, had published a proclamation in the name of Louis XVIII., inviting the loyal French to rally around the standards of their defenders, against the new usurper of the monarchy, adding these remarkable words:—

"Whether these ambitious men assume the title of directors or of consuls, or substitute, in the room of the old institutions, a new code, be assured that you will have only one tyrant instead of another. Remember our oath, never to sheath our swords till we have destroyed the enemies of our august sovereign."

The other chiefs of the loyalists of Normandy and Brittany published similar proclamations. By letters from the department of La Manche, (the channel,) it appeared, that a body of loyalists, who had been defeated at La Foix, where they had lost 2000 men, had rallied in the forest of St. Lever, and that General Count de Buais, with his division, had not quitted the cantons which border on the Orne and the Maas; and, on the Ville and Villaine, Fronca, with his division, had overrun all Brittany, and seemed to direct their march to Avranches, in the neighbourhood of which place were spread detachments of one, two, and three hundred men, who levied contributions, arms, and provisions. It was believed, that the Russian troops, who had come to pass the winter in the isles of Jersey and Guernsey, were destined to favor the movements of the loyalists, and even to join them.

Bonaparte, and all the members of the new government, expressed a desire of peace, not only with the royalist armies in France, but even a great number of the emigrants. The Duke of Liancourt (whose name had been struck off from the list of emigrants) was appointed superintendent of the police; and the minister of police wrote letters to the commissioners of the armies of the north, censuring the harsh and inhuman behaviour of the men who had conducted from Calais to Ham the unfortunate emigrants who had been driven aground on the coast of France, the Dukes of Choiseul, Vibraye, and Montmorency, and twenty-seven others. This spirit of moderation on the part of the first consul did not yet rest on sure foundations; his authority, newly established by revolutionists, was not sufficient for the exercise of that lenity which it was his interest to display; still less had he the power of restoring to the emigrants their possessions. Unhappily, a great number of these, as well as of priests, fondly trusting in the first appearance of moderation, returned, but were repelled from France.

An armistice was agreed upon between General Houdeville, who had before assisted in the pacification of La Vendée; and the Counts de Chatillon, Fourmont, and d'Autichamp, the principal leaders of the insurgents in the western departments. Houdeville addressed the loyalists from head-quarters at Angers, in a proclamation as follows:—

“FRENCHMEN,—The happy change which has taken place in the government, will bring to our nation peace, internal and external. The legislative committees and the consuls of the republic do not belong to any faction. Their object is the happiness and glory of the French nation. They have the firmest confidence in the victories of our armies, and every heart partakes with them in this confidence. There is already a suspension of arms in some of the western departments, and orders have been given for carrying it into execution. It is not to be doubted but the chiefs of insurgents, and the inhabitants of districts, occupied by the republican armies, will submit themselves, without delay, to the laws of the republic. A solid peace in the interior is to be established only by the united efforts of all good citizens, to conciliate and gain mutual affection. All who shall contribute their endeavours to this end, will deserve well of humanity and of their country.”

The conditions of the armistice, in substance, were, that all hostilities of every kind and degree should entirely cease; that all prisoners and hostages on both sides should be set free, but each party to be at liberty still to receive deserters; the number of republican troops in the western departments not to be augmented; correspondence among the republicans to be carried on either by resolutions transmitted from one body to another, or by means of very small detachments; correspondence among the disaffected to be protected by the republicans; requisitions to be made by the republicans for the maintenance of the troops only; hostilities not to be renewed on either side without eight days previous notice; and no proclamation on either side to be published during the suspension of arms.

As these conditions were not adhered to by either party, orders were transmitted to General Houdeville to employ the troops in such a manner that there should not be left alone one rebellious leader. Houdeville undertook the task, and had not a doubt, as he informed the French government, of accomplishing it. It had been reported at Paris, that the English had landed on the coast of Brittany in immense force. Houdeville, in his letter to the minister at war, said that all such reports were either entirely false or greatly exaggerated. He added, “That nothing could be more desirable than a descent by the English, as in that case the war might be finished at once; for the great difficulty was to find them.”

A great number of conscripts, who had hid themselves in the woods between Chateaufort and Tours, in order to evade the republican armies, joined the loyalists, who extended themselves from this quarter into the departments of Loire and Chair and those of the Indre and Loire, at the same time a battalion of conscripts at Chalons refused to obey the orders of the minister of war.

At this critical juncture the language held out by Bonaparte in the disaffected departments was this.

“An impious war threatens a second-time to inflame the departments of the west. It becomes the duty of the first magistrates of the republic to arrest its progress, and extinguish it in its birth. But they are loth to employ force until they have exhausted the means of persuasion and justice. The artificers of these troubles are the senseless partisans of two men who have no honor, and who neither derive their rank from their virtues, nor their misfortunes from their achievements. They are farther traitors, sold to the English, or robbers who foment civil discord only as the means of sheltering them from the punishment due to their crimes.—With such men it is not the duty of government to keep any measures, or to make any declaration of its principles. It is to citizens dear to their country, who are seduced by their arts; it is to these citizens that the light of the truth is due.

“Unjust laws have been promulgated and executed; arbitrary acts have alarmed the security of the citizens, and the liberty of conscience. Every where random inscriptions on the list of emigrants have struck citizens, who had never quitted their country or even their homes. In a word, the great principles of social order have been violated.

“It is in order to remedy these acts of injustice, and these errors, that a government, founded on the sacred basis of liberty, equality, and a system of representation, has been proclaimed to, and recognized by, the nation. The constant inclination, as well as the interest and the glory of the first magistrates, which the nation has given to itself, will be, to close all the wounds of France: and never yet has this disposition been falsified by any act originating with them.

"The disastrous law of the forced loan, and the still more disastrous law of hostages, have been repealed. Individuals exiled without trial have been restored to their country and to their families. Every day has been marked, and shall be, by deeds of justice. The council of state labors incessantly for the reformation of bad laws, and a better arrangement for raising the public contributions.

"The consuls declare, moreover, that the liberty of religious worship is guaranteed by the constitution; that no magistrate dares to offer it any violence; that no man dares to say to another—you shall exercise such and such a mode of worship, on such and such a day.

"The law of the 20th of May, 1795, which leaves to the citizens the free use of the edifices destined to religious purposes, shall be faithfully fulfilled. All the departments ought to be equally under the authority of general laws. But the first magistrates will extend their especial cares, and take a particular interest in the agriculture, manufacturers, and commerce of those that have suffered the greatest calamities. Government will pardon and shew grace to the penitent. Their forgiveness and indulgence will be unlimited. But it will strike those who, after this declaration, shall dare to resist the sovereign will of the nation.

"Frenchmen, inhabitants of the departments of the west, rally round the constitution, which invests the magistrates whom it has created with the power, and made it their duty, to protect the citizens; which secures them equally from the instability of the laws, and from their severity. Let those who wish the prosperity of France separate themselves from those who persist in their efforts to seduce them, in order to deliver them over to the chains of tyranny and the domination of the stronger. Let the good inhabitants of the country return to their fire-sides, and resume their useful labors. And let them be on their guard against the insinuations of those who would throw them again into feudal slavery. If, after all the measures just taken by government, there should yet be found men daring enough to provoke a civil war, there would remain to the chief magistrates only the melancholy but necessary duty of subduing them by force. But we, even all of us, will henceforth feel only one sentiment; the love of our country. The ministers of the god of peace will be the first movers of reconciliation and concord. Let them speak to their hearts the language which they have learnt in the school of their master. Let them repair to the temples, again opened to them; to offer, together with their fellow-citizens, the sacrifice which will expiate the crimes of war, and the blood which it shed." BOOK IV.

On the same day, December 25, Bonaparte addressed his soldiers as follows:—

"In promising peace to the French nation, I was your organ. I know your valor. You are the men who have conquered Holland, the Rhine, Italy, and made peace under the walls of astonished Vienna.

"Soldiers, it is no longer your business to defend your frontiers: you are now to invade the states of your enemies. There is not one among you who have made different campaigns, but who knows that the most essential duty of a soldier is, with patience and constancy, to suffer privations. Several years of a bad government are not to be repaired in one day.

"It will be a pleasure to me, in the character of first magistrate, to proclaim to the nation the corps, that, by its discipline and valor, shall best deserve to be hailed as the support of their country.

"Soldiers, in due time, I shall be in the midst of you; and astonished Europe shall recollect, that you are a race of brave men."

Although d'Autichamp, Fourmont, and de Chatillon had agreed to a cessation of arms, the other insurgent chiefs persevered in hostile acts, and kept up a correspondence with the British fleet on the coast of Brittany. Hence arose the report, before-mentioned, which was contradicted by General Houdoville. Three English frigates had succeeded in landing four field-pieces, a large quantity of ammunition and provisions, and some chests of silver, all which supplies were received near Muzillac, by a body of ten thousand Chouans, who were provided with sixty or eighty waggons. The waggons, when filled with the stores and provisions, were immediately buried in the earth. The troops, employed afterwards in escorting these stores, were attacked by a body of republican troops, infantry and cavalry, amounting to two thousand. This body set out from Vannes, and came up with the loyalists about a mile and a half from St. Nelt. The engagement which ensued, continued from the morning till four o'clock in the afternoon. The loyalists suffered the loss of two hundred men in killed and wounded, all of whom, however, they carried off, with the convoy, to Plendrem. The close of the day, and the want of provisions, obliged the republicans to fall back to Vannes. In the mean time, while the royalists in their proclamations insisted on two principles, the restoration of their lawful king, and the defence of the country against the soldiers of Bonaparte, the chief consul abolished the oath of hatred to kings and monarchical government, and substituted in its place a simple declaration of fidelity to the constitution.

On the 11th of January, the consuls thus ad-

“Every thing that reason could suggest, the government has done to restore peace and tranquillity to your dwellings. After long forbearance, still farther time has been granted for repentance. A great number of citizens have been brought to a sense of their errors, and have rallied round the government, which, without hatred or revenge, without fear or suspicion, protects all citizens alike, and punishes those who despise their duty. There no longer remain any in arms against France, except some men without faith, as without country, some perfidious instruments of a foreign foe, or brigands, black with guilt, whom indulgence itself knows not how to pardon. The safety of the state, and the security of citizens, require that such men should perish by the sword, and fall under the axe of national justice. A longer forbearance would be a triumph to the enemies of the republic. A valiant force only waits the signal to disperse and destroy these brigands, if that signal must be given. National guards join the force of your arms to that of the troops of the line. If you know among you any partisans of the brigands, arrest them. Let them no where find an asylum against the soldier who pursues them. And if there be any traitors who should dare to receive and defend them, let them perish along with them.

“Inhabitants of the departments of the west, on this last effort depend the tranquillity of your country, the safety of your families, and the security of your properties. By the same blow you will destroy those wretches who strip you, and the enemy who purchase and pay for their crimes.”

On the same day the consuls decreed:—

I. “That no general, or public functionary, should correspond, in any shape, or under any pretext whatever, with the leaders of the rebels.

II. That the national guards of all the communes should take up arms, and expel the brigands from their territories.

III. That the communes, whose population exceeded five thousand inhabitants, should furnish moveable columns, in order to assist other communes of a less numerous population.

IV. That whatever commune should afford an asylum or protection to the brigands, should be treated as rebels; and that such inhabitants as should be taken with arms in their hands, should be instantly put to the sword.

V. That every individual, who instigated rebellion and armed resistance, should instantly be shot.

VI. That the general who commanded the army of the west should put in force all the necessary regulations for organising the national guards, as well as for prescribing the districts which these communes were to watch over and protect: and, that he should issue orders for all the troops, the free companies, and the moveable columns in the pay of the republic, to be exclusively employed in clearing the country, and in pursuing the rebels.”

Bonaparte, on the day after that in which he sent the proclamation to the inhabitants, sent one also to the army of the west; in which he told them, that the mass of the well-disposed inhabitants had laid down their arms, and that there now remained only robbers, emigrants, and hirelings of Britain. “Frenchmen hired by Britain! This could not be done but by men without foresight, without heart, and without honor. March against them, you will not be called on to shew any great exertion of valor. The army is composed of more than sixty thousand brave men. Let me learn shortly that the chiefs of the rebels have perished. Let the generals shew the example of their activity. Glory is to be acquired only by fatigues. If it could be acquired by a residence in great towns, or in good quarters, every man would be in possession of it. You must brave the intemperance of the seasons, the frost, the snow, the excessive cold of the nights: you must surprise your enemy at the break of day, and exterminate those wretches who are a dishonor to the French name. Make a brief but brilliant campaign. Be inexorable to brigands, but observe a severe discipline.”

The expiration of the armistice, between the Chouans and General Houdoville, was fixed at the 7th of January, but it was afterwards prolonged. A short time before the period just mentioned, the division of the royalists, under Chatillon, accepted and signed the conditions of peace. And as other divisions were confidently expected in like manner to do the same, it was decreed by General Brune, who had been appointed to the chief command of the army in the discontented provinces, that it should no longer be called by the name of the army of the west, but by that of the army of England; an insinuation that all Frenchmen were soon to be united, and to fall on England.

When General Brune was appointed to the chief command of the western army, in the council of state, being a member of that body, he rose up and said:—“In the two-fold character of a general officer and a counsellor of state, I am flattered with the choice which, on the present occasion, has been made of me by the first consul. The task imposed on me is a painful one, but I will undertake to unite the French, whatever may be their opinions. Those who are not to be influenced by reason, I will reduce by force of arms. Those who have been led into error, I will pardon. These shall be the principles of my conduct; but I will never forget, that weakness is not less an enemy to moderation than to firmness. It is that which is the ruin of the republics: may the deluded inhabitants of the west return into the bosom of their country; but, may they return as penitent children."

The conciliatory measures pursued by the French government, and particularly the second proclamation of Bonaparte, produced the desired effect on part of the loyalists, while others continued still in the resolution to maintain their cause. General d'Autichamp, who had accepted the armistice at the same time with Chatillon, employed his influence among the Chouans, in the department of Deux Levres, in favor of peace, with success. The armistice, he told them, was prolonged; and he conjured them to do nothing in violation of its conditions. They listened to his advice, and remained peaceably at their respective homes. The example of d'Autichamp was successfully imitated by Fourmont and other chiefs. Few parties of Chouans were to be seen in departments where they had lately appeared in great force. The courier between Nantz and L'Orient reported, as something extraordinary, on the 15th of January, that he had not seen a single Chouan all the way between these cities.

General Brune, on arriving at his head-quarters at Angers, in a letter to the minister-at-war, dated the 21st of January, said, "I enter this day on my command of the army. General Houdoville has been pleased to act as my lieutenant; he commands the left wing of my army. The inestimable General Houdoville has united the inhabitants of La Vendée in peace; I shall henceforth find the Chouans tractable." Thus every thing, in some quarters, wore a peaceful aspect. This was by no means the case in every district and department. A body of six hundred Chouans was cantoned at Soublans, with the design of rousing the inhabitants to arms: this party was dispersed by General Nevot, with the loss of 100 muskets and some prisoners. Considerable parties of Chouans, in the department of the Eure and Loire, were dispersed, by the arrival of a moveable column at Noyent le Ration; but, in other parts, the war on the part of the royalists assumed a more serious aspect. In the principal towns and villages of the department of Dinan, in Brittany, the following injunctions were published, in placards or hand-bills, stuck up on the high walls, and in all the places of general resort:—

I. All public officers, not being priests, who shall receive any act of marriage, at the hands of men under forty years of age, shall be shot.

II. Those who shall marry after such acts, shall have their heads shaven, and their relations shall be condemned to pay a fine.

III. Young men refusing to join and march along with the loyalists, when called on, shall be shot.

IV. All deserters from provisory assemblies shall be shot. BOOK IV.

V. Every man who does not separate himself from the moveable columns of the republicans to which he belongs, shall be shot; and his next relation shall pay a fine, or be shot also. CHAP. III.
1800.

VI. Louis XVIII. and religion, are the principal objects of all Frenchmen's desires.

VII. Whoever shall destroy, or tear, or take down these bills and orders shall be shot.

Such was the state of affairs in the department of Dinan, in Brittany; but the departments in which the resistance of the royalists, or, as it was called, the rebellion, had become the most general, inveterate, and obstinate, were the coasts of the North, Lisle, and Vilaine, Morbihan, and the Nether Loire. These departments accordingly, by two decrees passed the 16th of January, were declared to be out of the protection of the law, and under military government; and extraordinary tribunals were established for the execution of justice in criminal cases. General Brune, who was invested with the most complete and absolute power, set out immediately from Angers, at the head of the main army, on his way to Morbihan, in the department of the Nether Loire. From his head-quarters at Vannes, he addressed to the inhabitants of Morbihan, a proclamation, dated the 13th of February. In this piece, after recapitulating his various efforts for the prevention of bloodshed, and exhorting the deluded people to forsake their perfidious leaders, he said:—

"The day of pardon is nearly past, and I take God and man to witness, that the blood that must be shed is on the heads of the chiefs of the Chouans, of the stipendiaries of England, and of the traitors of their country.

"Within twenty-four hours after the publication of the present proclamation, in all the communes of Morbihan, every unmarried man, from fourteen to fifty years of age, shall appear before the civil or military authority of the place where he shall be, and declare that he is not a Chouan, or that he abjures the party.

"The chiefs of the Chouans shall make a similar declaration, and must likewise procure the arms and stores under their direction to be given up.

"Corps are opened for the reception of deserters, according to their line of service, their rank, and qualifications.

memorials, respecting the means of securing the tranquillity of individuals.

"Such are the last conditions which I offer to the rebels.

"Such is the fatal limit, which, once passed, arms and councils of war must be the only means employed to avenge the insulted nation.

"Pardon to the Frenchmen who have been misled: the traitors deserve death."

In consequence of the near approach of General Brune, with the sword in one hand and the olive-branch in the other, some others of the chiefs, besides those already mentioned, and even whole bodies of men laid down their arms; but others, who had not yet come to the same resolution, were encouraged to stand out still against all the offers and the threats of the republicans, by hopes of assistance from England and from Russia. An active force, consisting of three battalions of the first, second, and third regiments, of British guards, besides cavalry, under the command of Sir Ralph Abercromby, was expected; also the Russian troops quartered in the islands of Guernsey and Jersey, and other Russian troops which were to join them. Towards the end of January, several columns of royalists having formed a junction with the troops under General Domfront, attacked the republicans, but were vigorously repulsed, with the loss of 500 men killed and 50 prisoners. The different parties of the loyalists that still retained their arms and kept together, were every where attacked with vigor, put to flight, or dispersed. In these encounters some of the chiefs were killed, and others, among whom was George, were wounded. Early in February no less a number than 15,000 royalists; or, as they were called by the French, Chouans, laid down their arms, and were united to the republicans.

It seems remarkable, that it was not always the leaders of the royalists, but the common men; that were the most obstinately determined to persevere in resistance and opposition to the republic. The chiefs that were most convinced of the inefficacy of longer resistance, experienced great obstacles to pacification, on the part of the men whom they commanded. When General George gave orders to his people to disband and disperse, they plundered his house. Chatillon, in disbanding his followers, experienced like difficulties: so also did several of the other chiefs. A band, of about three hundred Chouans, destroyed the telegraph of Bourbriac, in the Cotes-du-Nord. The same band put to death one of their conscripts, a young man who had been forced into their ranks, and had thrice deserted. Predatory parties continued also still to levy contributions in different parts of the country; but the spirit of resistance, though not altogether of loyalty, was now broken. The great mass of the people sighed for peace, and began to consider the scattered parties that scoured the country only as enemies to returning tranquillity.

On the 15th of February, a general pacification with the royalists was concluded. All the individuals, known by the name of chiefs of Chouans, with the exception of one, presently to be noticed, laid down their arms at Rosperdin, and returned, unattended by any of their men, to Quimper. A general disarming of all the loyalists took place in all the departments, and an immense quantity of arms, stores, and provisions, fell into the hands of the prevailing party.

The leader of the loyalists that yet remained unsubdued in mind, and undismayed in danger, though forced to retreat, and conceal himself from a hostile and irresistible force, was Count Louis de Frotté, the hero most distinguished by valor, magnanimity, and firmness, among all the loyalists, since the celebrated Charette, of La Vendée.

The count had written a letter to the republican General Guidat, proposing a general pacification of all the Chouans, to which letter he had received an insignificant and evasive answer. The negotiation was protracted beyond the last of the days fixed for the armistice, and the acceptance of the terms of peace offered to the royalists; and Count Louis de Frotté, retiring with his staff and some other officers, lay concealed in an ancient castle in the department of Orne. A letter of one of his aides-de-camp, intercepted by a republican, discovered his retreat. He was taken, together with six of his staff-officers, the faithful companions of his concealment. These were Messieurs de Caumarque, Hugon, and De Verdun, commandants of legions; Monsieur de Cassineux, aid-de-camp to General Frotté; and Messieurs Seguirat and St. Floret, his aides-majors. The count, with his six companions, was sent by General Chamberthac to Verneuil, where they were all of them judged by a military tribunal, and condemned to be shot within twenty-four hours, by the orders of General Lefevre. The ground on which M. de Frotté was condemned, was a letter which was found in the possession of one of his unfortunate companions; in which he devoted himself to the cause of royalty with the most heroic enthusiasm.

He exhibited unparalleled resolution before the military commission: during his trial he called for a glass of wine, and gave a toast ("Vive la Roi!") in exact conformity to the sentiments with which he had been continually actuated.

Next day, February 18, as the count and his followers were conducted on foot to the place of execution, a grenadier happened to observe that he did not keep time, whereupon he immediately assumed the proper style, and marched as if he had belonged to the battalion.

The count and his six unfortunate companions met death with the most undaunted courage. They would not permit bandages to be put on their eyes. Monsieur de Cassineux, his aid-de-camp, being only wounded by the first fire, and still able to stand, said calmly, to the soldiers on duty, fire again; which they did, and dispatched him.

The unhappy aid-de-camp, whose note was the occasion of this mournful catastrophe, driven to the extremity of grief and despair, by his involuntary indiscretion, blew out his own brains with a pistol.

Here was an instance of true Gallic fortitude; in obedience to the will of a foreign usurper, seven heroes fell, without the least symptom of trepidation, whose leader never deceived his adherents, or left his sick or wounded followers to be poisoned or buried half alive! The execution of this chieftain was considered by the first consul as the conclusion of the civil war, who communicated it without delay to the legislative assembly, in which Rœderer rose up, and said, "You will learn, with pleasure, that that part of the French territory, which was put out of the law, is restored to the republic, by the destruction of the rebels that held possession of it. The first consul has given it in charge to me to acquaint you, that Frotté, with his staff-officers, has been taken in a castle, in the department of Orne. There were found upon him a cross of St. Louis, a seal with the arms of France, and some poniards of the manufacture of England." All the members of the legislative body on this rose up, and cried, "Vive la republique."

Bonaparte flattered himself that he had now overthrown the royal and illustrious family of the Bourbons, and that he had totally exterminated the party who had anxiously endeavoured to restore Louis XVIII. When the unfortunate and fugitive prince of that blood, his royal highness the Count d'Artois, or Monsieur, as the royalists thought proper to call him, was made acquainted with the death of M. de Frotté, he immediately paid a visit to the young hero's unhappy father in London; and, with the most affecting sensibility, mingled the tears of condolence with those of the old count. He was a younger brother of General de Frotté, who aided the escape of Sir Sidney Smith from the tower of the Temple, and afterwards served under him, in the rank of major, at the siege of Acre.

American History.—Conduct of the Government of the United States during the French Revolutions.—General Washington's remarkable Declaration to his Fellow-citizens, on his Resignation.—Chicanery of France.—Death and Character of Washington.—Arrival of the American Ambassadors in France.

WE shall, in this chapter, take a cursory retrospect of American affairs; during the almost universal commotions occasioned by the revolutions in France. The spirit of speculation had, for some time, led the people of the United States beyond the limits of fair and legitimate commerce, and exposed them to the censure of the contending powers. The murmurs were so loudly expressed, that the celebrated General Washington, then president, in a speech to congress, prepared the public mind for any discussion that might consequently arise.

The belligerent powers acted upon the principle of the war of 1756, that is, they seized, captured, and confiscated the property of the enemy, wherever they found it. The British were entire masters of the seas, and to them the contraband trade was principally injurious. Against that power a cry was raised in America, and the French faction kept up a clamor against the oppression and tyranny that subjected neutrals to search and detention.

As it soon became necessary to adjust the disputes between the government of the United States and that of Great Britain, the result was, that a treaty was concluded between these two powers. The negociators on both sides entered into a compromise for the sake of peace, but the advantage was on the side of America; for whilst America consented that the belligerent power should retain the right of search, Great Britain agreed, "that the merchandize of the countries at war, which should have been acquired by the subjects of the neutral power, should be carried in neutral vessels." This was abandoning the rule of the war of 1756, and enabling every American, for a few shillings-worth of perjury, to transport a cargo of French, Spanish, or Dutch property, from sea to sea, as his own.

The minister of France (Genet) distributed inflammatory writings, and was followed by his agents, after the American government had insisted upon his recall. Soon after, General Washington, the president of the United States, detailed the particulars of an insurrection that had taken place; which not only shews the character of the government at the time, but throws much light upon some future transactions. This gentleman stated, in his speech to congress, that a few years before, it had been found necessary to make use of the power granted by the constitution to "lay and collect excises." No sort of objection was made in the states, but in the four western counties of Pennsylvania some symptoms of riot and violence appeared.

Congress immediately paid attention to the complaints made, and wished to relieve them; but then mildness was looked on as fear, and associations were formed against the officers employed; further delay was thought impolitic, and legal process was delivered to the marshal against the rioters. The marshal was fired upon, arrested, and kept a prisoner; the house of the inspector was attacked, his papers seized, and his house set on fire and burned. Both these officers fled to the seat of government, it being acknowledged that they wanted to compel the resignation of the inspector, and extort a repeal of the laws of excise, and a change in the conduct of government. On being informed by a justice of the supreme court that the laws were opposed very powerfully, he considered what should be done: he hesitated to call out the militia, but required them to be held in readiness. Commissioners were sent to the disaffected, to represent, that if they did not submit, coercion must be resorted to; that, however, not seeming to subscribe to the mild form of atonement, he was compelled to order the militia to march, 15,000 of whom he put in motion, thinking that a sufficient force to answer every purpose; and as every appearance showed a favorable issue, he returned to the seat of government, to his duties; recommending, that an indemnification be granted to those officers of the United States who had suffered; that the amount would be great, and the example would be striking.

This insurrection was quelled on the first appearance of the troops, but the spirit of it remained unbroken, and the partisans of France endeavoured all they could to overthrow the government. The president did not announce the result of the treaty of amity, &c. till a year after it was signed, and the French government, in the mean time, used every means of annoying the American commerce. The violent party declaimed on the bad consequences that might result from the treaty, and a resolution passed the house, to demand a copy of the instructions given to Mr. Jay, who negotiated the treaty; to this General Washington replied, "that he had considered their resolution, demanding the instructions to the minister, with other documents relative to the treaty with Great Britain; that the nature of foreign negotiations required caution and secrecy, and even when concluded a full disclosure might have a bad effect; and to admit a right to demand such papers, would establish a dangerous precedent; but that he had no disposition to withhold any information which the public good required; but that, every circumstance considered, he could not comply with their request."

It should be observed, that the spirit of party is carried to a violent excess in America. Mr. Jefferson, another celebrated character of the day, was suspected of revolutionary views: he was accused of an intention to overturn the constitution of the United States, of being an enemy of the country, and of a wish to become a tribune of the people. He was, indeed, the declared enemy of every new system, the introduction of which might be attempted; being of opinion, that the existing constitution should be carefully preserved, and defended against all infringements arising from the stretch of executive power. Mr. Jefferson, (who had been in congress some years before,) notwithstanding his opposition to the political principles of General Washington, spoke with great respect of his virtues, and with high esteem of his sound and unerring judgment.

The resignation of General Washington, after being twice president of the republic, displayed consummate loyalty and virtue. This event was accounted for in the most handsome manner, in his declaration to his fellow-citizens. The period, he said, having arrived for the election of a citizen to administer the executive government of the United States, and as their minds must be occupied with that, he thought it time to inform them of his declining to be again chosen, assuring them, that he was influenced by no diminution of zeal in their service or interest, but his wish to enjoy retirement, from which he had been reluctantly withdrawn, and that he meant to have so stated to them when he was last elected, but was overruled by advice of those entitled to his confidence, and he hoped they would not disapprove of his determination to retire; he expressed his gratitude to his country for the many honors it had conferred on him, and the confidence with which it supported him, which he had endeavoured to repay by services faithful and persevering: if the country had derived benefits from these services, the praise was due to them, whose support was the prop of the plans by which they were effected: he impressed on their minds the great regard they should ever possess for their national union; that they should cherish it as the palladium of their safety and prosperity, indignantly frowning upon any attempt to weaken the ties which link its parts together.

"Citizens of a common country," he added,

"that country has a right to their affections: they have fought and triumphed together in common, and the liberty they possess is the work of joint councils and joint efforts." He endeavoured to guard them against the fatal influence of parties, assuring them, "that they could not shield themselves too much against the jealousies which arise from one district misrepresenting the opinions of another, by which they would become alien to each other who ought to be bound by fraternal affection; to their permanent union, a government for all was indispensable; this government, their own choice, had a claim to their support; respect for its authority and compliance with its laws were duties enjoined by the maxims of true liberty—all obstructions to the execution of the laws, and all associations to direct or awe the action of the constituted authorities, served but to organize faction and give it force, and were likely, in course of time, to enable unprincipled men to usurp the reins of government." He exhorted them, in order to preserve their happy state, "to discountenance opposition to its authority, and to resist all innovation, however fair the pretext," and urged them strongly against the baneful effects of party in general. "This," he continued, "is inherent in the nature of man, and is more or less in all governments: parties, it is said, are in free countries useful checks on the government; this may be true, but in elective governments it ought not to be encouraged, and it ought to be mitigated and assuaged, lest in place of warming it should consume." He addressed them at length on the subject of their governments, and cautioned them against a change by usurpation, which generally destroys free governments.

This declaration contained also the following observations:—"Religion and morality are supports of political prosperity; they are the firmest props of men and citizens; every one ought to respect and cherish them. Cherish public credit, but use it as sparingly as can be; avoid expence by cultivating peace, recollecting that preparing for danger often prevents greater disbursements to repel it; avoid leaving burdens on posterity, which you ought yourselves to bear." He advised them with regard to foreign nations, in extending their commercial relations, to have as little political connexion as possible, but to fulfil all their engagements with good faith. "Europe," he remarked, "has a set of interests, which to them have little or no relation; their distant situation enables them to follow a different course; continuing one people, the time is not distant when they may defy external annoyance, and cause their neutrality to be respected. Honesty, he allowed, in all cases, to be the best policy; he wished all their engagements to be strictly observed, but not to be extended; and he told them, that by keeping themselves in a defensive posture, they might trust to temporary alliance for extraordinary emergencies: he hoped the advice of an old friend would make an impression upon them; and he flattered himself it might be productive of some benefit; that it might check the fury of party-spirit, guard them against the mischiefs of foreign intrigue, and the imposition of pretended patriotism: this would be to him a recompence: how far he himself had been guided by what he had advanced, the public records, and other evidences of his conduct, must witness to the world; he was, however, assured, that he was guided by them; he was confident he had committed many errors, but he trusted his country would view them with indulgence, after five and forty years dedicated to its service with zeal. He concluded by anticipating the pleasure he would feel in his retreat, by sharing, in the midst of his fellow-citizens, the influence of good laws and a free government, the favorite object of his heart, and the reward of their mutual cares, labors, and dangers.

Though the dignified conduct of the president encouraged the friends of government, it by no means weakened the opposition; congress and the house of representatives refused to ratify the treaty, or to carry it into effect. The country was reduced to a state of alarm: trade was at a stand, and it was thought the opposition would not rest till they had plunged their country into a war with England; all persons of property dreaded the consequences, and they would not ensure the ships that were wanted to be sent to sea. These troubles were fomented by numbers of strangers, who, from French principles, and being dissatisfied with their own countries, sought refuge in America, where they found as much fault as they did at home, and wished to create the land anew, because they had no new one to go to. These were under the French emissaries, and they strove to make a rupture with England. The mercantile interest prevailed, and the partisans of peace got the ratification consummated, though by a very small majority.

The French party, not satisfied with disgusting the president with the government, were desirous of having a successor appointed of their own party; and not only strove to influence the electors in favor of Mr. Jefferson, but to cast a share of odium upon the government by complaints and threats of war. The following decree was passed by the executive directory, and pompously delivered by the French minister, Adet, to Mr. Pickering, the secretary of state at Philadelphia:

"The executive directory, considering, that, if it becomes the faith of the French nation to respect treaties or conventions, which secure to the flags of some neutral or friendly powers commercial advantages (if they should turn to the benefit of our enemies, either through the weakness of our allies or of neutrals, or through fear, through interested views, or through whatever motive, it would, ipso facto, warrant the inexecution of the articles in which they were stipulated—decrees as follows:—

“All neutral or allied powers shall, without delay, be notified, that the flag of the French republic will treat neutral vessels, either as to confiscation, as to searches, or capture, in the same manner as they shall suffer the English to treat them.

“The minister of foreign relations is charged with the execution of the present resolve, which shall not be printed.

(A true copy.) “CARNOT, President.”

Adet, in his note to the American secretary of state, accompanying this decree, said, he transmitted him a resolution of the French executive respecting the conduct of their ships of war to neutral vessels, and that he doubted not but that the American government would feel that it was dictated by imperious circumstances; that Great Britain, during the war, had used every means to add to that scourge; that it had caused neutral vessels, and particularly American vessels, to be taken into their ports, and Frenchmen and French property dragged from them; that a decree passed the convention, ordering the seizure of American property on board of neutral vessels, stating also, that it should cease when the English respected neutral flags, and that America was excepted from this order, but the conduct of the English caused this exception to be repealed; that American vessels, bound to or returning from French ports, had been still seized by the English, and that they had added to their tyranny by impressing seamen from on board American vessels, and thus strengthened their crews, without the United States having made known to him (Citizen Adet) the steps they had taken to obtain satisfaction for this breach of neutrality. If the French government was obliged to abandon, with respect to them and neutral powers in general, the favorable line of conduct they pursued, the blame must fall on the British, whom the French had been obliged to follow; that neutrals had nothing to dread as to the treatment of their flag, if they caused their neutrality to be respected by the English; the republic, in that case, would respect them; but they must not complain, if France should act to them in the same manner as the English—as a neutral government favoring one power in preference to another, became of course an enemy.

Mr. Pickering, in his reply to Citizen Adet, stated, that the government of the United States rested on their treaty with France, which said, “That free ships should make free goods;” and that being at peace, they had a right to carry the goods of the enemies of France without being subject to capture; but that the decree he alluded to, required that they should renounce this right; that the capture of their vessels carrying French property was warranted by the law of nations; that the United States did not look on themselves bound to give an account to any other government of what they did to protect their citizens; that he was well assured, officially, that the British had issued no orders for capturing American vessels, and that the minister of the United States was informed at Paris, that no order for the seizure of neutral vessels was or would be issued if the British did not seize their vessels; and he wished to know whether the restraints exercised by the English, justify a denial of the rights sanctioned by the treaty with France; whether orders had been given to capture American vessels, and if such existed, the terms of them.

Whilst Adet endeavoured to rouse the French party in America, the directory reckoned so strongly upon being able to get a president chosen from among their friends, that they would not acknowledge the ambassador, appointed to reside at Paris. They were disappointed, and Mr. John Adams, of, as it was called, the English party, was chosen to be chief magistrate. Moderation marked the conduct of the new American government; and though the corsairs of France seized American vessels, and condemned them upon the most frivolous pretences, the Philadelphia government made no reprisal, but thought to bring the enemy to reason by amicable negotiation. An embassy was sent to France with full powers to settle the differences between the two governments. When the ministers, Pinckney, Marshall, and Gerry arrived at Paris, they were to obtain an audience of the French minister for foreign affairs, but they only got leave to pay him a private visit to deliver their full powers. Those the minister perused, and put in his pocket, but would not present the ambassadors to the directory, or receive them officially himself.

After the ambassadors had been left to ponder on the line of conduct the French designed, or on that they must pursue, a Mr. W. called upon them, to tell them that Mr. X. would pay them a visit; and when Mr. X. did call, he said he was authorised by Mr. Y. from the minister Talleyrand, to acquaint them that the directors were very angry with America, but he wished to have a reconciliation; and if the envoys would give the minister 50,000*l.* to divide between him and the directors, and would give 32,000,000 of florins for 16,000,000 worth of Dutch rescriptions, held by France, he would endeavour to mediate a peace; and appease the wrath of the directors.

The Americans, strangers to the ways of Paris, allowed themselves to be cajoled for ten days, when they were often told the destruction of England was inevitable; that the arts of that nation would go over to America, if she secured the friendship of France; that, if she placed any reliance upon England, the fate of Venice would overtake her; and some idea might be formed of the consequence of provoking the directors, by what the Portuguese ambassador had experienced a few days before. He had been sent away with the insulting intelligence, that an army should follow him till it got possession of his country.

When peace was concluded with the emperor, Talleyrand saw the likely failure of his scheme with respect to the bribe and the loan, and he thought to terrify the envoys by shewing them the new situation that their country was in, from France having her forces disengaged.

The American ministers stated, that they were waited upon by Mr. X. who told them of the peace with the emperor, and that some proposals had been expected from them on the subject of their former conversation; that the directory were impatient, and would take a decided course with regard to America, if not softened; and that the peace with the emperor might make a change in the American system. To this they replied, that it had been expected by them, and would not at all affect their conduct. Mr. X. urged the danger of their situation, and pressed the policy of softening the directory, and obtaining time; they might probably not be long in office, and it would be unfortunate if those who succeeded them should find the two nations at war. To this they replied, that a state of war would be preferable to what they now endured; their commerce was plundered and unprotected; but if war was declared, they would endeavour to protect it. Mr. X. returned again to the subject of money, and told them it was expected they would offer some; they answered no, not a sixpence: he proceeded to press the matter very perseveringly; observing, that they had paid money for peace with the Algerines and Indians, and asked if it was not known that nothing could be had in France without money, as there was not an American in Paris that could not have given that information.

Every art was made use of to induce the envoys to consent to a loan to France; this, they said, they would send one of their members over to state to the American government, provided the other affairs were in the mean time carried on. Talleyrand strenuously urged the ministers to conclude a loan, declaring that it could be settled without sending to America, and dwelt upon it with much energy; nothing, however, was determined on. Mr. Gerry, who had the interview with him, immediately went to his quarters, and put in writing the conversation which had taken place.

The system of chicanery the ministers suffered was immense, till at last they would hear no more. Messrs. Pickering and Marshall would not remain in France after the treatment they had experienced for four months, and returned to America. Mr. Gerry waited orders from government, and was recalled, after being duped by Talleyrand's professions of esteem.

A universal uproar happened in America, when the ambassador's report was laid before the government, and preparations were made for war; the French party, however, threw obstacles in the way, and persuaded the people that the directory were anxious for peace. This was a strong instance of a foreign power directing the affairs of a state against its own government; the honor of the country, and the stability of the government, demanded that the insults offered to the ministers should be punished, but an attachment to peace took away the people's senses. Yet a posture of defence was taken. General Washington was to command the army, and a naval force was ordered to protect their trade; there was acrimony enough between the two governments, but they were at a great distance from each other, and the matter terminated in a battle of words.

Soon after, America lost her adviser, general, and late president, Washington, who died Dec. 15, 1799, aged 59.

This celebrated personage cannot, perhaps, be classed among the men of superior genius, or of very splendid talents. Yet it must be allowed, that he combined in his own character an assemblage of qualities, moral and intellectual, which are rarely found in the same person; and these he possessed without the alloy of any considerable imperfection or defect. To an inflexible integrity, a pure and philosophical disinterestedness, he added the most perfect self-government, the most invincible constancy, and determined perseverance. The characteristic of his understanding was rectitude, no less than of his heart. He had a clear and extensive discernment of men and things; but, far from being pertinaciously attached to his own opinions, he paid rather too much than too little deference to those of others. As a commander, he was actuated by a high sense of honor, and manifested, on many occasions, great personal courage. His talents seemed rather adapted to defensive than offensive war; and he was distinguished in the field by vigilance, fortitude, and secrecy, more than by profound penetration or ardor of enterprise. In this respect, as well as in all others, he was peculiarly fortunate—that his situation corresponded perfectly both with his intellectual and moral endowments, and exhibited them in the most conspicuous point of view. In the character of that man, collectively considered, there must have been something transcendently great and noble, to whom, under the pressure of the most alarming difficulties and dangers, all America looked up, as to the guardian and protector of his country. On his wisdom and on his valour they relied with confidence for safety. Never, in any age or nation, was a trust so great, so entire, so universal, placed in any individual; and, never did any individual more completely satisfy the lofty and sanguine expectations which had been previously formed of him.

The president of the United States, Mr. Adams, when he opened the congress, at the close of the year 1798, explained the causes of the ill success attending the negociation with France. He declared, that, "instead of putting a stop to the depredations of the French privateers, it had sanctioned those depredations; and while such principles and practices prevailed, it was impossible to support their honor and their rights, except by a firm resistance." He observed "the impossibility of sending again another embassy, without degrading the nation, until France had given a satisfactory assurance that the sacred right of ambassadors should be respected; and as no such assurance had taken place, he inferred the necessity of making vigorous preparations for war."

The president, however, altered his tone, for, early in the year 1799, he informed the senate that he had named new ambassadors plenipotentiary to treat with France, who were not to embark, though, for Europe, till assurances were given that they should be received in the characters, and enjoy the privileges, of public ministers, and till a minister or ministers should be appointed, with equal powers, to treat with them. Accordingly, soon after the formation of the consular government, Messrs. Elsworth, Henry, and Murray, arrived in France, as ambassadors from the United States of America, to destroy all the existing differences between the two republics by virtue of a treaty.

On hearing of the death of General Washington, Bonaparte ordered all the colours and officers of the republic to mount black crape for ten days.

State of Europe.—Preparations for another Campaign.—Changes in the Armies.—The English Fleet blockades Genoa, while the Austrian Army, under General Melas, besiege it by Land.—Capture of Vado.—General Attack on Genoa.—Successes of the Austrians.—The Town of Sasello carried.—The French gain some temporary Advantages.—A Series of bloody Actions.—Distress of the French.—A Treaty concluded.—Genoa evacuated by the English.

THE most vigorous efforts were now made by England and France for another campaign. The first consul was particularly attentive to the King of Prussia, who had remained neutral during the directorial government; and he left nothing untried to induce the court of Berlin to espouse the cause of the republic, as the means of terminating the war.

Bourbonville was kindly received ambassador at the court of Berlin, and the chief consul, through him, had the fullest assurances of neutrality on the part of Prussia. The example of the king was followed by the Elector of Saxony. The imperial cabinet solicited his co-operation; the late revolution in France had determined his choice. Sweden also evinced more friendly dispositions towards the republic, and the neutrality of Denmark was confirmed by the example of Prussia.

The former campaign in Italy, as the reader will find in the preceding Book, ended with the capture of Coni and the death of Championnet, whom Bonaparte disliked; the French army consequently retreated into the territory of Genoa, the only place of consequence in Italy, which they now held. The combined powers, therefore, attached the glory of the present campaign to the recovery of Genoa from the republicans; for whilst the French had possession of this place, they could assist their army in Switzerland, and secure a passage into Italy.

The cabinet of Vienna, enabled by the treasure of England, began to display no small degree of vigor and alacrity. The plan adopted for the campaign of this year differed entirely from that of the former, and appeared to spring out of the new situation of affairs. It was determined to remain entirely on the defensive in Germany, and, by making Italy the theatre of war, to free the whole of that country from the dominion of France. To attain this grand object with the greater facility, a powerful diversion was intended to be made in the southern provinces of the republic, by means of the English fleet in the Me-

Mediterranean, while the western departments were, at the same time, in a state of insurrection.

The determination of the combined powers was communicated to the legislative body, by a consular message, on the 7th of March. "Frenchmen, you have been anxious for peace; your government has desired it with still greater ardour: its first steps, its most constant wishes, have been for its attainment. The English ministry have betrayed the secret of their horrible policy—to dismember France, destroy its marine and its ports, strike it out from the map of Europe, or lower it to the rank of secondary powers. To obtain this horrible triumph it is that England scatters its gold, becomes prodigal of its promises, and multiplies its intrigues. The first consul has engaged, that if circumstances required, he would place himself at the head of his troops; but that, in the midst of battles and triumphs, he would invoke peace, and swear to fight only for the happiness of France and the repose of the world." It was then decreed, that an army of reserve, of 60,000 men, should be formed at Dijon, which was to be commanded by the first consul in person.

Early in the spring, the number of imperialists in Lombardy, Tuscany, and Piedmont, amounted to 110,000 men; and Melas, who was now invested with the command, considered the success of his operations as certain; for, being in possession of all the strong places that defend the entrance of the Alps, from the fort of Bard to the citadel of Coni, he could oppose a superior force to the enemy, now commanded by Massena, whose sphere of action was chiefly confined within the Ligurian frontiers.

The French army in the neighbourhood of Genoa did not exceed 45,000. The greater part of the cavalry had perished during the winter, and the infantry was exposed to privations of all kinds, being destitute of accoutrements, clothes, and even of a proper quantity of food. Scattered along a line, extending from the post of the Bochetta to the mountains of Dauphiny, it exhibited but a feeble barrier to an enemy which had the fertile plains of Italy in its rear, in possession of immense magazines on every side, and who could procure provisions, ammunition, and supplies of all kinds, by means of the sea, now wholly under the control of its maritime ally. The French army was shortly reduced to 25,000 men, and not above a half was fit for active duty. The horror excited by the hospitals was such, that not a few of the sick soldiers remained at their own quarters, and chose rather to die there, than suffer themselves to be carried into such a doleful and dreadful mansion. There were others who, no longer able to support themselves under multiplied and long-continued privations, threw themselves into the streets from their windows. The losses were not less that arose from desertion. Numbers of officers were to be seen, in small bodies, remaining at their posts alone, and abandoned by their men. Whole bodies of the soldiery went off without their commanders, and without orders; and there were general officers too who left the army, without taking leave or obtaining permission.

Melas, the Austrian general, understanding that the enemy derived great advantage from addresses directed to the passions of the soldiery, was determined, on assembling his troops, to follow the example. "The nation," said he, "has fixed its attention upon you. The enemy still feels the losses lately experienced by him; terror accompanies his march; his disasters encourage us to display fresh energy; his fears will guarantee new victories. Let us then realise the hopes of our countrymen: fortune, so lately the companion of our arms in the plains of Italy, will not abandon us on the Alps and Appenines, but conduct us to more glorious triumphs."

In this situation of affairs, Massena perceived the necessity of new-modelling his army. He sent back to France some officers, and among these even some general officers, on the pretext of recruiting. While he was under the necessity of getting rid of some of his generals, he called to Genoa others in their room, from the army of Italy, in whom he could confide, in which number were Generals Soult, Oudinot, Gazau, Thureau, and others. In the midst of that want and inanition in which the people and the army vegetated in Liguria, what gave General Massena particular pain, was his inability to throw provisions either into Gavi or Savona. But some ships, laden with grain, having arrived at Genoa, in the course of trade, on the 21st of March, he lost no time to take advantage of this circumstance. He re-victualled Gavi for three months, and repaired the works. Having next turned his attention to the state of the marine, he armed and fitted out some privateers, for escorting the convoys of provisions that were coming along the coast, and for bringing grain from Corsica. He also made several changes in the civil administration of the Ligurian republic.

In the midst of General Massena's efforts to palliate so many irreparable evils, of a sudden the English fleet, under Lord Keith, appeared, on the 5th of April, in the gulf off Genoa, for the blockade of which it was drawn up in all the regular forms; while, on the other hand, the army of General Melas approached close to the city by land, and extended its front along the whole line of the French army. The French generals themselves admitted, that the opening of the campaign, by General Melas, was entitled to the highest praise, on account of the address with which he concealed the immense force which he had in Italy. Being well acquainted with the weak state of the republican army, he contented himself, during the winter, with watching its movements, by means of a simple and slight cordon, while he disposed his own throughout Piedmont, Lombardy, the Venetian state, the Bolognese, the march of Ancona, and Tuscany. Thus divided, the Austrian army had the appearance of weakness; but it possessed all the means of being easily recruited, and provided with every thing necessary for action. The reinforcements which it received, from time to time, during its long repose, were in like manner dispersed over an immense extent of country, and were scarcely to be perceived. On the whole, the French were persuaded, that it would be late in the season before the Austrians could take the field. They even flattered themselves that they should be beforehand with the enemy, at the very time when the different corps, that were to compose the Austrian armies, were on their march to the general rendezvous. Cities, towns, and villages, all at once, as by a spontaneous movement, sent forth companies, regiments, and battalions, for the formation of an active army.

In a few days, General Melas was enabled to assemble 10,000 men before Bobbio, 10,000 in front of Tortona, 30,000 at Acqui and Alexandria, to advance with this great force against Massena, and, at the same time, to leave behind him, in the plains of Piedmont, the whole of his cavalry, a fine park of artillery, and 20,000 infantry. The astonishment, excited by all these circumstances, was great and universal. Massena adopted the only measure that was prudent and practicable in his situation. He contracted his lines; he formed masses, which, though altogether disproportioned to the numerous bodies to which they were opposed, might yet make an impression, and divide the enemy, by darting upon them at points favorable to an attack, and obtaining different advantages, according to local circumstances, and the genius and combinations of the chief commander. But the divisions of his army being extended on a line of sixty miles, to draw them close together was a very difficult matter.

The business of covering the city of Genoa was undertaken by Massena himself, at the head of one of his divisions. On the 5th of April, the first day of the siege, the attack of the Austrians on the French army became general. On the morning of that day the French were driven as far back as Ruha, which they entered in the evening. At Bergo-di-Sornoni, the Austrians made an attempt to break the French line, but were repulsed by General Panisot, of the second division; as they also were on the heights of Cordibona, where the French firmly maintained their ground.

In Savona, the house of Austria had had many partisans; and the French general, on his arrival, was greatly mortified at perceiving the following declaration, from Field-marshal Melas, posted on the walls:

"Inhabitants of Genoa! I enter your territories, neither for the purposes of conquest, nor of subjugation, but merely to combat the enemy. The emperor is not desirous of making acquisitions, but merely as delivering you from a yoke which has reduced you to the most deplorable condition.

"I promise you a provisional government, composed of the wisest and most virtuous of your countrymen; it shall enjoy the protection of the victorious imperial army. Your ports shall be free, and your commerce protected; this is the only mode of precluding, in future, that misery, and those calamities, with which you have been so long oppressed, but which will soon give place to abundance and tranquillity."

A counter-proclamation was published by Gen. Massena, conjuring all the inhabitants to assist the French in procuring and maintaining liberty and independence.

On the second day of the siege, April 6, a general attack on the right of the French line was made by General Ott, who fell on the first division with 10,000 men, in front of Bobbio. His object was to cut his way through the French line, and press on directly to Genoa. The principal attack was made at Monte Coruna. The first division was forced to give way, and to fall back towards Novi and Monte Jaccio, as far as Quinto, where he rallied, and made a successful stand for the defence of the city. The second division, which was that of the centre, was also attacked, though with somewhat less fury. Gen. Gazau, who commanded, thought it prudent, however, to retire behind the Scrivia, towards some mills on that river. While these events were passing in the first and second divisions, the third, commanded on that day by General Gardanne, sustained a terrible conflict. Of the 30,000 men, whom General Melas had assembled in the province of Acqui, 20,000 marched under his command to Savona; where the third division, though but weak, withstood the shock, till the arrival of General Soult, who displayed astonishing valor. He succeeded in throwing 600 men and provisions into Savona; but could not save Vado, which was taken by the imperialists, nor prevent the division under Suchet from being cut off. On the same day, a frigate, from Lord Keith's fleet, came within cannon-shot of Genoa, and, after firing forty rounds on the quarter of Cognignor, again withdrew. The object of this cannonade was, no doubt, to effect a rising among the numerous inhabitants of that quarter: however, they remained quiet.

Though General Suchet found means to resume some of his positions, he was obliged to abandon them again; and the heights of Savona were, for a long time, disputed inch by inch, with alternate success, by both armies.

The third day of the siege (April 7,) was more auspicious to the French. The Austrians having come within sight of Genoa, by the occupancy of Monte Jaccio, of which they had gained possession the preceding evening, lighted up fires in the night, and sounded the tocsins in all the adjacent country, in order to alarm the inhabitants of Genoa, and on their first appearance, to damp their spirits by an impression of terror on their imagination. Massena perceived how necessary it was for him, in these circumstances, to gain some victories over the Austrians, in sight of the Genoese, in order to do away the impressions that had been made on their minds, by the first advantages obtained by the Austrians. He therefore formed a plan, and gave orders for an attack on that part of the Austrian army: and his measures were so well concerted with the Generals Darnaud, Miolis, Pelitot, Hector, and others, that they overthrew the Austrians at Monte Jaccio, at Panesi, at St. Alberto, and at Scofera; and General Miolis again took possession of Monte Coruna. The Austrians on this day lost 1,500 prisoners, among whom was the Baron d'Aspres; and the return of the commander-in-chief to Genoa was triumphant. On the same day the second division re-took Ron-go di Fornari, Cazella, and Savigone, which the Austrians had taken on the day before; and the third division, being that on the left, set to rights and restored the line from Voraggio to Campani.

The whole of April 8 was taken up, on both sides, in general and particular dispositions of the forces. General Melas made dispositions for new attacks. Massena, in the general dispositions which he made, divided his right wing into two bodies: the first of which, under the orders of Miolis and d'Arnaud, was charged with the defence of Genoa; the second, under the orders of Gazau, Gardanne, and Soult, were to keep the country.

The nature of the ground divided the whole of the defence, as well as the attack, into two distinct and separate parts, by the course of the Bisagno. The forts l'Eperon and Diamant covered the line of defence on the left; and, on the right, it was aided by the position of Genoa, on the heights of Del Bati, and defended by the fort of Richelieu, to which are attached five counter-forts, situated on the prolongation of the eminence. Massena, after making these dispositions, which seemed to secure, at least for a time, the safety of Genoa, projected a grand movement, which had for its object nothing less than to blockade Savona, re-take Vado, and, by recovering his first lines, re-establish his communications with General Suchet.

On the night between the 8th and 9th, all the corps that were to compose the column of General Soult, were directed to proceed to Voltri.

The Austrians employed the whole of the 8th of April, (the taking of the Bochetta excepted) in watching the motions of the French, and in drawing over different corps from their left to their right, towards the centre of their posts, which was at Sasello.

At three o'clock, on the morning of April 9, notice was given that the Austrians were falling down from all quarters on Genoa. Notwithstanding the agitation that followed this intelligence, Massena made not the least alteration in his disposition, but continued to labour for the execution of his plan; in pursuance of which, he set out for Cogolotto, (the birth-place of Christopher Columbus) where he established his headquarters.

By the plan agreed on, General Soult was to be at Sasello in the evening; but a movement made by the enemy retarded the movement of General Soult, by the necessity which it laid him under of securing, with great care, his rear, and keeping up his communication with Genoa. Towards two o'clock in the morning, at the moment he was preparing to depart from Voltri, to proceed to Sasello, he learnt that the enemy, having reduced the post of Cabaunes de Macarello, had advanced as far as Acqua-Santa, within three miles of Voltri. On this, he immediately formed the resolution to attack the enemy in this new position. This operation was committed to General Gazau, and he performed it with success. But even this success prevented General Soult from taking the share that had been allotted to him, in the operations of the next day, resolved on by General Massena.

At four o'clock the next morning, General Soult directed his march by Aqua Bianca, Martino, and St. Pietro del Alba, to Sasello. About a mile from Pallo, he was informed that four Austrian regiments, making, in all, eight thousand men, were on their way from Monte Notte to La Verreria, and that, on the morrow, that column was to attack the detachment at Campani, and proceed, thereafter, to Voltri, in order to cut off the retreat of the French column that marched on the coast, along side of the Marine, and which was headed by General Massena in person.

General Melas leaving, under the orders of General Elnitz, a sufficient force for keeping General Suchet in check, marched against General Massena with three bodies of his army. The division on the right consisted of the brigades of Bassy, Latterman, and Sticher, commanded by the Count de Palfy. The centre was composed of the brigades of Bellegarde and Beautano, commanded by General Bellegarde. The left division was under the orders of General St. Julien,

To disconcert and overthrow this project, Gen. Gazau took a position on the road which leads from Verneria to Pouzoune; and General Poinot received orders to attack, on the heights of Sasello, the enemy's rear-guard, which was bearing on Verneria.

General Poinot executed this movement with so much impetuosity, that he cut off a part of the regiment of Deutchmeister, took three pieces of cannon, and carried the town of Sasello; where he also took 200,000 cartridges, and 600 prisoners. The success of this attack was aided by that of another made by General Godinat, chief of brigade, on Costala-Longa. The great difficulty of making war in a mountainous country, consists in that of concerting movements, and forming any harmonious system of action.

Massena, who could not be informed of the obstacles which unavoidably retarded the march of General Soult on Monte Notte, nevertheless completed his own, with the division under Gen. Gardanne. This column, setting out from Varaggio, about eight o'clock in the morning, (April 11), directed its march to La Stella. About midway between these two places, this column, composed of no more than 1200 men, fell in with that of the Austrians, near 10,000 strong, who were marching on the same point. The firing commenced on the part of the Austrians. The French took a position, in which they were enabled to repel reiterated attacks. Their certainty of being seconded and supported by General Soult, whom they expected every moment to turn the Austrian rear, supported their courage under so great an odds of numbers. General Gardanne in this conflict was wounded; and the small French column, in danger of being surrounded by the Austrians, made a speedy retreat in the night, directing their flight to the corps under General Soult: but the junction between these two French corps was not so easy a matter as General Massena had imagined. The Austrians followed them close, and annoyed them severely in all their movements.

In the mean time, General Soult had gained some successive advantages, and the small body which followed Massena on the coast, commanded by General Fressinet, effected a junction with General Soult on the mountain of St. Hermitte, not without considerable loss on the side of both the Austrians and the French. The Austrians lost several officers of rank, and, it was said, above 1000 men made prisoners. Of the French, the chief of brigade, Villaret, was killed; and several other officers of rank were wounded, among whom was General Fressinet, who, on the fifteenth, received two musket-shots. A considerable number of the French were also made prisoners by the Austrians. The result of all these different actions was, that the French, exhausted of men, money, and provisions, were obliged to reconcile their minds, at last, to the idea of retreating, by little and little, towards Genoa, and the forts with which it was environed; a plan which was, at last, carried into complete execution, after daily fighting, on the 20th of April.

The kind of war that is carried on by any army, necessarily depends on the force which it possesses, and the situation in which it is placed. It was naturally, therefore, to be expected, that the Generals Melas and Massena should pursue opposite systems of operation. The object of Massena, continually in action with an enemy superior in numbers, as well as fresh and hearty, was to divide the enemy, by marching his own troops in two columns. It was contrived that these columns should not be equal in strength. The one was weaker than the other, and made it its chief business to manœuvre, as much as possible, so as to occupy the enemy, and keep him in play, without either attacking him, or waiting to receive an attack, except when it was unavoidable, as was the case at Albissola. The other, and the stronger column, endeavoured to keep up the tone of offensive operations, by bearing, in favorable circumstances, with its whole and undivided force on the different divisions of the enemy, and to beat their different corps in succession, as was the case at Macarolo, Sassello, and La Verneria.

The Austrians, on the contrary, being able to divide, without too much weakening themselves, studied always to surround the French, and never met them without attacking them, except when detached columns were turning them on every side. Even the different advantages resulting to the French from this mode of warfare, in a mountainous country, precipitated their destruction, and forced them to fall back on Genoa, which was not done without difficulty, the Austrians being several times on the point of cutting off their retreat.

During the series of events now related, on the left of the army of Genoa, the right, under the orders of General Miolis, had tried the same kind of warfare, and received orders, at last, to fall back to Genoa.

In the course of the fifteen days that the defence was maintained, by (as it may be called) offensive operations, Massena, having lost a third of his men, although the Austrians had lost a good deal more of theirs, could not dissemble that he had nothing more to expect from the force of his arms. He therefore prepared to fortify himself in his positions, to discover some means of subsistence, and to exercise the severest economy in the use of such as yet survived.

By means of some small ships, which yet remained with the French army, notwithstanding the vigilance of the English fleet, he sent letters to Corsica, to General Suchet, and to Marseilles. Several officers, whom he had dispatched to Gen. Suchet, and to the first consul, with an account of his situation, were taken by the enemy. In the mean time, Massena became acquainted with the march of the army of reserve, under Bonaparte. He was not less encouraged by the valor of his troops. There was not a day that passed without skirmishing between advanced posts, in forced reconnoitings, and efforts to penetrate within the positions of the besieging army.

On the 30th of April, the Austrians, who by this time had carried the post of Deux Freres and fort Quezzi, blockaded fort Diamant, and commanded the works of fort Eperon. In this posture of affairs, Massena, perceiving that they had in view to take the post of La Madona del Monte, from whence they might drive the French from Alboro, the only point from which they would be able to bombard Genoa, formed a resolution to make a last effort with his corps of reserve, which had not yet been brought into serious action, and to force the enemy to abandon their most advanced positions. In this he succeeded, but it was at the expence of a series of bloody actions, desperate and obstinate, and great loss on both sides; insomuch, that the combatants being too near each other to make use of musketry, had recourse to their bayonets, the butt ends of their muskets, and even to stones. The loss in killed, on both sides, was great. The French made prisoners to the amount of several thousands, and took all the scaling-ladders destined for the escalade of Genoa, and the forts adjacent. The scaling-ladders were so formed as to admit of three men abreast. They were burned by the French in the night. General Soult carried the post of Deux Freres, and the rout of the Austrians was complete. The situation of the Austrian prisoners in Genoa was dreadful. The French suffered extreme privations themselves: their prisoners, after attempting to prolong life by eating their shoes and knapsacks, died of hunger.

This day, the most memorable in the siege, the victory, which was so decidedly on the side of the French, only served to hasten its conclusion. Such combats, so destructive to both parties, added to the miseries of the French and Genoese, by the increase of prisoners without an increase of provisions. The army of Bonaparte was yet at too great a distance to come to the relief of Massena before the last of his soldiers should have perished with hunger. In the sorties, which he made in the course of the month of May, he lost a great many of his officers, and among these some of the generals of his staff, in killed and severely wounded.

The city of Savona had surrendered to the Austrians on the 15th of May. The English fleet began to bombard Genoa every night. The populace, particularly the women, running about the streets, set up frightful cries for peace; and a general insurrection of the people of Genoa against the French would have ensued, if the efforts of the French soldiers to restrain it had not been seconded by a number of individuals among the inhabitants. The illusions of hope at last vanished. There was no longer the smallest expectation that the succours so long looked for would come in time. The provisions were entirely exhausted; even the last horses and dogs were nearly consumed, when General Massena received a letter from General Melas, inviting him to an interview with Lord Keith, and the Generals Ott and St. Julien, who offered him a capitulation on the most honorable terms. To this first overture, he replied, that he would consider of it; though he had, in truth, nothing further to consider. The day after, he received another message with the same terms. He then sent the adjutant-general, Audreaux, under pretence of some business relating to the prisoners, to Rivoli, to receive the proposals of the enemy, and to enter, without any further delay, into a negociation for peace.

The first article of capitulation proposed by the allies, was, that the army should return to France, but that the general should remain prisoner of war—"You, sir," said Lord Keith to Massena, "are worth 20,000 men." But Massena said, "that no negociation would be gone into, if the word capitulation was to be made use of." On the 4th of June, the allied generals, having departed from their first proposal, resumed the negociations. While this was going on, the city of Genoa, containing a population of 160,000 souls, though a prey to all the horrors of famine, remained quiet. A great number of old people, women, and children, reduced to the necessity of attempting to sustain nature by herbs, roots, and impure animals, died of disease or hunger.—This melancholy picture was often exhibited to view by the rising sun. Mothers were often found deceased, and children at the breast also dead, or dying.

On that day (June 4) the principal articles for the evacuation of Genoa were agreed on, between the French adjutant-general, Audreaux, on the one part, and Major-general Rest, a staff-officer in the imperial service, with the English captain, Rivera, on the other. And it was settled, that the chiefs of the opposite armies should meet on the day after, being the 5th of June, for signing a definitive treaty. At nine o'clock in the morning of that day a conference was held by the opposite parties, in a small chapel, situated in the middle of the bridge of Corneghiano, and between the posts of the Austrians and the French. Here Lord Keith, commander of the combined naval forces in the Mediterranean, General Ott, commander of the blockade of Genoa, with General St. Julien, who was charged with the political part of the negotiation, were met by General Massena, commander-in-chief of the French army in Italy. Each of these parties was accompanied by only two or three gentlemen.

In this conference Massena displayed much finesse, under the cloak of an apparent gaiety, which formed a complete contrast with the gravity of the other contracting party, and was attended with this advantage, that it did not look as if he were greatly alarmed for the situation of his army. It is, perhaps, owing to that ease and gaiety of manner that he obtained, in the end, all that he had demanded.

A degree of misunderstanding had taken place for some time between the English, as individuals, and the Austrians: the former reproached the latter with the great length to which the siege had been protracted. Massena endeavoured to widen and to take advantage of this want of harmony, by flattering the pride of one party at the expense of the self-love of the other. He said to Lord Keith, "Do you, my lord, only permit a little grain to be carried into Genoa, and I give you my word that these gentlemen (looking at the Austrian generals) shall never set foot there."

Toward the end of the conference he again addressed Lord Keith, personally:—"My lord, if France and England could only understand one another, they would govern the world." In the whole of this conference, Lord Keith treated Massena, as the general often acknowledged, in a very civil and handsome manner. His lordship disclaimed all hard conditions. He always said, "General, the defence you have made has been so heroic, that it is impossible to refuse you any thing that you ask." At length, at seven o'clock at night, Massena signed the treaty for the evacuation of Genoa, and the contracting parties mutually gave hostages. The substance of the treaty was, that the right wing of the French army, charged with the defence of Genoa, and the commander-in-chief, with his staff, should go out of Genoa with their arms and baggage, in order to rejoin the centre of the said army by land. The same liberty was granted to 8,100 men, who had permission to enter France by Nice. The rest were transported by sea to Antibes, and were duly provided with provisions. Due attention was also paid to the hospitals and the prisoners. Passports were granted to the Genoese patriots. The Austrians took possession of the gates of the city, and the English of the entrance into the harbour. French commissioners remained at Genoa to see the articles, that had been agreed on respecting the sick and the hospitals, duly executed. Massena was allowed to send a courier with a passport, to Bonaparte, to announce the evacuation of Genoa.

Bonaparte determines to march the Army of Reserve to Italy.—Motions of the Army.—Joined at Martigny by the First Consul.—Description of the Mount St. Bernard and its Monastery.—Universal Benevolence of the Monks.—The Army pass St. Bernard.—Difficulties encountered by the French.—Capture of the Town of Aoste.—Description of the Fortress of Bard.—Its difficult Capture.—The Towns of Ivrea and Romagna taken.—Bonaparte enters Milan.—Battles of Montebello and Maringo.—Death of Dessoix.—An Armistice.

It has been mentioned, in the preceding chapter, that the army of reserve, formed at Dijon, was to be commanded by the first consul. Volunteers of all descriptions were invited to repair to Dijon, and the names of the ten departments which should send the greatest number were to be solemnly proclaimed as most attached to the glory of the nation.

Bonaparte had determined, in consequence of the distressed situation of Massena, then shut up in Genoa, to march his army to Italy with the utmost expedition; and in order to attack the rear of the Austrian army, he was resolved to surmount every difficulty in the passage of the Alps. Fortunately, about this time, General Dessoix had arrived at Paris from Egypt, and Bonaparte requested his assistance in this enterprise.

The army of reserve (declared to be at that time above 50,000 strong, and receiving reinforcements every day,) was ordered to Geneva through the Pais de Vaud and the Lower Valais to Martigny, a village six leagues from the Great St. Bernard, under the command of Berthier.

It was determined that the principal part of the army should pass by Mount St. Bernard: other divisions were to cross by Mount Cenis, the Simplon, and Mount St. Gothard.

Early in the month of May, the army began to move in seven columns by the way of Geneva to the foot of the Great St. Bernard on the frontiers of Switzerland and Savoy.

The first consul, after nominating Carnot minister at war, left Paris suddenly, May 6, and joining the army at Martigny, at the expiration of six days reviewed his troops in the neighbourhood of Lausanne. Bonaparte promised his army that in two decades he would lead them to Milan. He is said to have performed his journey from Paris to Dijon in twenty-five hours. During a stay of three days at Martigny, preparations were made for the ascent of the mountain.

The sides of the terrific mountain of St. Bernard were, even at this advanced season of the year, covered with ice, and seemed to defy all human efforts to force a practicable passage for a numerous army, with its necessary carriages and artillery.

On the summit of this famous mountain there is a monastery, founded for the generous purpose of granting relief to unfortunate and bewildered travellers, who might otherwise be doomed to perish in the snows. The cold is excessive, even in summer, with scarcely a vestige of vegetation to be discerned; the imagination is affrighted by a perpetual silence, and the view astonished by an almost endless perspective of mountains. The monks who dwell in this monastery are the victims of melancholy, which is the more to be lamented, as they are the friends and advocates of universal benevolence. The monastery looks like an inn: Bonaparte entered it, and staid there about an hour. It contains many comfortable things, which money cannot procure so well as articles of barter. These monks take great pains in instructing the canine species, to reduce the accidents peculiar to the place. Morning and evening the dogs are sent out; and if in their journeys they hear the cries of any unfortunate creatures, they run to the spot, and use all the power of instinct to make them hope for assistance; then they run quickly back and announce what they have seen. A small basket, filled with refreshments, being put round a dog's neck, proper people are sent with him to give every necessary assistance.

When General Melas was made acquainted with the preparations on the part of Bonaparte for the speedy invasion of Italy, he treated the idea with sovereign contempt: and the Austrian general entertaining not the most distant idea of a passage into Lombardy in such a direction, the French met with no enemy to obstruct their march, where a single troop might have opposed a numerous army. The fact being at length ascertained, the Austrians made great expedition to show themselves.

On the 15th of May, Bonaparte passed St. Bernard, and at Remi, distant six leagues from the monastery, first saw the Austrians, who, though inferior in numbers, disputed the ground step by step with the republicans, until they saw another part of the army descending, as if with intent to attack them in the rear.

No part of the artillery of the French army had at that time crossed the mountains. It had been collected at the village of St. Pierre, and, as it may be supposed, was a work of no small difficulty to transport it across the Alps. It was, however, essentially necessary that such a transport should be made, and the following means were used to effect it:—every piece of cannon was dismounted, and placed in troughs hollowed out of trees cut down for the purpose. These were drawn by 5 or 600 men, according to the size and weight of the piece. The wheels, fixed to poles, were borne on men's shoulders; the tumbrils were emptied and placed on sledges, together with the axle-trees. The ammunition, packed up in boxes, was carried on the backs of mules. To encourage the men, from 4 to 500 franks were allowed for every piece of artillery thus transported. One half of a regiment was employed in drawing a cannon, whilst the other half bore the necessary baggage belonging to their corps. The men proceeded in single files, it being impossible for two to draw abreast, or to pass each other without danger of falling down the precipices on the side. The man who led, stopped from time to time, when every one took the refreshment of biscuit moistened in snow water. It was the labour of five hours to reach the monastery of St. Bernard, when each man was refreshed with a glass of wine. They had then eighteen miles of descent, by far the most difficult and hazardous, which they did not accomplish till nine the next night, being ten hours in performing it. Bonaparte and his staff marched on foot, and were in several places obliged to slide down seated on the snow.

On the 16th, the vanguard reached Aoste, garrisoned by an Hungarian battalion, which, after some loss, evacuated the place, when a deputation from the town waited upon the consul to surrender it.

The van-guard now proceeded to the attack of Chatillon, near which place General Lasnes was informed the Austrians were preparing to oppose his passage over a bridge thrown across a precipice; but the Austrians were so vigorously attacked by a body of hussars, that they were soon driven off the bridge with a considerable loss, and shut themselves up in the fortress of Bard, by some called Fort de Barre. This fort, from its situation in a narrow neck, appeared to stop the progress of the whole army; and, if it could not be reduced in four days, every soldier must have perished through hunger, as the provisions were nearly exhausted, and no means left of procuring an additional supply. Had General Melas foreseen this obstacle, he might, by a timely opposition, have frustrated the success of Bonaparte's expedition.

The rock on which the fort is built, is in the shape of a sugar-loaf; the pass at its foot is skirted by a deep and rapid river, called the Doria; on the opposite side of which is a steep inaccessible rock. There was no alternative; the fort must either be taken or another passage sought. Each had its difficulties. At length the suburb was taken possession of by three companies of grenadiers, previous to an attack on the fort, which was defended by 500 men, and twenty-two pieces of cannon. The attack was made at night, when the republicans climbed up the rocks and over the pallisade amidst a shower of balls, and drove the Austrians from the works, but were in the end obliged to retreat themselves. This check made the consul resolve to find out another passage, when a way was discovered up the rock Albaredo; which ascent gained, might with a like difficulty be descended. As the artillery could not possibly be transported this way; it was resolved, at every hazard, to pass the carriages through the suburb. Every means was used, by setting out in the dark, and by spreading litter along the way to deaden the sound, and prevent suspicion in the garrison; yet these precautions did not prevent the Austrians from discovering their design, and the men were fired upon and killed by every discharge. At length, Bonaparte ordered a cannon to be raised, and placed upon the top of the church, which so effectually battered the tower over the gate, that the garrison, fearing a second assault, surrendered at discretion.

A passage was now opened to the republican army, which experienced no farther obstruction until it reached Ivrea, a town between Aoste and Turin, from both which places it is distant about eight leagues; and whither the army proceeded as soon as the soldiers had refreshed themselves with the provisions found in Bard. This place was escalated and taken, with fourteen pieces of cannon, on the 23d of May, by a division under General Boudet, before the main army reached it.

Bonaparte, instead of continuing his course southwards to Turin, turned off to Romagna, eastwards, having received intelligence of a force collected there of 6,000 men, partly composed of Austrian troops which he had driven before him, and a number drawn from Turin. This body had taken a position at Romagna, and was entrenched behind the Sesia, a deep and rapid river. They appeared to be ignorant as well of the strength of the French army, as that it had Bonaparte with it, and treated its designs with contempt, but were the next day convinced of their mistake, when General Lasnes forced their entrenchments and cut them to pieces, notwithstanding their cavalry made some show of resistance.

On the 26th of May, Bonaparte gave orders for two divisions to march towards Turin, whilst his van-guard bore upon Chiussella and the Po. This was done in order to deceive the Austrians, who thereupon crossed that river, and took a position on the right bank. Whilst the attention of the Austrians was taken up with this manœuvre, General Murat, at the head of a division of cavalry, entered Vercelli the next day, on the road to Milan. Other divisions, about the same time, took possession of Suza and Brunette, and Ariolo.

The Austrians, finding themselves not in sufficient force to defend Milan against the republican army, evacuated that city on the 2d of June, after a slight opposition.

Bonaparte now issued two proclamations: the first to the army, pompously stating, "that consternation was in the south of France; the territory of the people of Liguria, faithful friends to the republic, had been invaded, and the Cisalpine republic was the sport of the federal system; but they had marched, and the French territory was delivered: they would restore liberty and independence to Genoa, and deliver it from its enemies." The second, though dictated by the consul, appeared to be from the provisional government of Milan, congratulating their fellow-citizens on the happy change effected by the first consul.

The city of Milan was built by the Gauls in the 395th year of Rome; its principal strength is a wall and rampart, and a citadel of six bastions. There is a small hill near the town, the Bochetta, which overlooks the surrounding country, and the best part of the interior and exterior works. It is well fortified, yet cannot stand above a few days of open trenches, because nothing prevents the enemy from battering in breach. The city is large and handsome, being near ten miles in circumference; the streets are wide, and its churches, especially the cathedral, deserve admiration. The cathedral, among its ornaments, has several lamps of pure gold and silver, and two pulpits of massy silver. The metropolitan church of Milan is next to St. Peter's at Rome; the work of the outside is surprising, the number of marble statues of all sizes with which the walls are charged, from top to bottom, is immense. The chief theatre is so large as to allow 400 performers and forty horses to appear at once; its number of spectators may be conceived from this. The shops are like the French, and the dresses are not unlike. All in Milan gives an idea of splendour. The inhabitants are sociable and friendly, and not so faulty as Italians in general. The view from the lofty parts of this city is immense; the whole of the Alps are seen; the Grisons are also visible, and the defiles of the Tyrole; nearer may be seen the whole of Piedmont, and a part of Liguria.

After a short stay at Milan, the van-guard of the army marched and took possession of Pavia, on the 4th of June, on which day Genoa surrendered to the allies; and on which very day orders were sent to General Ott to raise the siege. At Pavia, the republican army found considerable magazines, and 500 pieces of cannon, with a large quantity of ammunition.

During this time, General Melas was at Turin, and the greatest part of his army in the Genoese territory, a position which he preserved too long; perhaps, partly owing to orders he had received from Vienna, and partly to his ignorance of Bonaparte's real strength. To this security the miscarriages and misfortunes of the Austrian army, which followed, may be attributed.

In order to make a powerful diversion, Melas detached General O'Reilly to Placentia, and General Ott upon the Tessino. A detachment of 6,000 men was likewise sent to Chiavasso, upon the Po, which, turning off to Vercelli, retook 300 Austrian prisoners. The manœuvre of advancing as far as Chiavasso, which is within fifteen miles of Turin, was a feint for misleading the Austrians, by seeming to threaten that city.

The concentration of the Austrian forces seemed to discover an intention of offering battle. Gen. Murat defeated O'Reilly, and made himself master of Placentia, from whence O'Reilly fell back upon Ott, at Stradello and Montebello.

The French army had now taken a position on the Po, where it is joined to the Tessino, and becomes then of equal depth with the Rhine. The republicans had no longer to do with small detachments, but were met by the Austrian advanced-guard of 18,000 men. The French army was now increasing, and was joined by a division of the army of the Rhine, which had separated at Ulm, and had passed the Alps by Mount St. Gothard. The French van-guard crossed the Po suddenly, and on the 9th of June made a vigorous attack upon the Austrian army, which they drove before them into the marshes, until night put a stop to the pursuit, which was followed the next day by the battle of Montebello.

The battle of Montebello was very sanguinary; that place was taken and re-taken by the contending armies. The van-guard, under General Lasnes, had suffered considerably, when it was reinforced by General Watrin's division, which decided the battle in favor of the republicans; and the Austrians having lost 6000 prisoners, and 12 pieces of cannon, with several officers of distinction killed or wounded, were forced to retreat to Voghera.

On the 11th, the French army marched through Voghera, and took some positions before Tortona, which city the van-guard surrounded without opposition. The Austrian army had now arrived from Genoa, and had fixed its head-quarters at Alexandria. As a general engagement appeared to be unavoidable, every preparation was made for it. The French army quitted its position near Tortona, and advanced into the plain betwixt that city and Alexandria, forming in order of battle, as the several divisions arrived. Meanwhile Bonaparte carefully examined the plain and village of Maringo, or Marengo; but, the day proving wet, nothing was done until the following, (the 16th of June,) which was ushered in by several discharges of cannon; and the preparatives on the side of the Austrians appeared to be decisive for battle before noon.

Bonaparte and Berthier had entered the plain, and the fire of cannon and musketry began to be brisk. The Austrian line extended six miles in length, and steadily preserved its positions, particularly at the bridge over the Bormida; but, the principal point of action, and whereto they directed their chief attention, was at Sans-Stefano, from which point the Austrians could gain Voghera before the French. The Austrians being in great force, gained upon the French; when Bonaparte ordered the body of reserve to come up; but Desaix, with his corps, had not yet arrived. The left wing of the French, commanded by Victor, now began to give way, and some cavalry and infantry retreated in disorder. About the same time the centre and right wing did the same. Bonaparte, in front, rallied the troops, and led them on again to the battle. Notwithstanding this, the French army still continued to retreat, and the Austrians followed up their advantage. At this juncture of time, the garrison of Tortona, seeing the disorder of the French army, made a sally, and had nearly surrounded them. Bonaparte, still in front, encouraged the corps, which defended a defile, flanked by the village of Maringo, on which thirty pieces of Austrian artillery continually played, making terrible slaughter. At four o'clock in the afternoon, the French army was so pushed on all sides, that one-third of it was in confusion, and knew not where to rally. There was a defile behind the centre of the French army, with a wood on one side, and a chain of vineyards on the other, extending to the village of Maringo. Here the first consul formed the resolution of making his final stand, and defending the entrance of this defile to the last extremity.

BOOK IV.
CHAP. VI.

The Austrians, seeing the impossibility of forcing the defile, drew up more artillery, under the protection of which they sent forward a body of infantry to dislodge the French from the wood and vineyards, whilst their cavalry watched the opportunity of cutting them down as they quitted that position. Had this manœuvre succeeded, the French army had been totally destroyed.

At this instant the fortune of the battle began to take a new turn. The divisions of Monnier and Dessaix coming up, insured victory to the republican army, by inspiring it with renewed courage. To this, an unfortunate mistake, which Melas committed about the same time, did not a little contribute. That general, finding he could neither force the defile nor make any impression on the centre of the French army, perhaps, presuming too far on his success, and being moreover ignorant of the reinforcements which the republican army had received, weakened his line, by extension, in order to surround it. Bonaparte saw the error Melas had been guilty of, and instantly availed himself of it, by the orders he gave. The troops of the republic quitted the defile, and, as they left it, formed in order of battle, and presented a fresh and formidable front to the Austrians, now nearly exhausted and fatigued with success.

The Austrians having been vigorously charged, fell back in their turn: their numerous cavalry was thrown into disorder, and the French hussars, hitherto inferior, charged and dispersed the fugitives. On the right, Dessaix bore down all before him, while Victor, on the left, carried Maringo, and bore down rapidly on the Bormida; where, getting possession of the bridge, he cut off the retreat of the Austrians on that side. At the moment that Dessaix, gaining Sans-Stefano, cut off the Austrian left wing, the younger Kellerman made prisoners of 6000 Hungarian grenadiers. The Austrian general, Zach, was made a prisoner, and Dessaix, in the very instant of victory, received a wound, of which he died. Night by this time approached, and found the Austrians everywhere retreating before the republicans.

The morning of June 15 presented a field of battle covered with the wounded and the slain, and gave both armies an armistice, and an opportunity to bury the dead, to attend the wounded, and to recover the wearied and harassed soldier from his late fatigue. It was computed by the French that the campaign of Bonaparte, from the time of his descending from Mount St. Bernard till the close of the day of Maringo, cost the Austrians above 50,000 men. In the morning of that day, the French force amounted to about 50,000 men, of whom 3000 were cavalry, and two companies of light artillery, with thirty pieces of cannon: the Austrian force, to about 60,000, of which 15,000 were cavalry. In artillery, the Austrians were still more superior to the French. The loss of the latter could not be less than 15,000. Bonaparte, in the battle of Maringo, had his clothes pierced with balls in different places. General Melas had two horses killed under him, and received a contusion in his arm. General Dessaix, before he received the mortal wound, had a horse killed under him. When the commander-in-chief was informed of the death of this officer, he is said to have exclaimed, "Why am I not permitted to weep for him?"

An Austrian officer arrived early on June 16, to treat respecting an armistice; and General Berthier, to whom the negociation was committed, concluded articles the same day with General Melas, by which an armistice was established between the contending armies, until an answer should be received from the court of Vienna. The imperialists were to occupy all the country comprised between the Mincio and Fossa-Maestra, and the Po; that is to say, Peschiera, Mantua, Borgoforte, and thence the whole left bank of the Po; and on the right bank, the city and the citadel of Ferrara. The imperialists were also to occupy Tuscany and Ancona. The French army was to occupy the country comprised between the Chiesa, the Oglio, and the Po. The country between the Chiesa and the Mincio was not to be occupied by either of the two armies. The imperial army to draw subsistence from those parts of that country which made part of the duchy of Mantua. The French army to draw subsistence from those parts of that country which made part of the province of Brescia. The castles of Tortona, Alexandria, Milan, Turin, Pizzighetone, Arona, and Placentia, were to be put into the hands of the French army, between the 16th and 20th of June. The place of Coni, the castles of Ceva, Savona, and the city of Genoa, to be put into the hands of the French army between the 20th and 24th of June; and the fort of Urbino on the 26th. The artillery and the provisions of the places evacuated to be divided. The garrisons to march out with military honors, and repair with arms and baggage, by the shortest route, to Mantua. No individual to be ill-treated on account of any service rendered the Austrian army, or for any political opinions. The Austrian general, on his part, also engaged to release all persons in the strong places under his command, who might have been taken up in the Cisalpine republic for political opinions. Whatever might be the answer from Vienna, neither of the two armies was to attack the other without ten days previous notice. The last article of this treaty was of very great military importance. It provided that, during the suspension of arms, neither of the armies should send detachments into Germany.

The proposal for the armistice was first made, as already intimated, by General Melas. Bonaparte's answer to the Austrian general's message, respecting terms, was remarkably laconic: "The Austrian army shall immediately retire within the line which it should occupy, according to the treaty of Campo-Formio." He immediately dispatched a messenger, with an offer of a general peace to the emperor, on the same basis.

While the treaty for an armistice was drawn up, Bonaparte prepared to return to Milan, in order to re-organize the Cisalpine republic. Before he set off, he sent General Melas a present of a Turkish sabre, brought from Egypt. Gen. Melas said, to the aid-de-camp who delivered it to him—"I am sorry peace is so long delayed: I shall contribute my efforts to obtain it, that I may go and see Bonaparte at Paris. I would even go to see him in Egypt."

The prisoners made by the Austrians were restored on the 16th of June. Immediately after, the chief consul, escorted by a body of chasseurs, hastened to Milan, where he recognized and declared the Cisalpine republic to be a free and independent nation. He established a provisional administration, and a consulto for preparing for the republic a constitution and legislature, which he confided to Marliani, Sacchi, and Goffredo. He gave orders for respecting religion, and the property of all citizens without distinction. Citizens, who had fled from their country, were invited to return; with the exception of such as had used arms against the Cisalpine republic, after the treaty of Campo-Formio. All sequestrations were taken off, whether placed upon property possessed either under the title of ancient property, or in virtue of legal acquisition, under whatever pretext; and, on whatever occasion the said sequestrations might have been ordered. The citadel of Milan having agreed to surrender, the garrison, to the number of 4000, marched out with the honors of war. The full half of these being French and Piedmontese, came over to the French with arms and baggage, and colours flying. A magnificent Te Deum was celebrated in the cathedral of Milan, in gratitude for the success of the French arms, and particularly the triumphs of Bonaparte, the great patron and protector of religion. At this solemnity, amidst an immense number of people, the chief consul, General Berthier, and all his chief staff, were present.

Bonaparte, in a conference he had with the clergy at Milan, advised them to preach and practise the morality of Jesus Christ. In a solemn speech, pronounced at Milan, he said, "that Lombardy and Liguria should form only one republic." In a letter to the other two consuls, (Cambaceres and Le Brun,) he said he attended Te Deum in Milan, "in spite of what the ATHEISTS of Paris might say."

After Italy was re-conquered, by the quick passage of the Alps, the battle of Maringo, and the surrender of all the strong places in Lombardy, Piedmont, and Genoa, Berthier, as well as the first consul, returned to Paris, and Massena was succeeded in the command of the army by General Brune.

Campaign in Germany.—The French, under Moreau, cross the Rhine.—General Kray deceived.—Actions at Stockach, Maeskirch, Biberach, and Memingen.—The Austrians retire to Ulm.—Are followed by the French.—Moreau changes his Plan of Operations.—Crosses the Danube.—A Series of Actions.—General Kray leaves Ulm, which is blockaded by a Division of the French Army.—Contributions in Bavaria.—Munich taken.—An Armistice.—Seizure of Tuscany.—Prolongation of the Armistice.—Renewal of the War.—Battle of Hohenlinden.—Armistice concluded at Steyer.

A DIVISION which took place in the cabinet of Vienna, proved, at this critical period, peculiarly unfavorable to the house of Austria. The Archduke Charles, whose courage and patriotism had rendered him extremely popular, perceiving he was thwarted in his plans, had determined to resign; and, as the chief effort was intended to be made in Italy, Field-marshal Kray was left, with an ill-appointed army, to defend Germany.

For the purpose of effectually carrying on the combined campaign of Italy and Germany, it had been agreed upon between Bonaparte and Moreau, that the latter should, by a series of feigned attacks, occupy the attention of General

BOOK IV. Kray, strike terror into the heart of Germany, alarm the Austrians for the safety of the capital, and, at the same time, maintain a communication, and send seasonable reinforcements to the French army in Italy.

CHAP. VII.
1800.

On the 25th of April, the French army crossed the Rhine in four great divisions, under their respective commanders, General St. Susanne, General St. Cyr, General Moreau, and General Lecourbe. The division under General St. Susanne advanced to Offenburgh, while General St. Cyr, who had crossed the Rhine at Old Britac, advanced to Fribourg. The manœuvres of St. Cyr seemed to indicate an intention to form a junction with St. Susanne; and, of course, that the plan of Moreau was, to penetrate through the Black Mountains, by the valley of Kintzing, towards Donaweschingen. The movement of General St. Susanne, however, was only a feint, for he received orders, on the 27th, to return from Offenburgh to Kehl, and, marching up from thence along the banks of the Rhine, by forced marches, he arrived at Fribourg on the 30th of April. General St. Cyr, who had reached Fribourg without losing a man, pursued, meanwhile, that course of march which was necessary to form the junction of the whole army, between Shwetlingen and Schaffhausen, near the lake of Constance. The division under the immediate command of Moreau, crossed the Rhine at Basle, and proceeded, without any considerable opposition, to the point where the various divisions were to meet. General Lecourbe, with the division under his command, crossed the Rhine between Schaffhausen and Stein, and, after some fighting and making a great number of prisoners, the whole army, with the exception of the corps under Gen. St. Susanne, was assembled at, and in the environs of, Schaffhausen.

In the course of these various marches, the French took 1500 prisoners and six pieces of cannon. The division under Lecourbe likewise took, by capitulation, the castle of Hohenweil, in which there were eighty pieces of cannon. The great magazines of the Austrians were at Kampfen, a town in Upper Suabia. The French general directing his march towards this point, with a view to cut off General Kray from his principal dépôt, or, at least, in the mean time, to effect the main object of occupying the whole of his force and attention in Germany, drove all the Austrian advanced posts before him, and advanced to attack the imperialists at Stockach.

The masterly manœuvres of Moreau had completely deceived General Kray, respecting the plan of attack meditated by the French. In an official account, published in the Vienna Court Gazette of the 3d of May, we find the general announcing the passage of the Rhine on the 25th; and that, in consequence of having foreseen this manœuvre, he had sent a great body of troops to prevent the French from following up their plan of extending themselves in the neighbourhood of Rastadt. He considered the feint made by Gen. Susanne's division as the main attack, and concentrated all his forces at Donaweschingen, at the moment when, under cover of that feint, Moreau was enabled, as just observed, to cross the Rhine, at a point which enabled him completely to turn the position of the Austrian army.

The consequences of Moreau's plan were immediate. General Kray was compelled to decamp precipitately from Donaweschingen, in order to oppose the progress of the French army, leaving in their hands, in abandoning his position at Donaweschingen, a great part of what is called the angle of Suabia. The Austrian magazines and stores were either conveyed away in haste, left behind, or destroyed. On the 3d of May, Gen. Susanne, with the left wing of the French, entered Donaweschingen, which had been evacuated by the Austrians, and pressed upon their rear; then stretching out his flanks, at the same time, to the main body of Moreau's army, they endeavoured to establish themselves in the lines of Stockach, in order to oppose the lines of the enemy. On the same day, a part of the French army attacked the post at Stockach. The force that defended it, under the orders of Prince Joseph of Lorraine, being too weak, was soon overpowered, and obliged to retreat, with considerable loss. The post at Engen was commanded by General Kray in person. He was attacked, May 4, by Moreau, who, in repeated charges, lost a great number of men. In the course of these conflicts, a body of the Austrian army, under the Archduke Ferdinand, in their retreat from Donaweschingen, were attacked, in their rear, by General Susanne's division, and nearly cut off.

The Archduke, on this occasion, displayed consummate personal bravery. By great exertions of judgment, and presence of mind, as well as valour, he was enabled to join the main army. General Kray maintained his post, and prevented the enemy from making any great impression, and kept the field during the night. But, at day-break, he thought it prudent to commence a retreat; which he had continued to the length of about fifteen miles, when he was again attacked, on the 5th, by General Moreau. Being ably assisted by Lecourbe, he made some impression on the Austrian battalions, notwithstanding their intrepid exertions; but, though superior in numbers, he did not think it proper to renew the combat on the following day. His loss was supposed to have been greater than that of General Kray. Mr. Wickham, the British narrator of these engagements, affirmed, in his dispatches, "that few prisoners were made on either side;" while Moreau asserted, that, in the two engagements, the French made no less than about 10,000 prisoners. By all accounts, the loss on both sides must have been very great.

In this last action, denominated the battle of Maeskirch, the Bavarian subsidiaries fought with such spirit as excited the praise of their fellow-combatants. The Swiss regiment of Roverea also particularly distinguished itself.

Mr. Wickham reported, that, in the battle of Maeskirch, the French were repulsed. The Austrians, however, on the day after, (May 6,) retreated across the Danube to the ground between Sigmaringen and Reitlingen, a distance of at least fifteen miles farther.

The Austrians, in their retreat from Maeskirch, were pursued by a division of the French, under General Ney, who took 1500 prisoners. A very serious engagement was the consequence of an opportunity afforded to the French of attacking the Austrian advanced posts, on the 9th of May, at Biberach. The result of this battle was, that the Austrians were forced to retreat, with the loss of above 1000 killed on the spot, and above 2000 prisoners.

Another desperate engagement took place on the 11th, near Memingen. On the termination of this battle, General Moreau wrote, by the telegraph, to the French minister of war, as follows: "The right wing of the army, commanded by General Lecourbe, attacked the enemy on the 21st of Floreal, (11th of May,) in their position at Memingen. They were completely beaten. Memingen has been taken, more than 2000 prisoners have been made, and a great number of dead were left on the field of battle." The accounts of the Austrians stated, that the advantage in this action was on their side. However this may be, General Kray, leaving a considerable body of troops, under General Mereveltdt, to keep up the communication with General Reuss in the Voralberg, retreated to Ulm, for the protection of his magazines there. At Ulm he was joined by General Sztarray, with the troops under his command, and 6000 Bavarian and Wirtemberg auxiliaries, under the orders of the Baron de Deux-Ponts. The main body of the imperial army was posted at Phuel, half a league from Ulm.—This city had a garrison of 10,000 men, commanded by General Petrarsch and Major Davidovich. General Sztarray, with additional troops, raised the number of the garrison, which came under his command, to the number of 18,000. The gates were guarded by the auxiliaries.

The French were also concentrated on the territory of the imperial city of Ulm, near Rheineck, little more than a league from Ulm. In this situation of the two armies, it seemed that the French were desirous of giving battle to General Kray, who, on the other hand, was anxious to avoid it, until the reinforcements promised, and part of which were on their way, should arrive from Austria. Six battalions of infantry, of the garrison of Vienna, were on their march, and to be followed by six more, and five squadrons of cuirassiers. The garrisons of the cities in Austria, Bohemia, and Moravia, were repairing partly to the Danube, and partly to the Adige, on each of which rivers there was to be formed a body of reserve. As no inviting circumstances for an attack were presented to either party, both generals contented themselves with mutual observation, while terror and consternation prevailed throughout the circle of Suabia.

But this state of inaction and repose, while it amused the Austrians with the hope of succours, was still more advantageous to the cause of the invaders, who laid the whole of Franconia and Suabia under severe contribution, intercepted the supplies, and took or destroyed not a few of the Austrian magazines, supported themselves at the expence of the Germans, kept the grand Austrian army in check, and on a constant alert, and prevented General Kray from sending any considerable detachment to Italy.

In the mean time, the plan of co-operation, concerted between Bonaparte and Moreau, began to be pretty clearly developed. While Moreau still made a shew of directing the main force of his army to the countries on the left bank of the Rhine, he began to detach part of his troops towards the Lake of Constance: whither he afterwards withdrew with the main body, with an intention to remain on the defensive, and favor, as much as possible, the operation of the campaign in Italy.

General St. Susanne, with the division of the French army under his command, had always remained on the left bank of the Danube, in the neighbourhood of Geisligen, which was his headquarters. While the attention of the Austrians was occupied by a great deal of manœuvring and skirmishing in that quarter, and other demonstrations of a design to penetrate into the heart of Germany, and to the capital, he stretched off, by degrees, along the course of the Iller, by Memingen and Kampten, to the Lake of Constance. By cutting off Prince Reuss from General Kray, and keeping the commander-in-chief so long in check, he had already enabled divisions or detachments, from his army, to get possession of Augsburg, Lindau, Bregentz, Fieldkirk, and other posts, which might be considered as the keys of the Grisons and the Tyrole, through which countries it would now be in his power to communicate with Bonaparte, by this time descending from the summit of the Alps into the plains of Piedmont and Lombardy.

For nearly two months, Moreau had sought nothing farther than to amuse General Kray by marches and counter-marches, by threatened

BOOK IV.
 CHAP. VII.

sieges, and sham irruptions, to alarm the Austrians for the safety of the hereditary states, and prevent them from paying any attention to the affairs of Italy. After the battle of Maringo, he was at liberty to act with more enterprise and vigour. The armistice in Italy did not extend to Germany; and the last, and one of the most important articles in the convention, as before observed, prevented either party from sending detachments to that quarter. This condition was evidently in favor of the Austrians; but there were other circumstances equally encouraging to the French commander.

A small body of men remained organized at Dijon, after the departure of Bonaparte, and its numbers had been since very considerably increased. This body had already made a movement from Dijon towards a point from whence it could go to the assistance of either army, and now it received orders to repair to the banks of the Iller; and the success of Bonaparte's enterprise raised the spirits of Frenchmen to an enthusiasm which nothing could withstand, that was not in its nature impossible. The victories, the conquests, and the positions of the French at this time, were indeed such as might have inspired a less sanguine and volatile nation with confidence. Switzerland was in their hands, and formed a most important point of communication between the armies in Italy and Suabia. They were in possession of both sides of the Lake of Constance. All Suabia was in their hands. A corps of troops, in Switzerland, was ready to attack the Grisons. A detachment of 25,000 men, from the Milanese, was marching through the Valtelline for the same purpose. The right wing of Moreau's army threatened the Austrian positions in the Tyrole, upon the north-west: in a word, the French armies, from the shores of the Mediterranean to the Danube, and even the Lower Rhine, formed but one compact force, without any points to interrupt their correspondence, and without any obstacle to their entire co-operation. On the whole, General Moreau, being now without any alarm for the army of reserve, or any restraint imposed upon his operations, by a concern for its preservation, but, on the contrary, strengthened by its co-operation on the side of the Grisons and the Tyrolese, was at liberty to display his military skill. He prepared to cross the Danube, and, if possible, to bring General Kray to a decisive action. For this last purpose, on the 18th of June, he sent the right wing of his army, under Lecourbe, over the river below Ulm, between Villingen and the celebrated village of Blenheim: by this movement, threatening to cut off General Kray from his magazines at Donawert and Ratisbon, as well as from his expected reinforcements. The main body crossed at a point nearer to Ulm.

In a letter addressed to the chief consul, bearing date the 22d of June, Moreau explained his reasons for thus acting: "He had observed that the Austrian army kept close to his camp at Ulm, which gave it the advantage of easy openings on both sides of the Danube, while it consequently prevented the French from making any considerable progress in Germany. General Moreau had made a movement, in order to induce the enemy to give battle near Blaubeuven, which he declined. Fearing that General Kray might avail himself of that movement, in order to advance upon Memingen, connect himself with the Tyrole, and send down a corps of troops into Italy, that might have very much embarrassed the chief consul, he determined to make General Lecourbe execute several manœuvres on the Leck, in the hopes that he should thereby force General Kray to march to protect Bavaria; but he continued to manœuvre in the French rear. Imagining that an opportunity was presented of gaining a considerable advantage, he made an attack on Moreau's left wing, on the 5th of June; but was so bravely opposed by General Richepanse and other officers, that he was obliged to retreat with precipitation, and re-pass the Danube. General Moreau then formed the project of compelling him to withdraw, or come to a battle."

In the execution of this design, a series of actions took place for four successive days, on the famous plains of Blenheim or Hockstat; in which the Austrians lost, in killed, wounded, and prisoners, not less than 5 or 6000 men; and the French, at least, as was computed, half that number. The Austrian divisions, under the Generals Sztarray and Nauendorf, being cut off from the main army, General Kray was reduced to the necessity of leaving Ulm to the protection of a garrison. The blockade of Ulm was now carried on by General Richepanse. General Kray, after several very severe actions on the left side of the Danube, retreated, with his reduced army, to Ingolstadt.

To give a detailed account of all the manœuvres and actions, through which the French crossed the Rhine, established themselves on the left bank, and drove the main Austrian army from their entrenched camp, near Ulm, would be both tedious and uninteresting. One circumstance we shall notice, as curious in itself, and characteristic of that courage and genius which was displayed by the French in this campaign, and throughout the whole of the war.

The passage of the Rhine was both difficult and dangerous, as the French had neither bridges nor boats, the Austrians having destroyed the former and sunk the latter. After several actions, on the 18th of June, in which the Austrians were compelled to fall back upon Ulm, General Lecourbe made several demonstrations on that day, on the bridge of Villengen: but, in consequence of the reports made by his reconnoitring parties, he determined seriously to attempt the bridges of Grensheim, Blenheim, and Hockstadt. Eighty naked swimmers, to be armed with muskets and knapsacks, which were sent after them in two small boats, took possession of the villages of Grensheim and Blenheim, and made themselves masters of some pieces of cannon, which were manned by artillerymen, who had passed over on ladders placed on the wrecks of the bridge. All of them maintained their positions with extraordinary courage, while a number of miners and bridge-builders were employed, under the enemy's fire, in repairing the bridges, over which a force was sent to oppose the reinforcements which the enemy were marching towards the points where the object of the attack could be no longer doubtful. The 94th demi-brigade passed over after the swimmers, and boldly supported themselves until other parties came to assist them. After the retreat of the Austrian main army from Ulm, General Moreau took possession of Munich, and laid the Bavarian territories under heavy contributions. The elector was compelled to pay to Moreau a great part of the subsidy of 500,000*l.* which he had received from Great Britain. After the retreat of the Austrian army from Suabia, the French also took possession of the principal places in the duchy of Wurtemberg, which, as well as Bavaria, was laid under severe contribution, and treated altogether as an enemy's country. The Duke and Duchess of Wurtemberg, with their family and suite, retired to Anspach. The French at the same time, by the occupation of Ell-Wangen, became masters of the whole electorate of Treves.

In the mean time, the division under General Lecourbe drove the Austrians from Coire and the whole of the country of the Grisons. Thus General Moreau, by transferring the seat of the war to the frontiers of Austria, and by pressing closer and closer on the flank and rear of the Austrians in the Tyrole, prepared the way for driving the imperialists out of that country, lest they should be altogether surrounded by the army under Moreau, and detachments from that of Bonaparte through the Valtelline. Still farther to aggravate the evil plight of the Austrians, an army of 30,000 strong, French and Bavarians, was on its march from the Lower to the Upper Rhine, and ready to pass by Mentz and Dessel-dorf into Franconia.

In these circumstances, the Austrians solicited an armistice, which, at the desire or advice of Bonaparte to Moreau, was, on the 15th of July, granted. This truce led to a negotiation, which was conducted, on the part of the emperor, by Count St. Julien, who, on the 28th of July, signed, at Paris, the preliminaries of peace on the basis of the treaty of Campo Formio. On the part of the French, they were signed by the minister for foreign affairs, the ex-bishop Talleyrand.

Such was the overbearing weight of those circumstances which induced the Austrian government to request a suspension of arms. The same circumstances urged the necessity of carrying the preliminaries into a definitive treaty of peace. A strong disposition to repel the aggressive and the intolerable oppression of the French, whose exactions were greater in this than they had been in any former campaign, began to manifest itself in all the hereditary states, particularly in Hungary; and the emperor, being pressed by the British court to accept fresh pecuniary supplies, had concluded a treaty on the 20th of June, by which he became indebted to Great Britain in the sum of 2,000,000*l.* sterling, not liable to interest before the expiration of six months from the adjustment of a peace between him and the French. It was also stipulated that the war should be carried on with all possible vigour: and, that neither party should conclude a peace that did not also comprehend the other. His imperial majesty, faithful to this engagement, endeavoured for some weeks to include the British nation in a treaty of general peace: and a temporary correspondence was opened between the French government and the British court: but it was not productive of a formal negotiation. The emperor, therefore, refused to ratify the preliminaries that had been signed by the Count St. Julien, alleging withal, that the count in that act had exceeded his powers.

The French government, towards the end of August, informed the generals of its armies, that the emperor having refused to subscribe to the conditions of the preliminaries of peace, which had been signed by his plenipotentiary at Paris, the government was under the necessity of continuing the war. The armistice was of course broken off, and would cease to have effect on the 7th of September at one in the afternoon. The general officers and chiefs of corps were instructed to profit by this interval, to pass the troops in review, and to dispose every thing in such a manner, that they might be able to march and fight as soon as they should receive orders.

The emperor also issued a proclamation, on the 6th of September, announcing the rupture of the armistice; which, he said, had been discontinued by the French, unexpectedly, and without cause. In order to give an incontrovertible proof to his own subjects, and to all Europe, how much he had their welfare and protection at heart, he had resolved to repair in person, with his royal brother the Archduke John, to his army in Germany. His imperial majesty declared, at the same time, that he was unalterably disposed to accept with pleasure any reasonable propositions and conditions of peace.

The resolution of the emperor to put himself at the head of his army, was taken, no doubt, with a view to rouse the ancient courage of the Germans; and to give efficacy to proclamations, which he issued at the same time, for calling forth the force of the country in volunteer associations. But the emperor had no sooner joined the army, which was under the immediate and sole command of the Archduke John, than he made application to the French government for a prolongation of the armistice. The first consul, on conditions presently to be mentioned, agreed to this; declaring at the same time that the renewal of hostilities, or the improvement of a suspension of arms into a permanent peace, would wholly depend on the rejection or the ratification of the preliminaries concluded with Count St. Julien. The consul at the same time declared that he thought it his duty not to waste the remainder of the autumn in idle conferences, or to expose himself to endless diplomatic discussions, without securities for the sincerity of the enemy's intentions. The securities he demanded were Philipsburg, Ulm, and Ingolstadt, with their dependent forts. This condition, though it left the hereditary dominions of Austria, in a great measure, at the mercy of the enemy, being agreed to at Hohenlinden, a suspension of arms was concluded for forty-five days, commencing from the 21st of September.

There was not, during this interval, any remission of military preparation on either side. Recruits were sent from the camp at Dijon to the French armies; and the Austrians were reinforced by battalions raised in all parts of the hereditary states. The French army of the Rhine, seconded on its left by the army of Augereau, and on its right by that of the Grisons, formed on the Mayne, as far as the entry into the Tyrole, a line ready to advance on the first signal. It was composed of twelve divisions, comprising at least 100,000 men, and was divided into four corps; of which, that under General Lecourbe, consisting of three divisions, occupied Upper Suabia, Upper Bavaria, and the entry to the Tyrole. That under the immediate orders of the commander-in-chief in person, consisting of three other divisions, occupied the two banks of the Iller as far as Landshut. That of General Grenier, consisting of three more divisions, held all the left banks of the Danube nearly to Passau, and the right bank of that river as far as the mouth of it at Almuck: and, lastly, that of General St. Susame, composed of three other divisions, occupied the country between the Mayne and the Danube, from Bamberg as far as Aix-la-Chapelle.—While the French were thus formidable in front, there was nothing to be apprehended on either of their flanks. Italy was re-conquered. Switzerland was in their possession, the French moulding its government just as they pleased: and a Prussian army maintained the neutrality of the north of Germany.

The French, in the arrangements made with the Austrians for a suspension of arms, had acquiesced in the neutrality of Tuscany: and, perhaps, if that suspension had been followed by a pacification, as proposed by the chief consul in the moment of victory, it would not have been violated. But when negotiation for peace was found not to be successful, the French government became desirous of repossessing the duchy; and, on pretence of frequent outrages and depredations committed, as was alleged, in the adjoining districts, by Tuscan brigands, or robbers. It was thus that they thought proper, on the present occasion, to style an armed corps, which the inhabitants had formed for maintaining the internal order and tranquillity of the country. General Sommariva, in the end of September, was sent with only a small escort to disarm and disperse the national guard of the Tuscans. This requisition not being readily complied with, General Brune sent a detachment, under General Dupont, to take possession of the Tuscan territory. Dupont, on the 15th of October, entered Florence without opposition. Soon after this, Brigadier-general Clement persuaded the Austrian troops at Leghorn to surrender that town to him, on his assenting to a convention for the continuance of the Tuscan government, and the security of privileges and of property. This agreement was not scrupulously observed, though the British merchants were fortunate in preserving the greater part of their effects by means of the ships in the harbour. Strong parties were now sent out against the armed Tuscans at Arezzo and other places; and, as some resistance was made by the latter, they were not subdued and dispersed without bloodshed. About the same time, a heavy contribution was imposed on the small helpless state of Lucca.

The French authority and power throughout Italy was at this time so great, that the municipality of Cesenatico, a sea-port on the Adriatic coast, presumed to arrest an English officer, who carried dispatches to them from the British admiral in the Mediterranean. The municipality appeared not to have any other motive for this deed than the usual propensity of paltry and overawed states to pay court to the prevailing power by marks of zealous servility. Lord Keith determined to take severe vengeance for this breach of the law of nations; and Captain Ricket carried his orders into prompt execution. A proclamation was issued, lamenting that the innocent should suffer with and for the guilty, but stating at the same time the necessity of sanctioning and supporting a law so indispensably necessary in all the intercourses of peace or war, and which the magistrates of Cesenatico had so unnecessarily and wantonly violated. A short time after the publication of this, all the vessels within the Mole were sunk or burned. The two piers were consumed, and the harbour was rendered useless.

It is not easy, amidst so many complicated views and shifting scenes, to account for the restoration of Rome, with the greater part of the Roman territories, to the pope. The conclave for the election of a successor to Pius VI. was held under the auspices of the emperor at Venice. It was generally supposed that, in this step, the court of Vienna had it in contemplation to stipulate for some cessions on the part of the Romish see to the house of Austria, in Italy. The ecclesiastic honored with the pontificate was Cardinal di Chiamonte, a man of good sense, and mild and unassuming manners. As it was customary for the new pontiff to assume the name of the pope who had promoted him to the dignity of cardinal, Chiamonte took that of Pius VII. The emperor, on his election, presented him with a sum of money, as an earnest of his regard and protection; but did not at first restore any part of the papal dominions. It is not impossible, that after the battle of Marignano, when he became apprehensive of the loss of his power and influence in Italy, he resolved to have the credit of delivering up to the pope the greater part of the ecclesiastical estate, rather than that it should fall into either the possession or disposal of other hands. The court of Vienna, it was said, had been for some time suspicious of an understanding between the King of Naples and the Russians. The king, it was suspected, was to accommodate the court of St. Petersburg with the long object of its ambition, some sea-port in the Mediterranean, and to be indemnified by a portion of the ecclesiastical territories. Be all this as it may, the Austrians having delivered up to his holiness the greater part of the ecclesiastical state, Pius VII. took possession of the see of Rome, and began to exercise the functions of sovereignty, with great dignity and moderation.

Moreau, who had returned to his native country in order to be married, soon after repaired to his head-quarters in Germany.

The Austrian armies advanced to the frontiers, and occupied a chain of posts in front of the hostile army, bending their main force to strengthen their line, from the frontier of Austria to the Gulph of Venice. An army of 30,000 men was stationed in Bohemia, under the command of the Archduke Charles, who still granted his assistance. The right banks of the Mayne were occupied by the Austrians in great force.

And an army, under the command of General Klenau, in the Upper Palatinate, was opposed to the French division under General St. Sausanne, whose head-quarters were at Mayence.

The positions and first movements of the invading army seemed to indicate an intention of carrying the great weight of the war into Bohemia. But the grand plan of Moreau's operations was not fully or certainly developed; this winter campaign being speedily cut short, by decisive advantages obtained over the Austrians. The French troops, under Augereau, drove those of Mayence from Aschaffenberg, on the 24th of November, and marched through Franconia towards Bohemia, to communicate with the left of the division under General Moreau.

On the 29th, General Moreau recommenced hostilities, near the Inn, and carried the Austrian works at Wassenberg. He was less successful in a battle on the 1st of December, near Haag, where he was vigorously attacked by the Archduke John, at the head of three columns. The Austrians were repeatedly driven back, but at last prevailed. The French were forced to retreat with great slaughter. On the same day, an attack was made by the French on an Austrian post at Rosenheim, but were repulsed after a hot engagement. In this action, the Prince of Condé's corps acquired great reputation by their firmness and cool courage. The Prince of Condé's son and the Duke of Angoulême were particularly distinguished.

The Archduke John, encouraged by these successes, on the 3d of December assaulted the French post at Hohenlinden, memorable for the last convention, and rendered still more memorable by the battle of this day. The archduke had no sooner begun his march than there fell a heavy shower of snow and sleet, by which his army was so much retarded, that only the central column had arrived at the place of destination at a time when all the divisions ought to have been ready for action. A division of the French, conducted by Richempanse, pierced between the left wing of the Austrians and the centre, reached the great road behind the centre, and assaulted the left flank and rear of that column, at a moment when it had formed in front, and commenced an attack. The Austrians, with their usual courage and bravery, sustained the conflict or several hours; but their centre being repelled by the impetuosity of the French, great disorder ensued. Their left wing was also defeated: and the battle seemed to be completely decided in favor of the French, when a vigorous attempt was made, by the right wing, to turn the tide of victory.

General Grenier sustained this unexpected charge with firmness; and, being well supported, threw his adversaries into the utmost confusion.

The Austrians were forced to retire to the heights of Ramsau, with very great loss: and General Kinwayer, being attacked on his march by a corps from Arding, likewise suffered severely in that retreat, to which he was driven by intelligence of the disaster that had befallen the main army.

According to the account of the battle of Hohenlinden, given by General Moreau, the French took 80 pieces of cannon, 200 caissons, 10,000 prisoners, and a great number of officers, among whom were three generals. The general did not state the loss of the French to be more than 1000 in killed, wounded, and missing. But, according to the Austrian accounts, and on which all the world placed more dependence, the report of Moreau exceeded the truth by at least one half. The victorious republicans, after a long and unremitted pursuit of the flying Austrians, took possession of the city of Saltzburgh.

In the mean time, the three other French armies, the Gallo-Batavian, and that of Italy, were not idle. On the day distinguished by the battle of Hohenlinden, General Augereau gained an important advantage near Banberg. General Macdonald, defying the obstacles of an Alpine winter, passed from the country of the Grisons into the Valtelline, drove the enemy before him, and opened a communication with the army of Italy. A division of his army, after a series of actions with the Austrians, crossed the Mincio on the 26th of December. Vienna was struck with terror. The Archduke repaired to the camp, to animate the troops to fresh exertion: but this prince, on a comparative view of his own with the enemy's strength, proposed an armistice, which was readily agreed to, and concluded, at Steyer, on the 25th of December, though the French, breaking their faith, had dismantled the three towns which had been delivered to them merely as pledges. The emperor consented to the surrender of many other posts, relying on the promise of restitution; and he was constrained, by a succession of heavy losses, to declare his readiness to detach himself from his allies, and recede from his former determination to agree to no other than a general peace. The British court, duly sensible of the alarming situation in which they themselves had so much contributed to involve him, released him from his engagements.

On a general retrospect of this combined campaign, in Italy and Germany, we find that it was art, contrivance, and stratagem, that decided the contest in favor of the French. The conditions by which the emperor procured an armistice of only forty-five days, were hard; it having been agreed, in a convention signed at Steyer, that the Tyrole should be wholly evacuated, and the fortresses of Brunau and Wartzbourg delivered up to the French. The most lively alarm was excited in Vienna, till the arrival of the Archduke Charles, at ten o'clock in the morning of Dec. 27, with the news of his having concluded an armistice with General Moreau.

CHAPTER VIII.

Negotiation between Great Britain and France.—Broken off.—Mr. Sheridan's consequent Motion in the House of Commons.—Excessive Scarcity in England, and consequent Commotions.—Attempt on the Life of his Majesty.—Attempt on the Life of the First Consul.

THE ministers of Europe were, at this period, busily treating with the agents of the first consul for peace; and Great Britain, who had disdainfully rejected the advances of Bonaparte, when he first arrived at power, now condescended to join in those negotiations. Early in the month of August, Lord Minto, in a note to Baron Thugut, after expressing the satisfaction felt by the king his master at the conduct of his imperial majesty, declared the entire concurrence of his Britannic majesty in the negotiations which might take place for a general pacification, and his readiness to send plenipotentiaries to treat for peace, in concert with those of his imperial and royal majesty, as soon as the intentions of the French government to enter into a negotiation with his Britannic majesty should be known to him.

Baron Thugut, in a dispatch, dated August the 11th, to M. Talleyrand, informed that minister that the King of Great Britain, the ally of his imperial majesty, was ready on his part to concur in the negotiations for re-establishing general tranquillity, after which, suffering Europe had long sighed in vain; and it only remained therefore, he said, to agree upon the place at which the plenipotentiaries should meet—proposing the city of Luneville.

In consequence of this communication, Mr. Otto, commissary of the French republic (resident in England), a man of great discretion and address, transmitted by order of his government a note to Lord Grenville, dated August 24, demanding further explanations respecting the proposition communicated by the court of London to that of Vienna; observing, at the same time, the impossibility that, at the moment when Austria and England take a common share in the negotiations, France should find herself under a suspension of arms with Austria, and a continuation of hostilities with England. He proposed, on the part of the first consul, a general armistice between the fleets and armies of France and England, analogous to those which had taken place in Italy and Germany; and declared that he had received from his government the powers necessary for negotiation and concluding this general armistice.

A Captain George, commissary for the exchange of prisoners, and therefore a gentleman personally known to Mr. Otto, was directed to confer with him, agreeably to a minute of instructions with which he was furnished. With regard to the naval armistice, Captain George was directed to say, "that an armistice, as applying to naval operations, had at no period ever been agreed on between Great Britain and France during the course of their negotiations for peace, or until the preliminaries had been actually signed; that it could, therefore, be considered as a step necessary to negotiation; and that, from the disputes to which its execution must unavoidably be expected to give rise, it might probably tend rather to obstruct than to facilitate the success of those endeavours which the two parties might employ for the restoration of peace; that the circumstances of a naval war are obviously not such as to admit of equal arrangements as are easily established with regard to military operations, when suspended by such an agreement; that it appeared, therefore, at all events, premature to enter even into the discussion of the question.

Captain George was in return informed by Mr. Otto (August 28), that he had every reason to think that the continuation of the German armistice would depend upon the conclusion of the English armistice, the advantages of the latter being considered by France as an equivalent for the very obvious disadvantages of the German one. Mr. Otto further declared himself instructed to require an answer to the proposal for a general armistice, before the 3d of September; which made him conclude that hostilities might again commence about that time, should the proposed armistice be positively refused on the part of his majesty. From this declaration, the great importance attached to the naval armistice, by the government of France, plainly appeared. It was made the indispensable condition of prolonging the German armistice, and of admitting England to a joint negociation with Austria. It remained with the English court to determine, whether it was least disadvantageous to her interests to admit the claim of France, or, rejecting it, to withdraw her own to the joint negociation. To endeavour, by arguing the case, to obtain the advantage, and to avoid the disadvantage, led unavoidably to that sort of altercation, from which nothing but ill-humour and loss of time could possibly result.

On the 29th an official note was addressed by Lord Grenville to Mr. Otto, similar to the instructions of Captain George; to which Mr. Otto replied, on the following day, "that he was directed to submit to the British government the projet for a maritime truce; but the ministers of his majesty having judged that it would be PREMATURE to enter even into the DISCUSSION of this object, it is his duty to respect the motives which appear to them to militate against such a negociation."

The 3d of September having passed over, Mr. Otto transmitted another note to Lord Grenville, in which he stated, by express order from his government, "that preliminaries of peace had been concluded and signed between his imperial majesty and the French republic; and that the intervention of Lord Minto, who demanded that England should be admitted to take part in the negotiations, prevented their ratification by his imperial majesty. That the suspension of arms, which had taken place solely in the hope of a speedy peace between the emperor and the republic, ought to cease, and will in fact cease, on the 24th Fructidor (11th Sept.), since France had sacrificed to that hope alone the immense advantages which victory had secured to her; that, in fine, the intervention of England rendered the question of peace so complicated, that it was impossible for the French government to prolong further the armistice upon the continent, unless his Britannic majesty would consent to render it common to the three powers." And Mr. Otto further informed Lord Grenville, that the besieged or blockaded places which it was proposed to assimilate to those of Germany, were Malta and the maritime towns of Egypt.

Lord Grenville wrote on the same day a letter to Mr. Nepean, secretary to the admiralty, importing, "that, the French government having, as it appeared, determined to make the continuance of the armistice between Austria and France, and the commencement of the negotiations for peace, dependent on the conclusion of an armistice with this country, it was judged proper that he should see Mr. Otto, and inquire of him, whether he was furnished with a project of a treaty of naval truce, and what were the conditions of it." Hereupon Mr. Otto avowed to Mr. Nepean, that he was deterred from presenting the projet which he had

BOOK IV. been in possession of by his lordship's declaration CHAP. VIII. "that it was altogether premature to enter into the discussion of the question!"

1800.

The project consisted of seven articles, in substance as follows:—1. Suspension of hostilities. —2. Free navigation—3. Vessels captured after a fixed period to be restored.—4. Malta, Alexandria, and Belleisle, to be assimilated to Ulm, Philippsburg, and Ingoldstadt; and all neutral or French vessels to enter with provisions freely.—5. The British squadrons which blockaded Brest, Cadiz, Toulon, and Flushing, to withdraw from the coasts.—6. Armistice to be regularly notified.—7. Spain and Holland to be included.

On the 7th of September, Lord Grenville returned an answer. "The spirit of the note last received from Mr. Otto," said his Lordship, "is unhappily but little consonant with those appearances of a conciliatory disposition, which had before been manifested. If it be really practicable, in the present moment, to restore permanent tranquillity to Europe, this object must be effected by very different means than those of such a controversy as that paper is calculated to excite." The English minister then proceeded to state, the abstract principle on which an armistice ought to be founded, and employed great pains to expose the inequality of the conditions proposed by France, and their incongruity, with the abstract principle laid down by him. "To a proposal," said this statesman, "so manifestly repugnant to justice and equality, and so injurious, not only to his majesty's interests, but also to those of his allies, it could not be expected that any motive should induce the king to accede." He then informed Mr. Otto, that he had transmitted to him a counter-projet, "containing regulations more nearly corresponding with that principle of equality on which alone his majesty could consent to treat. Even those articles were, in many important points, very short of what his majesty might justly demand from a reference to the general principle above stated."

The chief, and indeed only essential, points of difference between the projet and the counter-projet, consisted in the more rigid restrictions proposed, and no doubt very properly, by the English government, respecting Malta and the ports of Egypt, and insisting "that nothing should be admitted by sea which could give additional means of defence, and provisions only for fourteen days, in proportion to the consumption. And, in regard to the ports of France, that none of the ships of war should, during the armistice, be removed to any other station."

The letter and counter-projet of Lord Grenville having been transmitted by Mr. Otto to Paris, he was authorised, on the 16th of September, to return an answer to the same; in which he informed the English minister, that, the papers in question having been laid before the first consul, he observed that the armistice proposed by England did not offer any advantage to the French republic, and consequently could not compensate for the serious inconveniences which would result to it, from the continuance of the continental armistice. Hence it followed, that the counter-projet could be admitted only as the basis of a particular arrangement between France and England. But, the effect of the proposed maritime truce being intended to serve as a compensation to the French republic, for the continental truce, the former ought to afford to it advantages equal to the conveniences which it expressed from the latter.

Mr. Otto, therefore, stated that he had received directions to make two proposals, of which his Britannic majesty might choose that which should appear to him more consonant to the interest of his dominions, or to his continental relations. The first was, "that the projet for an armistice be drawn up, and admitted, in terms analogous to those which had been proposed to the ministry of his Britannic majesty, but relative only to a separate negotiation between the two powers." And, secondly, "that his Britannic majesty should continue to make common cause with the emperor, but that in this case he should consent that the maritime truce might offer to the French republic, advantages equal to those secured to the house of Austria by the continental truce.—The first consul had already made, to the love of peace, a sufficiently great sacrifice. If he should continue to derive no benefit from the successes of the war, it would no longer be moderation, but weakness. It would no longer be the means of arriving at the conclusion of peace, but that of perpetuating the war. Perhaps, in the judgment of statesmen, the French government might have already too long delayed to avail itself of the contingency which was favorable to it; but it only did so upon the positive assurances which had been given to it, of a speedy and separate peace."

To this statement of the nature of the alternative offered by France, Lord Grenville, on the 20th of September, returned an answer, importing, "that his majesty still looked to a naval armistice, on suitable conditions, as to a sacrifice which he might be induced to make, in order to prevent the renewal of hostilities on the continent, and thereby to facilitate those joint negotiations for general peace, which might perhaps be accelerated by such an arrangement, although they were by no means necessarily dependent on it. But, when it was required that the extent of the sacrifice which his majesty was to make, should be regulated neither by any fair standard of equality, nor by the ordinary rules which govern such transactions; when without any reference to the interests of his own people, he was called upon to proportion his concessions to the exaggerated estimates which his enemies had formed of the benefits derived to his allies, from the continental armistice; and when, on such grounds as these, conditions were insisted on which even these could not warrant, it became necessary to state distinctly, that his majesty neither recognised this principle, nor, if he did, could he agree in this application of it."

On the 21st of September, an answer was returned to Lord Grenville's official communication, by Mr. Otto, who expressed the deepest regret that the principles of conciliation contained in his note were not acceded to. "It was," he said, "not merely with a view to discuss those principles, but in order to propose fresh means of reconciliation, that he felt it his duty to request, in his letter of the 16th, an interview with his excellency." And he announced to the English minister, that the intentions of the first consul were anew detailed in the projet which he had the honor to inclose.

The second projet of France differed from that of England, chiefly in two points:—first, in the extraordinary stipulation, that six French frigates should have the liberty of sailing from Toulon, of unlading at Alexandria, and of returning without being searched; and, secondly, that the restriction respecting ships of war, in the fifth article, should be confined to ships of the line.

On the 23d of September, an official note was addressed by Mr. Otto to Lord Grenville, in which he again expressed his regret, that the want of more direct communication with his majesty's ministers had rendered it impossible for him to give his official overtures the necessary explanations. He now stated, that in conformity with the advice which he had transmitted to Lord Grenville on the 4th instant, notification was given of the cessation of the continental armistice at the term which had been fixed upon; but the counter-projet of the British ministry, dispatched by the under-signed on the 8th of this month, having reached Paris on the 10th, and his majesty having appeared to be convinced that his ally would not withhold his consent to an admissible armistice, the first consul determined for eight days to retard the renewal of hostilities. Orders were immediately dispatched to the armies of Germany and Italy; and, in the event of those orders arriving too late in the last-mentioned country, and of the French generals having obtained successes in consequence of any military operation, they were ordered to resume that position which they occupied on the precise day on which hostilities were recommenced.

Lord Grenville in his reply (September 24th) renewed his charge of duplicity, or rather of fraud, against the first consul, and endeavoured to support this accusation by a reference to dates. "The first proposal," he said, "made on the part of France for a naval armistice, was dated August 24—the notices for terminating the continental armistice were given by the French generals on the 27th and 29th of August: the orders for that purpose must, therefore, have been actually sent from Paris before the 24th." His lordship insinuated, that the only satisfactory evidence which the French government could now give of the sincerity of its disposition for peace, would be by engaging with facility in a joint negociation with the king and the emperor. This statesman added, "that no man who considers the past events of this contest with attention, or who is capable of judging with accuracy of the present situation of affairs, can believe, that, if the present war is to be terminated by a succession of treaties between the different powers now engaged in it, any permanent or solid basis of general tranquillity could be established."

Still persisting in his resolution not to submit to a personal interview with Mr. Otto, his lordship informed that gentleman of "the appointment by his majesty of a proper person to confer with him respecting the different proposals for a naval armistice. This step," his lordship said, "affords a new proof of his majesty's disposition to bend himself to every reasonable facility which can contribute to a general pacification." The person appointed was Mr. G. Hammond, under-secretary of state, who received from Lord Grenville very ample and detailed instructions respecting the business on which he was to treat. However, in the conference which took place between Mr. Hammond and Mr. Otto, September 25, the French minister made no scruple to acknowledge, "that the fourth and fifth articles contained the only points to which his government attached much importance; and such were its sentiments respecting them, and he conceived that it would not consent to any armistice of which they did not form a part." On the 7th of October, in a second conference between Mr. Otto and Mr. Hammond, the latter was in few words informed, "that the several important events which had recently taken place, had completely changed the basis upon which the proposed armistice was to have been established, and put an end to the negociation: that the first consul was, notwithstanding, invariably disposed to receive any overture relative to a separate negociation between England and France; and that the mode of such overture entirely depended upon the option of his majesty: that the first consul would either grant a passport to a plenipotentiary of the king of Paris, or, if his majesty preferred that the preliminary negotiations should be begun at London, special powers would be transmitted to Mr. Otto for that purpose." But on the 9th, Mr. Hammond informed this gentleman, by letter, that his majesty must steadily decline to enter into any measure tending to separate his interest from those of the powers who should continue to make common cause with him in the prosecution of the war.

The session of parliament having commenced with a speech from the throne, Nov. 11th, towards the conclusion his majesty adverted to the unsuccessful negociation recently carried on with France, the papers relative to which he had ordered to be laid before parliament: "You will see in them," said his majesty, "fresh and striking proofs of my earnest desire to contribute to the re-establishment of the general tranquillity. That desire on my part has hitherto been unhappily frustrated, by the determination of the enemy to enter only on a separate negociation, in which it was impossible for me to engage, consistently either with public faith, or with a due regard to the permanent security of Europe."

In the house of commons, Dec. the 1st, Mr. Sheridan moved an address to the throne, assuring his majesty, "that the house had taken into their most serious consideration the papers relative to the negociation for peace with France; and that the result of their reflexions on that important subject, founded as well on due examination of the documents now referred to them, as on experience of the past conduct of most of his majesty's allies, was an humble but earnest desire that his majesty would omit no proper opportunity which might arise, consistently with the good faith ever preserved on the part of his majesty, of entering into a separate negociation with the government of France for a speedy and honorable peace; and further, to implore his majesty not to sanction any new engagements which should preclude such a mode of negociation."

The object of this address, which was the only practicable mode of obtaining peace, was exclaimed against by Mr. Windham, as so extravagant, and even ridiculous, that it wholly precluded the necessity of any observation. He warned the house against listening to the counsels of those who wanted to make a peace of pure love with a jacobin republic, and to take from them the fraternal embrace; and he prayed God to avert such a peace from this country.

Mr. Grey, in a very able speech, acknowledged there were so many objections to the principle of a naval armistice, that ministers were justified in refusing to accede to it; although—admitting the principle—the terms proposed by the French did not seem unreasonable. But, though the proposition of joint negociation was involved in so many difficulties, the enemy offered us an opportunity of treating separately for peace. The precise point here was, whether, knowing as we did the disposition of our allies on former occasions, and particularly the general conduct of Austria in the present war, ministers were entitled to sacrifice the peace of the country to the prospect of any advantages to be derived from joint negociation? The interests to be attended to were so discordant; the compensations to be made were so much the subject of jealousy; and the propensity to opposition was encouraged by so many circumstances; that it was no wonder to perceive joint negociations so seldom attended with cordiality, or followed up with success. And, upon considering the present case in all its bearings and relations, he thought ministers highly culpable in refusing to treat separately for peace. Their incapacity and want of foresight being evident in the whole transaction, he would give his cordial support to a motion, the adoption of which tended to disentangle the nation from its present embarrassments."

Mr. Dundas, on the other hand, declared, "that it would have been very unwise, engaged as we were in an arduous contest with such an enemy as France, to separate ourselves from such an ally as Austria." And he reminded the house, that by an established maxim of our constitution, in all questions of peace or war, the decision belonged to the king, and that it was not the province of that house to interfere, unless on very great and important occasions; and such occasions could scarcely occur, except where the interposition of the house ought to be accompanied with an advice to his majesty to choose new counsellors. On a division, there appeared for the motion 35—against it 156 voices.

The domestic situation of Great Britain was at this period exceedingly afflictive and alarming. The harvest of the last two years had been beyond all precedent scanty and unproductive; and, although just apprehensions of a scarcity had been very generally entertained in the autumn of 1799, the ports were not opened for a free importation of corn till the ensuing spring. The additional consumption and enormous waste arising from a war of such unbounded extent and expence, greatly, though unavoidably, enhanced the evil; and the rapid and excessive rise of every article of provisions, during the summer and the autumn of the present year, menaced the kingdom with the dreadful prospect of absolute famine. England, with the riches of the world flowing into her lap, was dying of hunger, and, like Midas, starving in the midst of her gold.

It being a very prevalent and popular notion, that the present alarming scarcity was, if not primarily caused, yet at least artificially enhanced, by the evil practices of engrossers, forestallers, and regraters, the law was enforced against these different classes of delinquents with great severity. The statutes relating to offences of this equivocal nature had been indeed repealed; but offences they still remained at common law; and, in various instances, persons engaged in those branches of trade which naturally led to commercial speculations in the necessities of life, were in the highest court of criminal justice convicted and punished. A vehement clamour was raised all over the kingdom, against corn-factors and millers of the greatest respectability and eminence, as engrossers, forestallers, and regraters. In the month of August, riots in many parts of the country, Birmingham, Nottingham, Oxford, &c. became very frequent and alarming. The houses of bakers, mealmen, &c. were violently attacked; and no corn-factor could sleep in his bed with security.

In the succeeding month, these barbarous and disgraceful commotions extended to the metropolis; but the lord-mayor, Combe, a man of courage and address, immediately took the necessary precautions to secure the public peace. It was observed that the Quakers, who deal largely in this branch of commerce, were the peculiar objects of the popular rage, notwithstanding the general beneficence and attention to the poor which mark the character of that truly respectable sect. The riot becoming more serious, his lordship, accompanied by several of the aldermen, addressed the people on the folly and danger of their conduct, reminding them of the obvious truth, that unless the dealers were protected in bringing their corn to market, both rich and poor must alike perish. At length, finding his expositions of no effect, and that they were proceeding to the commission of the most violent outrages, he read the riot-act; and, with the assistance of the constables, secured several of the rioters; with great humanity forbearing to order the volunteers, who soon reached the spot, to fire upon the misguided and deluded populace—thus, by his firm and judicious conduct, acquiring high and just reputation, not only in the metropolis, but throughout the kingdom.

A royal proclamation immediately issued for the suppression of riots and tumults; and the Duke of Portland, secretary of state for the home department, on occasion of the riots in the midland counties, wrote an excellent letter to the Duke of Marlborough, lord-lieutenant of the county of Oxford, stating “the necessity there must be for the exertion of all the lord-lieutenant’s great influence and authority, to combat and counteract the prejudices which had operated, no less powerfully than unfortunately, in disposing a very large part of the community to believe the scarcity artificial, and owing to the views and speculations of certain interested and rapacious men, who took advantage of the difficulties and distresses of the times to enrich themselves at the expence of the public.” The letter then adverted to the notoriously unfavorable circumstances of the two last seasons, as fully sufficient to account for the present dearth; and the lord-lieutenant was instructed to prosecute, without distinction, all persons concerned in any acts of violence, or modes of intimidation, in the most vigorous, exemplary, and impressive manner, which the power, military as well as civil, under his command, would most speedily and effectually enable him to do.

A singular incident happened in London, on the 15th of May, threatening the life of the king, when his majesty, accompanied by the queen and princesses, went, as usual, to the theatre. On the king’s entering the box, a man near the orchestra suddenly stood up, and discharged a pistol. On the report of fire-arms, and the confusion which ensued, his majesty stopped short; but upon the immediate seizure of the assassin, came forward, and waved his hand, to show that he was not hurt. Notwithstanding this alarming interruption, the play was performed to the end, when the king and royal family withdrew, amid the loud gratulations of the audience.

The wretch who made this horrid attempt immediately underwent a close examination, in the presence of the Duke of York, who happened to be in the theatre at the time. His name was James Hadfield. He had for some years served as a dragoon in the 15th regiment, and was, during that time, distinguished for his courage and good behaviour. At Lincelles he received several sabre-wounds in the head, and had been left three hours among the slain; these wounds had ever since extremely impaired his intellect; and he appeared, at the period of this attempt on his majesty’s life, as well as on many former occasions, to be totally deranged. He had made use of a horse-pistol, loaded with a brace of slugs; and as he was known to be a dexterous marksman, it was wonderful that the king escaped unhurt. No cause appeared which should have induced him to the perpetration of this crime; but he talked, on his examination, in a mysterious way, of dreams, and of a great commission which he had received in his sleep. He underwent a second examination before the privy-council, but nothing more interesting transpired. On the 26th of June he was brought to trial before the chief justice, Lord Kenyon. The Duke of York deposed to his personal recollection of the man, as one of his orderly dragoons. His exemplary behaviour in that capacity was fully proved; and the wounds received in the king’s service being notoriously the cause of the dreadful insanity under which he laboured, the trial was stopped, and the jury were directed to bring in a verdict of NOT GUILTY. The wretched maniac was immediately, by order of the court, conveyed to the hospital appropriated to persons of that compassionate description. Upon this occasion, addresses of sincere congratulation were presented to the throne from all parts of the kingdom.

Soon after the life of Bonaparte was attempted on a similar occasion; not by one person, but by several, as it was said, which sufficiently proved that the consular government did not give general satisfaction. On the 24th of December, as the first consul was going in his carriage from the Thuilleries to the opera, he passed through the Rue Vicaise, a narrow street, in which stood a sort of car of somewhat uncommon construction, and placed so as apparently to obstruct the way. The coachman drove rapidly; but scarcely had he, with great dexterity and good fortune, passed the car a minute, when it blew up with a most dreadful explosion; greatly damaging many of the adjoining houses, and wounding several individuals very dangerously. The velocity with which the carriage moved saved the first consul, against whose life this machine, filled with combustibles, was no doubt solely designed and directed. Divers of the assassins concerned in this atrocious plot were discovered and brought to trial, and in different modes were punished. But it made a deep and lasting impression upon the mind of the first consul, whose character, from this time, acquired a strong tincture of suspicion and severity. A striking proof of this was exhibited in the subsequent promulgation of an act of government, sanctioned indeed by the senate, by virtue of which 132 persons, accused of disaffection, were sentenced to banishment without any previous trial; and special tribunals were also, by a legislative decree, erected throughout the entire extent of the republic—armed, in all cases, relative to offences against the state, with new and despotic powers, and superseding the constitutional use of juries.

Naval History.—The Vessels of France and Spain blockaded by the British.—Bombardment of Genoa by the English Fleet.—Attack on Quiberon.—Exploits by Sir John Borlase Warren, Capt. Martin, Lieutenant Burke, &c.—Remarkable Instances of individual Courage.—Capture of Goree, &c.—Failure of two Expeditions to the Coast of Spain.—Surrender of Malta and Curaçoa.—Observations.

DURING this year the naval power of Great Britain was remarkably conspicuous. The ports of Alexandria, Toulon, Cadiz, Brest, and Flushing, with the island of Malta and the fortress of Belleisle, were all blockaded nearly at the same time. The French, unable to send supplies to Egypt, notwithstanding the boasted preparations of Admiral Gantheaume, derived no benefit from their late successes. A numerous garrison, in possession of one of the strongest fortresses in the Mediterranean, was reduced to great extremities; while the combined naval force of France and Spain, confined to the harbour of Brest, and rendered totally useless, was become a burden, instead of a defence, to the respective powers to which it belonged. So decisive, indeed, had been the superiority of England on the ocean, that, since the commencement of the war, no less than 320 ships had been taken from the French, 89 from the Dutch, and 75 from the Spaniards, of which 78 were of the line; while 49 were all that were captured from England, and of these 3 only were vessels of force.

So great was the success of the British navy, that it was intended at the commencement of the campaign to make a powerful diversion in favor of the allies, by means of an irruption into the southern provinces of France; and an army, chiefly composed of Austrians and emigrants, was to have been landed there from our fleets stationed in that quarter. The sudden return, however, of Bonaparte, and, above all, the change which he effected in the French government, prevented the execution of a design, from which great things had been expected.

Other measures being adopted, Lord Keith appeared with a strong squadron off Genoa, and assisted General Melas in conducting the siege of that city, (as already mentioned in this book, Chapter V.) Some ships detached by the vice-admiral, in conjunction with others sent thither by the King of Naples, contributed greatly to the reduction of the fortress of Savona; and when the imperial commander found it necessary to convert the attack of the former place into a blockade, Captain Morris, of the Phaeton, seized twenty-one corn-vessels; and Captain Oliver, of the Mermaid, took and destroyed nine, which had been previously cut out by Lieutenant Corbett, although moored close to a fort within the small islands of Croisette. Thus the British cruisers, by intercepting all supplies, actually produced a surrender, in consequence of the famine that ensued. In addition to this, the city itself was four times bombarded; and although its capitulation cannot be ascribed to this measure, it afforded a new opportunity for the display of British valour. Captain Philip Beaver, of the Aurora, who was employed on the occasion, learning that the enemy intended to board the flotilla under his command, was resolved to anticipate the design; and notwithstanding a large galley, a cutter, three armed settees, and several gun-boats, after appearing in array off the Mole-head, had assumed a position under the batteries, he attacked, boarded, carried, and brought off their principal galley, La Prima, with 257 men on board!

About the same time, the western departments of France were frequently menaced by the appearance of hostile armaments, and kept in continual alarm by partial debarkations. Sir Edward Pellew, in the Impetueux, with a flying squadron and three troop-ships, made an attack on Quiberon, June 4. The Thames and Cynthia having cannonaded the south-west end, and silenced some batteries, Major Ramsay landed with a small body of soldiers, and destroyed them. The same commander was also successful in an attempt upon the Morbihan, having seized several sloops and gun-vessels, and burnt a national corvette of eighteen guns, by means of a detachment from the Queen's regiment, assisted by the gun-launches under Lieutenant Pinfold.

During the night of June 11, Sir John Borlase Warren succeeded in an attack on a convoy at anchor, near a fort within the Penmarks, and by means of the boats of his fleet, under the direction of Captain Martin of the Fisguard, cut out a gun-boat, two armed vessels, and six merchantmen. Nor was this all; for a small squadron was soon after chased into Quimper river, and a battery stormed and blown up. So indefatigable was this officer, that, in the course of a few days more, he sent in several boats, under the direction of Lieutenant Burke, to attack some armed vessels and a convoy, moored so as to form a strong line of defence within the sands of Bourneuf Bay. Fifteen sail of merchantmen, and four vessels intended for their protection, were all burnt upon this occasion; but in returning, some mistake having taken place relative to the passage over the sand-banks, the adventurers were consequently exposed to the fire of 400 French soldiers, and 4 officers and 88 men were made prisoners.

The commerce of the enemy was considerably annoyed by the naval exploits which actually stopped for a while the coasting trade of the French: but what was of still greater consequence, they intercepted the supplies of wine, brandy, flour, and provisions, intended for the fleet off Brest. Soon after this, July 7, Captain

Inman, of the Andromeda, with a detachment of armed vessels and fire-ships, made an attack on four frigates (one of which carried a broad pendant) anchored in Dunkirk Roads, and Captain Campbell of the Dart succeeded in boarding and carrying La Desirée, of forty guns; but the rest cut their cables and escaped, by running down the inner channel within the Braak sand.

In the course of this year, some remarkable instances of individual courage and subaltern merit occurred worthy of particular notice. Jeremiah Coghlan, accompanied by Mr. Silas Paddon and a few sailors in three boats, captured, in the month of August, a gun-brig, mounting three long twenty-four and four six-pounders, full of men, moored with springs to her cables, at the entrance of Port Louis, although within pistol-shot of three batteries, surrounded by several armed craft, and not a mile from a seventy-four gun ship and two frigates, the former carrying an admiral's flag. Le Cerbere, the prize, was given up by the squadron, as a testimony of approbation for so gallant an exploit. A few days afterwards, Lieutenant Burke boarded a privateer carrying eighteen nine-pounders and 161 men, in Vigo Bay, and towed her out from under the batteries, notwithstanding the desperate resistance of the master and crew, the former of whom was killed.

On the 4th of September, Captain Lewis and Lieutenant Schomberg of the Minotaur entered the roads of Barcelona at night with a detachment of boats, and cut out two armed vessels, under a heavy fire from the ships of war, four strong batteries, ten gun-boats, and two schooners, mounting a couple of forty-two pounders each, while the fort of Mount Joui endeavoured in vain to make them desist from their enterprize. This exploit had nearly produced a war between Spain and Denmark.

In the course of the spring of this year, April 5, the fort and island of Goree surrendered to three British men of war in a very unaccountable manner. Sir Charles Hamilton, in the Melpomene, of forty-four guns, accompanied by the Ruby and Magnanime, having learned that some French frigates were anchored in that neighbourhood, proceeded in quest of them. In the mean time, conceiving that the garrison might be intimidated by his appearance, he dispatched a lieutenant with a verbal message, demanding the governor to capitulate. That officer, "anxious," as he very kindly said, "to spare blood-shed," immediately agreed to surrender; after which, the factory of Jool was taken possession of also, and Great Britain thus acquired a settlement of some value without loss or expense.

A secret expedition having been fitted out about the middle of summer, it was generally supposed that Belleisle, a fortress at a little distance from the coast of Brittany (captured before by the English in 1761) was the chief object against which this armament was directed, more especially as it had been for some time blockaded in such a manner as to intercept all kinds of supplies. Deterred, as it is thought, by the strength of the place from attempting a landing, the squadron, commanded by Rear-admiral Sir John Borslase Warren, with a convoy of troops under Lieutenant-general Sir James Pulteney, sailed for the coast of Spain, and arrived in the bay of Piaya de Dominos on the 25th of August. The fire of three ships of war, viz. the Impetueux, Brilliant, and Cynthia, and a gun-boat, St. Vincent, having silenced a fort of eight 24-pounders, a debarkation was effected during the evening, in a small opening near Cape Prior, under the superintendence of Sir Edward Pellew, and the whole army reached the shore without the loss of a single man. At the same time were landed sixteen field-pieces, attended by seamen from the men of war to carry scaling-ladders and drag the guns up the adjoining heights. The reserve, followed by the other troops in succession as they gained the beach, immediately ascended a ridge of hills; and when they had attained the summit, the rifle corps fell in with, and drove back a party of the enemy, notwithstanding Lieutenant-colonel Stewart, the commander, was wounded.

On the 26th at day-break, a more considerable body of Spaniards was forced to retire by the Earl of Cavan's brigade, supported by some other troops, particularly the first battalion of the fifty-second; so that the English remained in complete possession of the heights of Brion and Balon, which overlook the town of Ferrol, its noble and capacious bay, and the ships of war in the harbour. In this prosperous state of affairs, and at the very moment the army expected to advance, a retreat was ordered to be effected by the general. Sir James Pulteney, in his dispatch, dated August 27, thus vindicated his conduct, remarking that he had now "an opportunity of observing minutely the situation of the place, and of forming, from the reports of prisoners, an idea of the strength of the enemy; when, comparing the difficulties which presented themselves, and the risk attendant on failure, on one hand, with the prospect of success and the advantage to be derived from it on the other, he came to the determination of re-embarking the troops in order to proceed without delay on his further destination." Accordingly, in consequence of the indefatigable exertions of the captains of the squadron, the whole of the army and artillery was again taken on board the men of war and transports before day-break.

It is to be lamented, that Sir James Pulteney, whose conduct upon this occasion has been much censured, had not been previously provided with sufficient information relative to the strength of the place, and that the inquiry, which was moved for in parliament, July 22, did not take place. Some went so far as to declare, that Ferrol was about to be delivered up, and that an officer had actually set out with the intention of surrendering the keys: but when we take into consideration the courage and talents displayed by this lieutenant-general during the campaign of the preceding year in Holland, (as mentioned in the 15th Chapter of our 3d Book, page 224,) instead of giving credit to unsupported assertions, we must conclude there were substantial reasons for declining the attack.

Soon after this failure on the coast of Galicia, another expedition was directed against the province of Andalusia, which eventually proved equally fortunate for Spain; it being manifestly the intention of both expeditions to annihilate her consequence as a maritime power.

About the close of the preceding year, (Dec. 5, 1799,) Lord Keith transmitted a declaration to the consuls of all neutral powers, stating Cadiz to be in a state of blockade; and on the 22d of July, 1800, Rear-admiral Bickerton published a similar notice. Cadiz, though at this time afflicted with an epidemical distemper, exactly similar to the plague, was also threatened with a visit from a powerful armament. This consisted of the squadron in the Mediterranean, forming 22 ships of the line and 27 frigates, with 84 transports and other vessels, making in all 143 sail, and having an army of 20,000 men on board.

This armament having come to anchor, Oct. 6, Don Thomas de Morla, the governor, immediately addressed a letter to the British admiral, in which he expressed his surprise at the arrival of a hostile squadron, during the prevalence of a disease which "carried off thousands of victims, and threatened not to suspend its ravages until it had cut off all those who had hitherto escaped."—"I have too exalted an opinion of the English people, and of you in particular," he added, "to think you would wish to render our condition more deplorable. However, if, in consequence of the orders your excellency has received, you are inclined to attract the execration of all nations, to cover yourselves with disgrace in the eyes of the whole universe, by oppressing the unfortunate, and attacking those who are supposed to be incapable of defence, I declare to you, that the garrison under my orders, accustomed to behold death with a serene countenance, and to brave dangers much greater than all the perils of war, know how to exhibit a resistance which shall not terminate but with their entire destruction. I hope that the answer of your excellency will inform me, whether I am to speak the language of consolation to the unfortunate inhabitants, or whether I am to rouse them to indignation and revenge."

To this interesting letter, a reply was returned in the names of Sir Ralph Abercromby, and Lord Keith, which, after expressing a due compassion for the deplorable state of Cadiz, stated "that a number of his Catholic majesty's vessels were armed in order to join the naval forces of the French, and to be employed in prolonging the troubles which afflict all the nations of Europe, disturb public order, and destroy the happiness of individuals. We have received orders from our sovereign," added they, "to use every effort to defeat the projects of the common enemy, by endeavouring to take and destroy the ships of war which are in the harbour and arsenal of Cadiz. The number of troops entrusted to our command, leaves but little doubt as to the success of the enterprise. We are not disposed to multiply unnecessarily the evils inseparable from war. Should your excellency consent to give up to us the vessels armed, or arming, in order to act against our king, and to prolong the misfortunes of neighbouring nations, your crews and officers shall be at liberty, and our fleet shall withdraw; otherwise we must act conformably to the orders which have been given to us, and your excellency cannot attribute to any other than yourself, the additional evils which you fear."

The Spanish governor instantly rejected a proposal, which he stiled "insulting to the person to whom it was addressed, and but little honorable to those by whom it was made." Hereupon an attack appeared inevitable, and directions for a landing were prepared on board the Foudroyant, and issued October 4. It was intended that the first division of troops was to have been embarked in 102 boats, in the following manner:

Under Captain Stevenson, 1,065 men, composed of part of the 28th, and 50th regiments, together with a detachment from the Corsican rangers;

Under Captain Morrison, 1,021 of the 50th and 28th regiments;

Under Captain Lamour, 1,050 of the 42d regiment;

Under Captain Scott, 196 guards; and Under Captain Ayscough, 900 guards.

The landing was to have been effected under the direction of Captain Cochrane; but providence defended the wretched inhabitants of Cadiz, for the weather proved so exceedingly unfavorable, that it was deemed proper to abandon the enterprise. It must be observed that this expedition was planned and fitted out before the malady there was known to exist.

We have, however, to mention two other occurrences, more fortunate in their result. Malta, so unjustly seized by Bonaparte in the course of his expedition to Egypt, and of which we have given an ample account in the fifth chapter of the preceding book, had now experienced a blockade of two years, both by sea and land; in the course of which, General Vaubois had been summoned no less than eight different times. During the whole of this period the natives had exhibited a marked and decided hatred to the French, whom they accused (and with great reason) of spoliation and injustice, and not only prevented any supplies being thrown into La Valetta, but also assisted Brigadier-general Graham in hemming in the city, and checking the excursions of the garrison. At one time of the siege, the inhabitants themselves suffered still more than the garrison, from scarcity, and the blockade on the land side would have entirely ceased, but for a supply from Sicily. A deputation having repaired there to solicit succours from the court, the lady of the English ambassador represented the distresses of the natives in such a forcible manner to the queen, that two vessels laden with corn were instantly purchased and sent off in the course of the same day. This little incident sufficiently proves how unjustly that lady was accused of the want of feeling, as alluded to in the 14th chapter of book III; and it produced such an effect on the mind of the Emperor Paul, that he immediately transmitted the cross of the order of Malta to Lady Hamilton; while by the continuance of his protection to the family of Ferdinand IV. he prevented that prince from experiencing a similar fate with the King of Sardinia.

A reinforcement of troops having arrived under Major-general Pigott, Malta was invested still more closely than before; but as it would have been impolitic to have besieged the place, its reduction was entrusted to the operation of famine alone. At length, all hopes of receiving supplies from France having vanished, an attempt was made to save two frigates in the harbour, viz. La Justice and Diane; but the latter, in consequence of the vigilance of the blockading squadron, was immediately captured by the English. A few days after this, General Vaubois assembled a council of war in the national palace: and it appearing that the magazines of provisions had been entirely exhausted for more than a month; that the liquors of all kinds were nearly expended, and that the only food remaining for the garrison, and the citizens (which was merely bread) must fail in the course of a week, it was determined that the governor should send a flag of truce to the English commander, to propose a capitulation, while Rear-admiral Villeneuve was to stipulate in favor of the seamen.

Articles were accordingly drawn up on the 5th of September, which were eighteen in number; the British fleet was to enter the port when the capitulation was signed; the national gate to be occupied by a guard of both nations. The garrison to be prisoners of war, and not serve against Britain till exchanged; every thing public to be given up; all sick to be left behind under the care of French medical officers, and when recovered to be sent to France; no persons to be censured for their conduct under the French in Malta; all who wished to go to France to be permitted to depart; six months to be allowed for the sale of property of those who did not remain. Very few of the articles were refused, and those only which regarded the shipping of the French, which were at or might come into Malta, within twenty days.

It was admitted by the French, that in blockading this island for two years and five days, the English displayed great intrepidity and perseverance. The French garrison and inhabitants suffered every privation; they subsisted a long time on asses and mules' flesh, which was 1s. 6d. a pound. Houses were searched for cats and mice, for food; a fowl cost more than 3l.; a sucking pig, 500 florins; an egg, 1s.; and every thing in proportion. Indeed, the exertions of the British employed on this service were entitled to the highest praise. Two Maltese ships, a frigate, several merchantmen, and five or six gun-boats, found in the harbour, were considered as prizes, and became the property of the victors.

About the same time, the inhabitants of Curaçoa were induced, by peculiar circumstances, to claim the protection of Great Britain. Victor Hughes, aware of the riches contained in this flourishing little colony, and under pretence of anticipating the designs of the English, fitted out an armament, and effected a landing there with 1,500 men. In this critical situation of affairs, Governor Lauffer entered into a correspondence with Captain Frederic Watkins, of the Nereide frigate; and that officer having arrived in sufficient time to prevent the enemy from storming the principal fort, a capitulation was immediately entered into, and the island surrendered to him, September 13. Notwithstanding the great trade carried on by the inhabitants, particularly with the Spanish settlements, forty-four vessels only were taken on this occasion.

The French regretted the loss of Malta, as appeared by the great pains they took to make a set-off of the treaty with America. The Moniteur was adopted as the government gazette; and when the French papers said, that the American treaty would console them for the loss of Malta, such was then the sentiment of the government of France. This convention with America was of great length, and related merely to the form to be observed by the ships of both nations with regard to their neutrality. On the whole, it was not a thing of any moment, and seems to have been done more with a view of lulling the Americans, than any other. America gained nothing, and France conceded nothing; the latter power wished to appear generous at a small expense; and both wished to serve themselves.

The American treaty was written in the French and English languages, and signed by three members of each government. Joseph Bonaparte was at the head of the French plenipotentiaries. It enumerated the articles denominated contraband, and stated that although they be found on board a vessel, they are only to be condemned, she herself remaining free. By this convention neither nation was to share in the fisheries of the other on its coast; but the whale fishery to be free in all parts of the world.

Disputes with Russia.—State of England.—Complaints and Convention with Denmark.—Declaration of Russia.—Disputes with the Northern Powers.—Treaty of Peace between Austria and France, concluded at Luneville.—Bonaparte's Address on the Occasion.—Remarks on the Same.

EVER since the reign of Peter the Great, the emperors of Russia had acted a conspicuous part on the theatre of Europe. Influenced by a similar ambition, they all successively endeavoured to complete the plan which his genius had conceived, and accordingly aimed at subverting the empire of the Turks, seizing on their European dominions, and placing a Greek emperor once more on the throne of Byzantium. Paul Petrawitz, however, (styled by some of the writers of the day, the mad emperor) instead of wishing to become the successor of Constantine, confined his views to the acquisition of the grand mastership of Malta, and the command of the knights of St. John of Jerusalem. No sooner had his imperial majesty received intimation of the surrender of that island, than he applied to the ministers of Great Britain to obtain possession of it, in conformity to a previous agreement.

Great Britain, at the beginning of the contest, had obtained either the open or secret approbation of every neighbouring court; but the scene was now changed, and that country which had commenced the war with all the states of Europe, as her allies, found at this time the majority leagued against her. They complained that their neutrality was no longer respected, that their shores and harbours were violated by the British cruisers, and that even their men of war were not permitted to afford protection to the convoys entrusted to their charge. They likewise commented on the procrastination, delays, and expences incident to the English court of Admiralty, and resolved to recur to decisive measures for obtaining redress.

Sweden deemed herself greatly injured on a variety of occasions, but more particularly by the detention and condemnation of several merchantmen bound for the Mediterranean, under the convoy of a ship of war. The judge (Sir William Scott) asserted upon this occasion, "That the right of visiting and searching merchantmen upon the high seas, whatever be the ships, cargoes, or destination, is an incontestible right of the lawfully-commissioned cruisers of a belligerent nation. That the authority of the sovereign of the neutral country being interposed in any manner of mere force, cannot legally vary the rights of a lawfully-commissioned belligerent cruiser; and that the penalty for the contravention of this right is the confiscation of the property so withheld from visitation and search." This dispute was occasioned by a fleet of Swedish merchantmen, carrying pitch, tar, hemp, deals, and iron, having been seized in the British channel by Commodore Lawford, (June 30, 1798.) It appeared by the instructions delivered to the captain of the frigate, who convoyed these vessels, that in case the ships of any nation should pretend to the rights of search, he was to discover the power to which he belonged, by hoisting his colours and firing a salute, and in the event of violence to resist force by force. He, however, only obeyed the former part of his orders, and was conducted with the ship under his protection to Margate roads, in consequence of a special order from the lords of the Admiralty.

Sweden also complained that one of her merchantmen, without a cargo, had been seized by an English squadron, and employed in an hostile enterprize against two Spanish frigates in the bay of Barcelona, by which stratagem they had both been captured.

Denmark asserted that a number of her vessels had been seized on the most frivolous pretexts, and even carried into the ports of Great Britain, although no species of contraband property whatsoever had been found on board. It was stated at the same time, that the captain of one of her frigates had been detained and treated with harshness. This alluded to the case of his Danish majesty's frigate the Haufeneu. Some English men of war having fallen in with this vessel and her convoy, (December, 1799,) the commander of one of them demanded her destination, and on learning that she was bound for Gibraltar, replied, "that if the captain was going there, he would not visit the convoy; but, in case it should not cast anchor in that port, the ceremony would assuredly take place." Captain Van Dockum, having informed the officer who came on board that he would resist a search, a signal was made to examine the fleet immediately, and a boat from the Emerald prepared to execute the order, on which some musquetry was fired from the Dane, and one of the English sailors severely wounded. A boat belonging to the Flora was at the same time seized and detained until a threat of retaliation had been held out. On their arrival in the bay of Gibraltar, Lord Keith demanded to inspect Captain Van Dockum's instructions, but the latter refused to comply: at the same time he observed, that he was commanded to prohibit the visitation of his convoy, and that he only obeyed his orders by firing on the boats of the English squadron. Having afterwards pledged his honor to this, in presence of the admiral and governor of the castle, and promised to surrender himself before a judge, he was permitted to return on board; but on entering his boat, he transmitted a letter, in which he refused compliance. Hereupon, Lord Keith stated, "that if he neglected to submit, and should thereby attempt to withdraw himself from justice, the affair would be represented to his court." Mr. Merry, the minister of Great Britain at Copenhagen, accordingly presented a note on this subject to Count Bernstorff, dated April 10, 1800, in which he insisted on the right of visiting, and examining merchant vessels on the high seas, whatever their nation might be, and whatever their cargoes or destinations." He also stated, "that his Britannic majesty had no doubt of the displeasure which his Danish majesty would feel on learning this violent and indefensible procedure of an officer in his service; and the king was persuaded of the promptitude with which his Danish majesty would make to his Britannic majesty the formal disavowal and apology which he had so just a right to expect from him in the present case, with a reparation proportioned to the nature of the offence committed." Neither apology nor reparation, however, was made; on the contrary, Count Bernstorff, in his reply, asserted, "that none of the maritime and independent powers of Europe had ever acknowledged the right of permitting neutral vessels to be searched, when escorted either by one or several ships of war." He added, "that the captain of the Danish king's frigate, by repelling a violence which he had no right to expect, had done no more than his duty; and that it was on the part of the English frigates that the violation of the rights of a neutral sovereignty, and of a power friendly to his Britannic majesty, had been committed."

An event occurred soon after, that occasioned much perplexity, and was productive of the most disagreeable consequences. Although the armed vessels of the two northern powers had protested against a search, and one of them had actually resorted to small arms, yet nothing in the shape of a regular engagement had hitherto taken place. In the course of this summer, however, the captain of the Freya having refused to permit the vessels under his protection to be examined by the English squadron at the mouth of the channel, although he freely offered to exhibit all their papers for inspection, an action immediately ensued, and after having two men killed, and five wounded, the Dane struck his colours, and was carried into the Downs.

The English ministers, apprehensive of a rupture upon this occasion, and naturally alarmed for the safety of the vessels employed in the Baltic trade, sent Lord Whitworth to Copenhagen in the character of plenipotentiary, while his mission was supported, and his arguments enforced by means of a strong squadron, consisting of nine sail of the line, four bomb-vessels, and five gun-boats, under Admiral Dickson, which entered the Sound; and, in consequence of an invitation for that purpose, anchored in Elsinour roads. After a considerable time spent in discussion, a temporary adjustment took place, in consequence of which the Danish frigate with the convoy were to be released, and the former "repaid in a port of his Britannic majesty, according to the usage followed by friendly and allied powers;" but the decision respecting the right of visiting merchantmen under convoy of a ship of war, was postponed; and, in the mean time, Denmark was to employ her armed vessels for this purpose in the Mediterranean only, a measure rendered necessary in that sea, in consequence of the depredations of the Barbary cruisers. This convention with Denmark took place August 29; but so ineffectual it proved, that the northern powers, in the course of a few months, entered into an association for their mutual protection, and actually revived the treaty of armed neutrality, which had originated towards the conclusion of the American war.

The Emperor of Russia, who had laid an embargo for a few weeks on all the ships and property of English subjects within his dominions; on the 16th of August published a declaration, in which the measures taken in 1780, "for establishing the principles of a wise and impartial neutrality," were appealed to, and he was the first to invite Sweden, Denmark, and Prussia, to adopt this plan. After lamenting that "at the epoch of the dissolution of a great power," too little care was taken to give a new sanction to these principles, on account of the intervention of novel and extraordinary events; the detention of the Danish frigate (the Freya) was mentioned, as tending to prove "how much the independence of crowned heads might be endangered, if they neglected to re-establish the principles and maxims on which the protection and safety of the neutral powers rested. As the manifest interest of his imperial majesty, both in regard to the navigation of his own subjects, and that of his ports bordering upon other nations, required that the seas which wash the coasts of the Russian empire should be sheltered from such acts of violence, he invited the powers who possess harbours in these districts, and particularly his majesty the King of Prussia, his majesty the King of Denmark, and his majesty the King of Sweden, to concert with his imperial majesty respecting measures which would be successively communicated to them, for re-establishing, in their full force, the principles of an armed neutrality, to secure the liberty of the seas."

On the 16th of December, the King of Sweden, in consequence of this invitation, entered into a treaty with the Emperor Paul, in which they laid down certain principles for the extension and security of commerce. By these new regulations, it was maintained that any ship might freely navigate on the coasts of the belligerent powers, and that every thing but what was expressly contraband, should be free. The declaration of the officers commanding ships of war convoying merchantmen, respecting their cargoes, was to be deemed sufficient; no search was to be allowed, and for protecting the trade of the two countries, the contracting parties agreed to equip and provide squadrons.

Soon after the Kings of Prussia and Denmark acceded to this confederacy, and the Emperor of Russia carried his resentment still further, by again laying an embargo on all the British ships in his ports: he likewise issued orders to burn those detained in the harbour of Narva, in consequence of the escape of two vessels in contravention of his commands, and treated the sailors with great severity and harshness. These proceedings were immediately connected with the grand-mastership of the order of St. John of Jerusalem; for his imperial majesty expressly stated, in the court gazette, that he had resorted to this measure, because possession had been taken "of Valetta, and the island of Malta, in the name of the King of Great Britain, and the English flag alone hoisted," &c. and it was asserted, that the sequestration should not be taken off "until the conditions of the convention concluded in the year 1798 were punctually fulfilled."

While Portugal, the faithful ally of Great Britain, was threatened with subjugation, it was feared that Russia was about to declare in favor of France. The first consul had done all in his power to undermine the naval power of England, endeavouring to obtain by intrigue what he could not by arms. The neutral states took up the consul's cause by the northern confederacy, and Great Britain had to contend against nations united in powerful combination. They pledged themselves to resist the searching neutral ships, when one or more ships were in company, and to convey property into France. When the consul had so far succeeded, he treated the American ministers with a dinner before they left Paris, and what was expected of them was hinted in a toast given by the consul, Le Brun; "To the union of America with the powers of the north, that respect may be procured for the liberty of the seas."

Soon after the armistice of Steyer, as narrated in Chap. VII. a new engagement was entered into at Treviso, January 7-6, 1801, between the Generals Brune and Bellegarde, and a cessation of hostilities was obtained in Italy, by the surrender of Peschiera, Sermione, Verona, Legnano, Ferrara, and Ancona. These armistices led to a final pacification, and articles of peace, after many delays, were concluded at Luneville, between the Emperor of Austria and the first consul of the French republic, including all the principal conditions of the treaty of Campo Formio. The plenipotentiaries named, were the Count Cobenzel and Joseph Bonaparte.

By this famous treaty, containing nineteen articles, it was agreed that there was to be a permanent peace between the French republic and the emperor; the utmost harmony to be observed, and no assistance to be given to those who could disturb it. The Belgic provinces were to be given up to the French, Falkenstein and its dependencies, the Frickthal, and all that belonged to the house of Austria on the left bank of the Rhine, between Zurzach and Basle. The emperor was to possess Istria, Dalmatia, and the Venetian Isles dependent on those countries; the Bocca de Cattaro, the city of Venice, the Adriatic Sea, and the Adige, from its leaving the Tyrole to the mouth of the said sea, the towing-path of the Adige being the line of limitation. Drawbridges to be established in the middle of the cities of Verona and Porto Legnano, to mark the separation of this line. The Brisgau to be given to the Duke of Modena. Tuscany and the Island of Elba to be possessed by the infant Duke of Parma. The grand duke to obtain a full indemnity in Germany for his Italian states. The French to possess all on the left bank of the Rhine; the towing-path of the Rhine to be the limit between the French republic and the Germanic empire, from where the Rhine leaves Switzerland till it enters the Batavian territory. The French republic to renounce all possession on the right bank of the Rhine, and restore Dusseldorf, Ehrenbreitstein, Philipsburgh, the fort of Cassel, the fort of Kehl, and Old Brisach; these places to remain in the same state they were at the time of their evacuation. The emperor to give indemnity to the hereditary princes dispossessed on the left bank of the Rhine, which should be taken from all the empire, according to arrangements to be determined on when the ratification should be exchanged. Sequestration of property to be taken off on both sides. This treaty to be common to the Batavian, Helvetic, Cisalpine, and Ligurian republics. The said republics to be guaranteed by both parties. The emperor to renounce all rights which he might have on the countries he possessed before the war, forming part of the Cisalpine republic. The navigation of the Adige and the rivers of the Cisalpine republic to be free, and no toll on any ship of war kept there. All prisoners to be restored within forty days. The other articles were of no great consequence. The Duchy of Tuscany, which was bestowed upon Louis I., the hereditary Prince of Parma, was now converted into a kingdom under the appellation of Etruria.

The ending of a war carried on for near ten years, proved a subject of great exultation to the French nation. The first consul immediately stated the joyful news to the legislative body, the tribunate, and the conservative senate. His address abounded with a flowing description of facts; and he held out, that England alone disturbed the tranquillity of mankind.

"The continental peace," he exclaimed, "has been signed at Luneville. It is such as the French people desired. Their first wish was the boundary of the Rhine. Reverses never shook their resolution: victory never added to their pretensions."

"After having re-established the antient limits of Gaul, they had to give freedom to the people who were united to them by one common origin, as well as by a community of interests and of manners."

"The liberty of the Cisalpines and of Liguria is secured."

"After this duty, there was another which justice and generosity imposed."

"The King of Spain had been faithful to our cause, and suffered for it. Neither our reverses, nor the perfidious insinuations of our enemies, could detach him from our interests: he will have a just recompence; a prince of this blood is to sit on the throne of Tuscany. He will remember what he owes to the fidelity of Spain, and to the friendship of France: his roadsteads and his ports will be shut against our enemies, and will become the asylum of our commerce and our ships."

"Austria, and it is this which is the pledge of peace, Austria, henceforth separated from the BOOK IV. republic by vast regions, will no longer feel that rivalry, those heart-burnings, which, for many ages, have occasioned the torment of these two powers and the calamities of Europe.

CHAP. X.

"By this treaty, every thing is settled with respect to France; it will no longer have to struggle against the forms and the intrigues of a congress.

"The government owes the expression of its satisfaction to the minister plenipotentiary who has conducted the negotiation to this happy termination. There remain neither interpretations to be feared, nor explanations to be demanded, nor those equivocal arrangements in which the diplomatic art deposits the seeds of a new war.

"Wherefore was not this treaty the treaty of a general peace? This was the wish of France! This was the constant object of the efforts of the government!

"But its efforts are in vain. All Europe knows that the British minister has endeavoured to frustrate the negotiations at Luneville.

"In vain did an agent, authorised by the government, declare to him, on the 9th of October, 1800, that France was ready to enter into a separate negotiation. This declaration only produced a refusal, under the pretext that England could not abandon her ally. Since then, when this ally consents to treat without England, that government seeks other means to delay a peace so necessary to the world.

"It violates conventions which humanity had consecrated, and declares war against miserable fishermen.

"It raises pretensions contrary to the dignity and the rights of all nations. The whole commerce of Asia, and of immense colonies, does not satisfy its ambition. All the seas must submit to the exclusive sovereignty of England. It arms against Russia, Denmark, and Sweden; because Russia, Denmark, and Sweden have secured, by treaties of guarantee, the sovereignty and the independence of their flags.

"The powers of the North, unjustly attacked, have a right to reckon upon France. The French government will avenge with them a common injury to all nations, without ever losing sight, however, that it ought only to fight for peace and for the good of the world."

Such was the style in which Bonaparte addressed his senate; he by no means concealed his antipathy to England, as the natural enemy of France, and with the happy mode of magnifying trifles into weighty and serious objects, he wished to fix that country with the stigma of making war upon miserable fishermen; a phrase which requires an explanation.

A long correspondence had arisen between M. Otto and the transport board, about taking some fishermen on the coast of France. It had been given up for a long time by the English, and the prisoners were released on condition they should not serve against this country; but it was soon evident that the perfidy of France could not be trusted to; those very men, with their boats, were employed in fitting and equipping the enemy's fleet in Brest, and were, therefore, considered as subject to the chances of war. The transport office demanded of M. Otto the return of all the fishermen released on parole; and that those who did not return should be treated with every rigor of the law, if they were again made prisoners. M. Otto, in reply said, he had sent their letter to his government, and added some remarks on this measure, not without reason. A letter arrived from M. Talleyrand, ordering M. Otto to leave England, and ending with a flourish too affected to deserve any comments. He said, in the name of the first consul, that the French government wished to contribute to a general pacification, and to soften the evils of war; that it could not think of making poor fishermen victims; it would keep from all such reprisals, and had ordered all French ships to leave their occupation uninterrupted. This was to shew the greatness of the French and the cruelty of the English; but it was soon ascertained, that these men were employed hostilely against this country, and were in consequence objects of our resentment.

CHAPTER I.

Important Events.—State of the belligerent Powers.—First Session of the Imperial Parliament.—Interesting Debates relative to the War.—An Embargo on all Russian, Danish, and Swedish Vessels.—Sudden Change of Ministers.—State of Parties.—Indisposition of the King.—The old Ministry remain in Office for some Time.

THE history of the year 1801 is peculiarly interesting, being fraught with a great number of important events. From the Molucca Islands to the North Sea and the Atlantic Ocean, there was no country or coast that was not a scene of either military preparation or action, or political negotiation. Across the Atlantic the agitations in St. Domingo and Guadaloupe perplexed France and alarmed Britain.

This year was also famous for the first meeting of the imperial parliament—the war in the Baltic with a kindred and hitherto a friendly nation—mutual preparations, for invasion and defence, on the coasts of France and England, and particularly for the various treaties of peace that ensued; which, with the new forms of government imposed on states, were no less remarkable than the actions at sea and land that preceded them.

The situation of Great Britain was, at this time, critical. Misery and discontent seized the less opulent classes of the community, in consequence of the scarcity mentioned in the eighth chapter of the last book. The pressure of the taxes began to be felt by all, and some were considered peculiarly oppressive. In addition to these misfortunes, the battle of Maringo, by intimidating Austria, as well as the courts attached to her interests, had left England without a single ally, that could be serviceable to her; and she was now reduced to the necessity of counteracting those convulsive and concentrated efforts which had formerly proved less terrible by division.

France, on the other hand, never appeared so formidable as at this time: the treaty of Luneville had disarmed the resentment of the only state capable of coping with her in a land war; while the northern confederacy seemed particularly destructive to the commerce of England: for, being unable to contend with that power on the ocean, four allied monarchs had resolved to shut up all the ports of the continent, and hoped, by thus cutting off her trade, to annihilate her energy.

From this moment the consular government was chiefly occupied in fomenting the differences that had taken place in consequence of the revival of the armed neutrality, in exacting advantageous terms from such of the neighbouring powers as had not yet made their peace with the republic, and in vain attempts to succour the army of the east, at once menaced by the troops and fleets of a powerful and enterprising rival. Great Britain, hitherto acting, for the chief part, in the capacity of an ally, being at length obliged to contend as a principal, now occupied all the attention and resentment of France.

The parliament of the united kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, now called the imperial parliament, assembled for the first time, Jan. 22, being opened by commission, when the lord chancellor acquainted the House of Commons, that it was his majesty's pleasure that they should immediately proceed to elect a speaker. The commons then withdrew and elected their late speaker, Mr. Addington. This election was confirmed the next day by the royal approbation. The king, however, did not meet the parliament till the 2d of February. In his speech from the throne, his majesty declared the great satisfaction he felt, in being enabled, for the first time, to avail himself, at a crisis so important to the interests of the people, of the advice and assistance of the parliament of his united kingdom. He expressed his confident hope that this memorable era, distinguished by the accomplishment of a measure calculated to augment and consolidate the strength and resources of the empire, and to cement more closely the interests and affections of his subjects, would be equally marked by that vigour, energy, and firmness which the present circumstances peculiarly required. His majesty mentioned, that the "unfortunate course of events on the continent, and the consequences which must be expected to result from it, could not fail to be matter of anxiety and concern to all who had a just feeling for the security and independence of Europe.

"Your astonishment, as well as your regret, must be excited by the conduct of those powers, whose attention at such a period appears to be more engaged in endeavouring to weaken the naval force of the British empire, which has hitherto opposed so powerful an obstacle to the inordinate ambition of France, than in concerting the means of mutual defence against their common and increasing danger. The representations which I directed to be made to the court of Petersburg, in consequence of the outrages committed against the ships, property, and persons of my subjects, have been treated with the utmost disrespect; and the proceedings of which I complained, have been aggravated by subsequent acts of injustice and violence. Under these circumstances, a convention has been concluded by that court, with those of Copenhagen and Stockholm, the object of which, as avowed by one of the contracting parties, is to renew their former engagements for establishing, by force, a new code of maritime law, inconsistent with the rights, and hostile to the interests of this country.

"In this situation, I could not hesitate as to the conduct which it became me to pursue. I have taken the earliest measures to repel the aggressions of this hostile confederacy, and to support those principles which are essential to the maintenance of our naval strength, and which are grounded on the system of public law so long established and recognised in Europe. You may rely on my availing myself of the earliest opportunity which shall afford a prospect of terminating the present contest, on grounds consistent with our security and honor, and with the maintenance of those essential rights on which our naval strength must always depend."

The debates on this occasion took a desultory but interesting turn. The address in the house of peers was moved by the Duke of Montrose, and opposed by Lord Fitzwilliam. This nobleman lamented that the course of events had made so momentous a change in the aspect of Europe, and the affairs of this kingdom. He had deeply felt the consequences of the spirit that had broken out in France, and the destruction to which it led. The people of France had been called on to rally round the standard of order, and to reinstate the ancient order of their kings. The nations of Europe had felt it to be their just and wise policy to join this cause. No man would go further than himself, even yet, in combating for the cause; but he must own the thing was hopeless. His hopes had been disappointed. The anarchy, however, to a great degree, was gone. France was now, in fact, established into a monarchy, under republican forms, and under a new ruler. It did not depend on the opinion of an individual, and, he feared, it no longer depended on the power and energies of the nation to withstand the organization of the new order of things in France. The die was cast: he must submit. But, he could not think it possible for that house, consistently with their duty, to omit an inquiry into the causes of the failure of our efforts, when such large and almost unbounded powers had been entrusted to ministers, and when they had all Europe in friendship with them in the common cause; and why, instead of succeeding in this great object, they had all at once plunged us into a contest with our new allies. As to the union, he lamented that he could not this day rise to join in an unanimous vote of thanks to his majesty for his most gracious speech from the throne, on the occasion of that event, on which his ideas were sufficiently known. As the event was now past, he would exert himself to suppress all the emotions which he felt, and sincerely wished that the very sanguine expectations of the noble duke might be fulfilled. He could not, however, withhold his astonishment, that, at a crisis so awful, when we were about to be plunged into a new war, his majesty's ministers, instead of giving information to the house, had called on them for new confidence and new support. The war, into which we were now to be plunged, was a war of our own seeking, as far as Sweden and Denmark were concerned. We had it in our power to suspend the discussion of the question disposed of in the neutral code; for it was suspended, without any evil consequences, in 1780, when, surely, this country was not in the very difficult situation in which she stood at present. In conclusion, Lord Fitzwilliam, declaring that he could not give his support to men who had proved themselves so unfit for the situations they filled, moved, as an amendment to the address, the following addition: "And that this house will proceed with all possible dispatch to make such inquiries into the general state of the nation, but more especially into the conduct of the war, and into our relations with foreign powers, as shall enable us to offer to his majesty such advice as we may think most conducive to the honor of his crown, and the general interests of his people; and, further, to assure his majesty, that if, owing to any unjust and unreasonable pretensions on the part of the enemy, peace cannot be obtained on such terms as are consistent with security; if the representations which his majesty had directed to be made to the court of Petersburg, in consequence of the outrages committed against the ships, property, and persons of his subjects, have not received that reparation which the nature of the case requires; and, if the differences which appear unhappily to have arisen between his majesty and the other northern powers, are of a nature which presses for immediate decision; and the impossibility of any equitable adjustment renders new and more extended wars inevitable, we will give his majesty every support which the means of the country can afford, in the just hope and confidence, that his majesty's paternal care for the welfare of his people will induce him to take such measures as shall prevent, henceforward, a calamitous waste of their remaining strength and resources, either by improvident and ineffectual projects, or by general negligence and profusion; and shall ensure a wise and vigorous administration of their affairs, under the unexampled difficulties under which they are now involved." The motion for this amendment was seconded by the Earl of Suffolk, and supported by Lord Darnley, the Earl of Moira, and Lord Holland.

The amendment was opposed, and the original motion for the address supported by the Duke of Athol, Lord Romney, the Earl Spencer, Lord Grenville, the Earl of Mulgrave, and Lord Eldon. There were two lords, who, without supporting the amendment, or positively opposing the original motion for an address, embraced the present opportunity of declaring their sentiments on the present critical state of affairs. These were the Earl of Caernarvon and the Earl of Fife. When Lord Caernarvon considered that we were become the objects of resentment, not indeed justly so, of many nations, he thought himself justified in calling for an inquiry; not with a view to impede the exertions of ministers, but because he saw no reason for plunging into war without inquiry. He understood that, on former occasions, we had surrendered some of those rights for which we were now contending. He did not pretend to be versed on the subject: but if we had done so, it was clear, that what we had said to one favored nation, was to be considered as having been said to every nation; because it shewed that such rights were not necessary to our safety. He concluded, by giving it as his opinion, that it would be more reasonable in the house to negative the address, and to confine itself to expressions of its loyalty, and of its determination to support his majesty in the exercise of his rights. To the observation modestly introduced by the Earl of Caernarvon, on rights renounced by special convention not being necessary to our safety, and therefore not such as to be asserted by war, Lord Grenville replied, that he was astonished at hearing noble lords speaking in opposition to great legal authority, after avowing their ignorance on the subject. It was the first time he ever heard it mentioned, that a special agreement with one power was a renunciation of a right as to other powers. Those who supposed this to be the case, might satisfy themselves by a reference to the instructions given by the American government to their ministers in France.

The Earl of Fife was rather inclined to wish that a motion for inquiry should not now be made; but, if it should be brought forward, he must declare his opinion in its favor.

"I have no desire," said this nobleman, "to give offence to his majesty's ministers, nor to pay court to those who oppose them; nothing could be more improper at present than to debate whether the war was just or unjust, necessary or not necessary; but I can most positively declare, that no war was ever worse conducted. My lords, I have read all the history of this country; I have seen and been intimate with all the different parties, from the death of Mr. Pelham to the present hour. In this horrid war our blood and treasure have been spent in the extravagant folly of secret expeditions; grievous and heavy taxes have been laid on the people, and wasted in expensive embassies, and subsidizing proud, treacherous, and useless foreign princes, who would have acted much better for themselves had you saved your money, and taken no concern with them. I do not condole with you on your present unfortunate situation in having no such friends; I only wish you had been in that situation in the beginning of this war. The noble lord who presides at the admiralty, in his speech, has with ability done justice to the navy: I sincerely wish our ill-spent money had been laid out on our fleets.

"All those, my lords, that ever heard me speak, or ever read a letter from me on the subject, will do me the justice to say, that my sentiments have all along been the same, and that this has hung upon my mind from the day the first battalion of the guards first marched from the parade for Holland. I lament the present scarcity; but, great as our demerits are, it comes not from the Almighty, but from the effects of this ill-conducted war, which I am ready to prove whenever this question is brought forward. What have we gained by our boasted conquests? If a proper regulation for commerce was made, I wish they were all sold, and the money arising laid out to pay the national debt, and to relieve the nation of those oppressive taxes which bear hard on the rich and poor, on their income, their industry, and, what is worse, their liberty; and till some of those are repealed, this nation cannot be called free."

On a division of the house, the amendment was rejected: seventeen against seventy-three. The address was then carried without a division.

The address was moved in the House of Commons, on the same day, by Sir William Watkins

Wynne, which was seconded and ably supported by Lord Cornwallis. Mr. Grey moved an amendment, similar to the Earl of Fitzwilliam's motion in the house of peers. The amendment was seconded by Mr. Whitbread, and supported by Dr. Lawrence, who said that the present question was not so much whether the practice of the belligerent powers to search neutral bottoms for enemy's property was founded in right, as whether it was consistent with sound policy in the British government, circumstanced as England was, to insist on the right at this period. He professed himself decidedly against the rashness of ministers on the present occasion. Certainly, if the affairs of the nation could be improved, or the dangers which surrounded it be removed by a splendid speech, Mr. Pitt was completely competent to it. In this instance, however, either he should satisfy the house as to the necessity of increasing their dangers, or the house should refuse to sanction his proceedings. It was the policy of the military despot, who now wielded the power of France, to conciliate the northern powers. Should this confederation be driven to unite with him, how dangerous would the state of this country become! "Let us forbear for the present. In other times, less critical, forbearance has been the policy. It was the policy of the magnanimous Queen Elizabeth, who claimed and exercised the right of searching neutral vessels, of Charles II. and of the administration of 1780. The northern powers deny that there is any thing in the convention, recently signed at Petersburg, contrary to existing treaties with England. What was the nature of the convention? It embraced three points: 1st. Free bottoms making free goods: 2d. The permission to search and detain contraband goods: 3d. The nature of blockade. On the two first points various decisions had been pronounced, highly calculated to provoke and irritate the northern powers, particularly some within the last three years, in the West Indies, which could not be vindicated. It was a little too much, on the mere signature of a convention for common protection, at once to commence hostilities against nations much injured by this country. Let us look to ourselves for that conduct which we demand from others. We complained of the violent arrest of our vessels by Russia, and committed an act as violent and unjustifiable towards Sweden and Denmark. Russia, at the commencement of the war, resisted any commerce whatever with France, by any neutral state. We interfered, and moderated her pretensions. Let the same spirit of moderation restrain the rashness of ministers now."

Mr. Tierney followed on the same ground, and in conclusion of an animated speech, remarked that the country looked up to his majesty's ministers for inquiry; but they were obstinately unwilling to satisfy its inquiries, and utterly incapable of procuring an honorable peace. He asked the house to name the part in Europe that respected them, or the enemy that feared them? The only rational motive for carrying on the war longer was to procure a peace. Was it then to be accounted strange that he should ask, that the millions raised to defray its expenses should be put in the hands of a person who knew how to expend them to advantage?

Mr. Sheridan, in allusion to the tranquillity and apparent satisfaction of the people noticed by the mover and seconder of the address, said, "Sir, I am more alarmed at this unnatural quiet, than I should be, if I heard complaints accompanied with even some tendency to disorder. You have gagged the people, and bound them hand and foot, and then you say, look how quiet they are. Is there any place but this, where a man may speak his sentiments freely? But, the question is put, is there any man capable of the meanness of making submissions to France? Yes, sir, his majesty's ministers, for they have done it. We have heard it asked, whether we could make peace with regicides, and whether a man could be found that would be the bearer of such a proposal? Sir, ministers have done it: they have done it three times, after as lofty boasts as any that have been made for them this day."

The amendment was opposed, and the original motion for an address ably supported by Mr. Pitt, the solicitor-general, and Mr. Dundas. The chancellor of the exchequer, after repelling a variety of objections, maintained, that "our very existence as a nation depended on our possessing and exercising the right of searching neutral vessels;" and he lamented that any member of that house "should only have begun to doubt, when the enemy was ready to begin to combat." He maintained, that our claims on the present occasion arose not only out of positive treaties, but out of the law of nations, and having thus discussed the question of right, he recurred to that of expediency, and asked, "if we were to permit the navy of the enemy to be supplied and recruited—to suffer blockaded ports to be furnished with stores and provisions, and allow neutral nations, by hoisting a flag on a sloop or a fishing-boat, to convey the treasures of South America, Spain, or the naval stores of the Baltic, to Brest or Toulon?" On a division of the house, the amendment was rejected by 245 against 63, and the original motion was carried without a division.

On the 28th of January, an embargo had been laid on all Russian, Danish, and Swedish vessels in the ports of Great Britain; but the courts of Berlin, although a party to the league, was treated upon this, and every other occasion, with peculiar deference and respect. Preparations were also made to send a fleet into the Sound, and to hazard all the evils likely to result from a war which threatened to exclude the British flag from the navigation of the Baltic, the Elbe, the Ems, the Vistula, and the Weser; to prohibit all intercourse with Hamburgh, Dantzic, Altona, St. Petersburg, Stockholm, and Copenhagen; in short, to interdict the commerce of England from that extensive line of coast, reaching from the borders of the hyperborean regions to the confines of the pillars of Hercules.

Nor were the northern powers inattentive to their own immediate safety; for the most active preparations had for some time past taken place in all the ports of Russia, Sweden, and Denmark. Their combined navy, if fitted out by a simultaneous movement, would have amounted to near eighty sail of the line; and these, together with the numerous gun-boats and floating batteries, which they either possessed already or could have easily constructed, might have rendered their narrow seas and difficult coasts impervious to the vengeance of an enemy.

A difference of opinion upon certain essential points, between the king and his ministers, had occasioned a variety of murmurs for many days, but the cause of these dissensions was at length ascertained. In order to facilitate the accomplishment of his favorite object, the Union of Great Britain and Ireland, Mr. Pitt had promised complete emancipation to the Catholics, without once consulting his majesty on a subject of such magnitude. Of course, when it became a topic of conversation in the cabinet council, the king was astonished and alarmed at the nature and extent of the claim, and would not agree that ministers should bring it forward in parliament: his majesty recollected the coronation oath, by which he had bound himself to "maintain the protestant religion established by law." By this oath, the first king of Hanover came to the throne, and under the same obligation, the present sovereign possesses it. Some, indeed, insist the form of the oath cannot restrain his majesty, in a legal sense, from concurring with both houses of parliament in any legislative act. His majesty's feelings, however, did not accord with those of his minister. Firm in what he held to be his duty, and faithful to what he understood to be the spirit of his oath, he planted himself before the barrier of the constitution, and having conscientiously taken his post, determined to maintain it. And, it must be admitted, that the interpretation of him that takes an oath, not the reasonings of those who talk about it, must and ought to govern the conscience of the taker.

Mr. Pitt, in consequence, determined to resign his offices of first lord of the treasury and chancellor of the exchequer, and his majesty accepted his resignation. The grand difficulty was now to establish a new administration, which should have sufficient influence to support the old system. After much consultation, Mr. Addington was appointed first lord of the treasury and chancellor of the exchequer; and his place, as speaker of the House of Commons, was conferred the next day, Feb. 11, on Sir John Milford. Lord Hawkesbury was made secretary for foreign affairs; Earl St. Vincent, first lord of the admiralty; Lord Eldon (formerly Sir John Scott) succeeded Lord Loughborough in the court of chancery; the Lords Hobart and Pelham were nominated secretaries of state, in the room of Mr. Dundas and the Duke of Portland; Mr. Yorke, secretary at war; his brother, the Earl of Hardwicke, obtained the government of Ireland; and Lord Auckland, the lucrative sinecure of post-master. The Duke of Portland still retained his station as president of the council, and Lord Westmoreland as lord privy seal.

By this unexpected change of ministry, the houses of parliament, and indeed the nation at large, were divided chiefly into three parties.

The first was a very considerable party, though not so great as it had been, who had always set their face against the war, and who were more afraid of the growing influence of the crown than of French fraternization and insurrections among the people. At the head of this party was Mr. Fox.

Secondly, the authors and abettors of the war, who, after all that the nation had suffered, were in reality less desirous of peace than fearful lest an intercourse should be re-established between this country and France, which might favor the introduction of democratical principles. But such an intercourse, it was generally suspected, was not the only evil of which they were apprehensive. In the continuance of the war, the honor, as well as interest, of numbers was involved. Even perpetual war was less dreaded than the humiliation of making peace. It is needless to say, that at the head of this was Mr. Pitt.

The third party consisted of men who wished to put an end to the war on any reasonable terms, who could endure to see France employed in retrieving her commerce and manufactures, and becoming once again a great commercial rival to Great Britain, rather than that she should be compelled, by the necessity of continued military exertion, to maintain and still extend her power and influence farther and farther all around her; and who were of opinion, that sincerity of intention and sound judgment, without any wonderful powers of eloquence, would suffice for all the purpose of negotiation, or any measure of a wise and virtuous government. Of this party there was no head. It was composed chiefly of recruits from both the other parties. The centre of their union, or rallying point, was probably that party who considered public credit as the great bond of national intercourse, as well as the grand cement and support of individual nations. This they regarded as a vast organization, which one country could not violate without violating the whole system. They expressed their wishes that the world, for the good of the whole, should not, for the sake of any temporary advantage of one nation over another, relapse into barbarism, but advance in general and simultaneous civilization. They professed a disposition to maintain, not only good faith to neighbouring nations, but sincere good-will; and to maintain and act upon all those liberal ideas, which gave so much plausibility and popularity in the world to the first and purest declarations of the constituent assembly of France, before the revolution was contaminated by the imprisonment of the king, and all the concomitant and subsequent horrors. These sentiments were diffused by the press throughout France and other parts of Europe, and as it was well enough known that they proceeded from some individuals belonging to the small band above-mentioned, must have produced, in some degree, similar sentiments of peace and harmony. These then were the three leading parties to whose principles and conduct, in the present conjecture, every eye was turned, and who shared, in different portions, the favor and confidence of the nation.

His majesty's severe indisposition, at this critical juncture, rendered it impossible for the retiring ministers to return, into the hands of their sovereign, the badges of their office. The old ministry consequently remained in office, notwithstanding the appointment of the new, till the 17th of March, when, on the recovery of his majesty, the appointments of the new ministers were announced in regular form.

Correspondence between the British and Prussian Ambassadors.—The Danes enter Hamburgh, and seize on Hanover.—The British Fleet pass the Sound.—Sanguinary Battle of Copenhagen.—An Armistice.—Death of Paul I.—Anecdotes of the Emperor.—Succeeded by his Son Alexander.—The Disputes with the Northern Powers amicably settled.—Convention with Russia.

DREADING the power of Prussia, to which the electoral dominions of the King of England might become a prey, and hoping to detach that kingdom from the northern confederacy, the English ambassador at Berlin, Lord Carysfort, was directed by the British government to address a note to that court, Jan. 27, containing grievous complaints of the recent renewal of the convention of 1780, and announcing the measure of the embargo "as a pledge against the hostile attacks which were meditated against the rights of his Britannic majesty." His lordship expressed "the conviction of his sovereign, that he might implicitly rely on the friendship of his Prussian majesty;" and he disclaimed the supposition, that "his Prussian majesty had entered, or could enter, into the confederacy, to support by force, principles, in common with other powers, whose hostile views against his Britannic majesty had been openly proved."

In a second note, or memorial, presented Feb. 1, the ambassador informed the court of Berlin, "that the connection between the extraordinary violence committed upon the person and property of his majesty's subjects, and the conclusion of a hostile confederacy, which the Emperor of Russia had formed for the express and avowed purpose of introducing those innovations into the maritime code, which his Britannic majesty has ever opposed, had at length produced a state of open war between Great Britain and Russia."

Lord Carysfort received in answer, from the Prussian minister, Count Haugwitz, a note, dated February 12. It stated, among other particulars, "that his Prussian majesty could not see, without the utmost grief and concern, the violent and hasty measures to which the court of London had proceeded against the northern naval powers; the negotiation that had been lately carried on among whom was founded on justice and moderation; as the communication of a copy of the convention to such of the belligerent powers, as had the justice and patience to wait for it, would fully prove. The British government had in the present, more than in any former wars, usurped the sovereignty of the seas; and, by arbitrarily framing a naval code, which it would be difficult to unite with the true principles of the law of nations, it exercised over the other friendly and neutral powers an usurped jurisdiction, the legality of which it maintained, and which it considered as an imprescriptible right, sanctioned by all the other trimunals of Europe. The sovereigns had never conceded to England the privilege of calling their subjects before its tribunals, and of subjecting them to its laws. In cases where the abuse of power had got the better of equity, and which were but too frequent, the neutral powers had always had the precaution of addressing to it the most energetic proclamations and protests; but experience had ever proved their reclamations fruitless. And it was not surprising that, after so many repeated acts of oppression, they had resolved to find a remedy against it, and for that purpose to establish a well-arranged convention, which fixed their rights, and placed them on a proper level, even with the powers at war. The naval alliance, in the manner in which it had just been consolidated, was intended to lead to that salutary end; and the king hesitated not to declare to his Britannic majesty, that he had again found in it his own principles; that he was fully convinced of its necessity and utility; and that he had formally acceded to the convention, which had been concluded on the 16th of December, 1800, between the courts of Russia, Denmark, and Sweden. His majesty was, therefore, among the number of the contracting parties, and had bound himself, in that quality, not only to take a direct share in all the events which interested the cause of the neutral powers, but also, in virtue of his engagements, to maintain that connection by such powerful measures as the impulse of circumstances might require. Unpleasant as the extremes might be to which England had proceeded, yet his majesty doubted not the possibility of a speedy return to conciliating and peaceable dispositions, and he relied on the sentiments of equity which, on former occasions, he had had the advantage of meeting with in his Britannic majesty. It was only by revoking, and entirely taking off, the embargo, that affairs could be brought to their former situation. While those measures existed, which had been resorted to from a common principle, and against an alliance which could no longer be shaken, the hostile resolution which would be the consequence, would be the necessary result of the treaty; and the Prussian minister was authorized to declare to the minister of his Britannic majesty, "that the king, while he expressed his concern at events of which he had not been the cause, would sacredly fulfil the engagements which had been prescribed to him by treaties."

From this note it was evident, that Great Britain had nothing to expect from the neutrality of Prussia. Among the measures, which the impulse of circumstances required, were the two which the British government had greatly apprehended: the exclusion of the English commerce from the great rivers of Prussia, and the invasion of Hanover.

A declaration was issued, on the 30th of March by the King of Prussia, to the royal and electoral college of Hanover, in which, after an enumeration of events which he alleged sufficiently proved that the court of London had no inclination to desist from her inadmissible demands, and accept the proposed means of amicable conciliation, he said, that he was "compelled, in conformity to the obligations he had contracted, to take the most efficacious measures in support of the convention, attacked, and to retaliate for the hostile proceedings against it. For this purpose, he would not only shut the mouths of the Elbe, the Weser, and the Ems, but likewise take possession of the states belonging to his majesty the King of England, as Elector of Brunswick Lunenburgh, situated in Germany. The King of Prussia accordingly demanded, and expected from the electoral college of privy-counsellors at Hanover, that they would submit to this disposition without delay or reply; and that they would voluntarily obey the orders which should be given, relative to the occupation of the electorate by the Prussian troops, and likewise relative to the electoral countries. What his Prussian majesty principally demanded, was, that the Hanoverian corps, which had hitherto occupied part of the northern line of demarkation, should be disarmed and disbanded, with a proportional part of the other troops. He also required, that the generals and other officers should engage, in writing, not to serve against his majesty the King of Prussia; but, on the contrary, to follow strictly his orders, until the present affair should be brought to a conclusion. For the troops that should continue to be embodied, he appointed particular stations. All the other places were to be delivered up to the Prussian troops. The Prussian troops to be subsisted at the expence of the electoral territory, commencing from the end of the month of April. In case of a voluntary submission, his majesty was disposed, and ready to promise solemnly, not only to the nobility, but to the burghesses and all the inhabitants of the electorate, the complete enjoyment of tranquillity, and the security of their property; but, on the contrary, should the government and the general officers attempt to impede the execution of the measures taken, and oppose the entrance of the Prussian troops, his majesty would be obliged, though against his inclination, to revoke his promises, and to treat the electoral states in a hostile manner."

To these conditions, by a convention, concluded on the 3d of April, 1801, the regency of Hanover consented, only expressing their hopes that the number of Prussian troops would be diminished, as much as possible, to ease the country and the inhabitants. The Prussian troops entered the territory of Hanover, and were posted chiefly on the banks of the Elbe and the Weser. An em-embargo was laid on the British shipping; but a number of vessels that had taken on board their cargoes of grain were suffered to depart, and sail for England. The firmness and moderation of the Prussian king formed a striking contrast with the capricious rage of his ally the Emperor of Russia. Never was war carried on, by any power, with greater dignity and decorum.

About the same time, a body of Danish troops, to the number of 15,000, under the command of Prince Charles, Landgrave of Hesse, a field-marshal in the Danish service, and father-in-law to the Prince-royal of Denmark, there called the Crown Prince, took possession of Hamburgh, in order, as was declared, by a notification published at the exchange of Hamburgh, April 3, to stop the British navigation and trade on the Elbe. An embargo had already, on the 29th of March, been laid on the British ships at Copenhagen, and the other ports of Denmark.

When the intentions of Prince Charles of Hesse were announced to the senate of Hamburgh, March 28, it sent deputies, on the 29th, to his highness, at Penneburg, a town of Holstein, about fifteen English miles from Hamburgh, to make the strongest representations against a measure so violent and unexpected. The prince, without hesitation, declared his intention to summon the city to surrender to his troops next morning, and even to use force in case of resistance. At the same time, the deputies received the most satisfactory assurances that no fears ought to be entertained for the independence of the city of Hamburgh, or the property of individuals; and farther, that his highness would be satisfied with the possession of the gates and walls, without requiring any troops to be quartered in the city. The senate assembled in the night, unanimously resolved, that it was better to yield to force, than to expose the city to greater force in consequence of any resistance. On the morning of the 23d, the gate, called the Millenthor, and a part of the fortifications, were immediately given up to a corps of Danish troops, and without the least interruption of the public tranquillity. The British consul at Hamburgh, considering the critical situation of affairs, had given repeated information and advice to the captains of British vessels in the Elbe to accelerate their departure. Some took the warning; others, not easily believing that any thing seriously hostile was to be apprehended from the Danes or Prussians, were not in haste, and were accordingly detained.

The English ministry, in such pressing circumstances, naturally had recourse to a mode of conduct, of the same nature with that which had been attended, at least, with partial and temporary success, about six months before. This was to send negociators for peace to Copenhagen, backed by a strong fleet in the Cattegat. A fleet, consisting of eighteen ships of the line, four frigates, and a number of bomb and gun-boats, amounting, in all, to fifty-two sail, and having on board several regiments of marines and of rifle-men, sailed from Yarmouth, on the 12th of March, for the Baltic. The Invincible, of seventy-four guns, soon after sailing, struck on the ridge of sand fourteen miles from Winterton, and was so much damaged, that she sunk in deep water. Admiral Totty, who was on board, with a few officers, 19 marines, and 164 seamen, were saved. All the rest of the marines and seamen perished.

Meanwhile the most active preparations for war were continued and hastened in the ports of Russia, Sweden, and Denmark. The young king of Sweden was perpetually in motion. In the course of a tour to inspect the state of defence, and to animate by his presence the armaments on the coasts of his dominions, he had a conference with the Prince of Denmark. A plan of action was concerted. The great object was to guard the passage of the Sound. Besides the forts of Helsingburg and Cronenburg, which were garrisoned each with two regiments, batteries were erected on both the Swedish and Danish sides of the pass, on every point where it was possible for them to bear on the English ships. Batteries also were erected on the island of Amack, and on Sproe in the Belt. The naval batteries of the port of Copenhagen, and the citadel, were in a complete state of defence. Artillerymen were stationed in all the batteries to fire, if necessary, with red-hot shot. The Danish coast was occupied with troops at proper stations. For bearing a part in this measure, the light infantry in garrison, in the citadel of Copenhagen, were detached till farther orders. On the side of the Elbe, the preparations were equally vigorous. Nine gun-boats, well armed, were stationed on that river, a little below the Danish harbour of Altona, which could bring to, and search almost every vessel going up and down. Preparations were made for an encampment of 20,000 Danish soldiers, between Altona and Gluckstadt; and all the regiments in the duchies of Sleswick and Holstein had likewise orders to march at six hours notice.

In the midst of these military preparations, Mr. Vansittart arrived from the court of London, in a frigate; with a flag of truce, at Elsinour, on the 20th of March, with dispatches for the British minister at Copenhagen, Mr. Drummond. Mr. Vansittart had the powers of a plenipotentiary-extraordinary. The ultimatum presented by these ministers to the Danish government, required that Denmark should secede from the northern alliance; that a free passage through the Sound should be granted to the English fleet; and that the Danish ships should no longer sail with convoy. Certain advantages are said to have been held out to the Danes, in order to bring them over to these conditions. The terms offered by the court of London being rejected, Mr. Drummond and Mr. Vansittart received passports to return home.

The connection between the Danes and the English was so intimate, and the war between the two nations so unnatural, that the English who resided at Copenhagen, and who were required immediately to leave Denmark with Mr. Drummond and Mr. Vansittart, refused; and some of them even said, that they would remain in Denmark whatever should be the consequence. Only the English consul, and some other persons, who had particular reasons, went on board an English frigate lying at Elsinour, on the 22d of March, and set sail for the English fleet then lying at Anholt, an island in the Cattegat, eight miles from the coast of Jutland, and ten from Zealand. The rest, who chose at all hazards to stay behind, not only received permission from the Danish government to remain, but were generously permitted to choose the place where they would reside, and were promised, from the laws, full protection and security. The English fleet, in the night between the 22d and 23d, sailed from Anholt to Gilleleve, on the northern coast of Zealand, and there anchored.

The Danish navy consisted of twenty-three ships of the line, one or two of which were unfit for service, and most of them in bad order. They had fourteen frigates and cutter-brigs, from twenty to forty guns, seventeen gun-boats, of twenty-four guns each, together with guard-ships. The fleet, however, was not adequately manned.

Sweden had eighteen ships of the line, fourteen frigates, sloops, and other vessels of war, and seventy-four galleys and flat-bottomed boats, besides gun-boats. The Swedish fleet was supposed to be better manned than either that of Denmark or Russia.

The whole navy of Russia consisted of eighty-two sail of the line, besides near forty frigates, exclusive of galleys and other small craft. Several ships of the line, however, were unfit for service. Of the force now stated, there was at Cronstadt, Revel, Petersburg, and Archangel, forty-seven sail of the line. The whole of the Russian fleet was badly manned and officered. Notwithstanding that Russia produces all kinds of naval stores, the ships were but ill equipped. To remedy the want of officers, an academy had been instituted at Cronstadt, where 360 young noblemen and gentlemen were instructed in all the sciences suitable to their profession, and from whence they were promoted to the navy.

The British admiral, Sir Hyde Parker, desirous to know whether the Danes intended to oppose his passage of the Sound, sent a note, dated the London, in the Cattegat, 27th of March, as follows, to the governor of Cronenburg Castle:—"From the hostile transactions of the court of Denmark, and sending away his Britannic majesty's chargé d'affaires, the commander-in-chief of his majesty's fleet is anxious to know, what the determination of the Danish court is, and whether the commanding officer of Cronenburg Castle has received orders to fire on the British fleet as they pass into the Sound, as he must deem the firing of the first gun a declaration of war on the part of Denmark."

The governor, Heer Stricker, replied, "I have the honor to inform your excellency, that his majesty the King of Denmark did not send away the chargé d'affaires, but that, on his own demand, he obtained a passport. As a soldier, I cannot meddle with politics; but I am not at liberty to suffer a fleet, whose intention is not yet known, to approach the guns of the castle which I have the honor to command. In case your excellency should think proper to make any proposals to the King of Denmark, I wish to be informed thereof, before the fleet approaches nearer to the castle."

To this note from the governor of Cronenburg, the British admiral sent back another to his excellency. "Finding the intentions of the court of Denmark to be hostile against his Britannic majesty; he regarded his excellency's answer as a declaration of war; and, therefore, agreeably to his instructions, could no longer refrain from hostilities, however reluctant it might be to his feelings; but, at the same time, the admiral would be ready to attend to any proposals of the court of Denmark, for restoring the former amity and friendship which had, for so many years, subsisted between the two courts.

On the 30th of March, the wind having come to the northward, the British fleet passed the Sound, and anchored about five or six miles from the island of Huin. It was fired on from the castle of Cronenburg, which it bombarded in return. There was no firing from the Swedish coast; which enabled the British ships to pass at a greater distance from Cronenburg. There was very little damage done, either by the firing of the castle or by the bombardment. The passage of the strait took up nearly four hours. The admiral, together with the vice-admiral, Lord Nelson, and rear-admiral Graves, reconnoitred the formidable line of ships, radeaus, pontoons, galleys, fire-ships, and gun-boats, stationed in the road of Copenhagen. They were flanked and supported by batteries on the two islands called the Crowns; the largest of which batteries was mounted with from fifty to seventy pieces of cannon. These were again commanded by two ships of seventy guns, and a large frigate in the inner road of Copenhagen; and two sixty-four gun ships, without masts, were moored on the flat, on the starboard side of the entrance into the arsenal. The day after, the wind being southerly, the admirals again examined their position, and came to the resolution of attacking the Danes from the southward.

Lord Nelson, who had offered his services for conducting the attack, and had, for this purpose, shifted his flag from the St. George to the Elephant, a vessel of a smaller size, immediately gave directions for buoying the channel of the Outer Deep and the Middle Ground; after which the detachment, consisting of the Elephant, Defiance, Monarch, Bellona, Edgar, Russel, Ganges, Glatton, Isis, Agamemnon, Polyphemus, Ardent, Amazon, Desirée, Blanche, Alcmene; sloops, Dart, Arrow, Cruiser, and Harpy; fire-ships, Zephyr and Otter; bombs, Discovery, Sulphur, Hecla, Explosion, Zebra, Terror, and Volcano: these selected for the assault, passed in safety, and anchored off Draco Point, April 1. It was agreed on between the admiral and vice-admiral, that the ships remaining with the admiral should weigh at the same moment his lordship did, and menace the Crown batteries, and four Danish ships of the line that lay at the entrance of the arsenal; as also to cover our disabled ships as they should come out of the action.

The prospect opened to the British fleet on entering the Sound was fitted to excite a variety of emotions, mixing or succeeding each other, of the liveliest and most affecting nature. A splendid theatre appeared for war and victory: but the face of nature, and the recollection of a common interest, a common religion, and a common origin and character with the nations on the shores of the Baltic, could not but impress every intelligent and feeling mind with sentiments of regret; and, in the midst of all the apparatus, and almost in the very throat of war, tend, in some sort and degree, to harmonize the mind to peace and concord. Nothing in the northern parts of Europe, or of Asia, presents a prospect equal to the channel of the Sound: which has Denmark on the right, and the islands of Saltholm and Amack, with part of Zealand, and the capital of the kingdom, Copenhagen, nearly in front.—On the coast of Denmark, appears a continued succession of rich plains, woods, meadows, superb mansions, neat villas, pleasant gardens, adorned with all the embellishments of art: while the Swedish shore exhibits corn-lands, pastures, a mountainous and picturesque coast. The island of Nuen, celebrated for the observatory of Tycho Brahe, arrests the attention of the passing voyager. To the eye, looking back from thence, the fortresses of Elseneur, Cronenburg, and Helsingburg, seem to unite, and to bound on the north, a vast lake; but soon as he advances, he discovers the sea, and the whole extent of the plain of Copenhagen, its port filled with vessels, and its cultivated environs. On the side next the sea, this city presents itself in all its magnificence. It is perceived at the distance of several miles. The gothic towers with which it abounds, and which, from a distance, have a majestic appearance, engage and fix the attention of the spectator, by the height of their spires, as well as by the variety of the ornaments with which they are decorated. The number of inhabitants exceeds eighty thousand. It contains the principal fortress of the country; the fleet; the marine arsenals; the only university in Denmark; several academies; a superb library; a veterinary school; a school for cadets in the sea and land service; a museum, containing a great variety of rare and curious objects; a number of fine edifices, statues, and monuments of every kind. The streets are, for the most part, broad and well-paved. There are excellent footways, as in London; and every where the signs of comfort, wealth, and magnificence. The garrison, in time of peace, consists of six regiments of infantry, the foot-guard, the horse-guard, a corps of artillery, a corps of marines, and a squadron of hussars, amounting, in the whole, to about 10,000 men; to which may be added, the city militia, the chief officers of which are appointed by the king, and rank among the officers of the army. The fortress of Frederickstadt, supported on one side by the batteries of one of the arsenals, defends the entrance of the harbour, where there is besides another battery, and where, in case of necessity, a number of flat-bottomed boats and floating batteries may be stationed, as, in fact, they were at the present juncture. Such was the city, the capital of a congenial and long friendly nation, that was now pointed out as an object of attack to the British navy.

On the morning of April 2, Lord Nelson made the signal for the squadron to weigh, and to engage the Danish line, consisting of six sail of the line, eleven floating batteries, from twenty-six 24-pounders to eighteen 18-pounders, and one bomb-ship, besides schooner gun-vessels. These were supported by the Crown islands, mounting eighty-eight cannon, and four sail of the line moored in the harbour's mouth, and some batteries, as above noticed, on the island of Amack. The bomb-ship and schooner gun-vessels made their escape. The other seventeen sail, being the whole of the Danish line to the southward of the Crown islands, after a battle of four hours, were sunk, burnt, or taken.

From the very intricate navigation, the Bellona and Russel unfortunately grounded; but, although not in the situation assigned them, in such a place as enabled them to be of great service. The Agamemnon could not weather the shoal of the middle, and was unavoidably obliged to anchor. The extension of the British line was prevented, by the situation of these three ships, which Lord Nelson was confident would have silenced the Crown islands, with the two outer ships in the harbour's mouth, and prevented a heavy loss of men in the Defiance and Monarch, but which unhappily threw the gallant and good Captain Riou under a very dreadful fire. The consequence was, the death of Captain Riou and many brave officers and men in the frigates and sloops. The bombs were directed, and took their stations in breast of the Elephant, in which the vice-admiral had hoisted his flag, and threw some shells into the arsenal. Captain Rose, who volunteered his services to direct the gun-brigs, did every thing that was possible to get them forward, but the current was too forcible for them to be of service during the action. The boats of those ships of the line which were not ordered on the attack, afforded the squadron engaged every assistance. The Desirée took her station in raking the southernmost Danish ship, and performed the greatest service. The action began at five minutes past ten. The van was led by Captain George Murray, of the Edgar, who set a noble example of intrepidity, which was followed by every captain, officer, and man, in the navy. The loss, in such a battle, was naturally very heavy. The total amount of the killed and wounded was stated at 943. Among the killed, besides Captain Riou, was Captain Moss, of the Monarch; among the wounded, Sir Thomas B. Thompson, of the Bellona, who lost his leg. Lord Nelson, in his report of the action to Sir H. Parker, bestowed the warmest and most liberal praise on all concerned; and on none more than on those officers and men whose utmost exertions had proved ineffectual.

The carnage on board the Danish ships was excessive: It was calculated by the commander-in-chief, Oliver Fisher, at 1800. The vessels were crowded with men, and from some singular neglect, probably originating in the idea of the wounded being so near the city that they could be immediately accommodated there, there was not on board their block-ships a single surgeon. When the English boarded them, they found hundreds bleeding to death. As soon as the fire of the Danish line had slackened, and Lord Nelson perceived that the ships and batteries of the enemy were in his power, he went to his cabin, and wrote a letter to the prince-royal, representing the expediency of allowing a flag of truce to pass, and stating, that if this was denied, he should be under the necessity of destroying the floating batteries, now in his power, while it would be impossible to save those brave men by whom they were defended. This note was addressed, "To the brothers of Englishmen, the Danes." When, in consequence of this representation, he received permission to land, and went on shore to adjust terms of conciliation, he was received by the brave and generous Danes, with the loudest acclamations, and treated by the accomplished Prince of Denmark with every mark of respect. The immediate consequence of their conference was an armistice, which soon led to an amicable convention.

The proposal of a truce by Lord Nelson was ascribed by some not to humanity, but to a military stratagem. Three of his line-of-battle ships, the Bellona, Russel, and Agamemnon, as before noticed, lay aground, exposed to the tremendous fire of the crown batteries. It was in order to save these ships, it was said, that Lord Nelson went into his cabin, and sent on shore a flag of truce. If this was his motive, the greatest degree of admiration is due to that coolness and readiness of invention, by which he devised means for extricating the ships from such imminent danger.

The dreadful engagement heard, seen, and felt on the Danish shore, wound up the feelings of every one to the highest pitch of sensibility: but all individual hopes and fears seemed to be lost in a general blaze of patriotic ardor. From the Crown Prince, whose cool intrepidity and judgment were gloriously displayed in the sight of his people and of Europe, to the humblest citizen, one heroic mind and purpose seemed to animate and unite the whole. Never had the Danish valour, in the brightest periods of their history, shone out with more distinguished lustre. The daring pirates of the ninth and tenth centuries did not exhibit greater intrepidity and prowess in invading, than their descendants of the nineteenth century did in resisting an invasion from England.

Lord Nelson told the Crown Prince's aid-de-camp, Colonel Lundholm, who waited on him respecting the proffered flag of truce, that "the French fought bravely, but that they could not have stood an hour the fight which the Danes maintained for four. I have been in 105 engagements in the course of my life, but that of to-day was the most terrible of all." Admiral Sir Hyde Parker, in his dispatches to the admiralty, said, "Were it possible for me to add any thing to the well-earned renown of Lord Nelson, it would be by asserting that his exertions, great as they have heretofore been, never were carried to a higher pitch of zeal for his country's service."

The Swedish fleet at Carlsrona left that port the 31st of March, but was prevented from joining the Danes by contrary winds. Surmises were current that the Swedish government was more eager to incite the Danes than to take themselves a share in actual hostilities. But they were wholly groundless.

On the 22d of March the Danish and Swedish isles in the West Indies were reduced by a squadron under Admiral Duckworth.

The proposals made by Lord Nelson, in the conference with the Prince of Denmark, were 1st, That Denmark should recede from its alliance with Russia. 2d, That the English should be permitted to repair their ships in the Danish docks. 3d, That the wounded on board the English fleet should be taken care of in Danish hospitals. The last of these conditions was readily granted, the others rejected. An armistice, however, was agreed to, April 9, and prolonged from day to day. A notice of six hours, in case of an intention of renewing hostilities on either side, was to be given previously to the termination of the armistice.

As soon as the disabled ships were refitted, and the Holstein Danish ship of the line, which was converted into a floating hospital, together with the Isis and Monarch, which were dreadfully shattered, were sent to England, it was determined to pass over the grounds into the Baltic. Accordingly, the guns and part of the stores were taken out of the two three-deckers, the London and St. George, and placed on board an American merchantman, while the vice-admiral was so eager to obtain intelligence relative to the Swedish fleet, that he proceeded in a boat belonging to his own ship. On this occasion, Lord Nelson actually set off in that species of small vessel denominated a gig.

On the arrival of the British squadron before Carlsrona, April 18, Sir Hyde Parker sent in a frigate with a flag of truce and a letter to the governor, in which it was stated, "that the Danish court, having been induced to conclude an armistice, by which the unfortunate disputes between the courts of Copenhagen and St. James's had been accommodated, he was directed to require an explicit declaration from the court of Sweden, relative to its intention to abandon the hostile measures adopted, in conjunction with Russia, against the rights and interests of Great Britain." Vice-admiral Cronstadt replied, in the name of the king, "that it was the unalterable resolution of his Swedish majesty, not to fail, for a moment, in fulfilling with fidelity and sincerity the engagements he had entered into with his allies; but, that he would not refuse to listen to equitable proposals for the accommodation of disputes, provided they were made by plenipotentiaries, sent on the part of Great Britain, to the United Powers."

On receiving this answer, the admiral left the bay without firing a gun; and all farther hostilities with the northern states were happily prevented by the sudden death of the Emperor Paul, which happened at four o'clock in the morning of March 25, being forty-six years and six months old.

This emperor had disgusted all ranks; his temper and tyranny had left him no friends; the favorite of to-day knew he might be the victim of to-morrow; commerce was at a stand, and the trading class suffered severely; the very party about his person, who were daily receiving his favors, were so conscious of their danger, that they were the first to promote the plan for dethroning him. A considerable time before his death, this party resolved to force him to abdicate the throne, and to retire far from the seat of government. This fact was known to several well-informed persons in London, and hence arose the eagerness with which his famous challenge, when it first arrived, was regarded as a preliminary to his being deposed. The French papers asserted that his death was plotted by the English government, having for their agent at St. Petersburg an English colonel. Such a charge was as false as infamous.

Paul, about the middle of March, gave his minister a warrant for banishing or imprisoning his wife, the empress, and two sons, Alexander and Constantine. The minister did not put this order into execution; but, went to the sons to inform them of it, saying, "Your father is ruining the country and himself, he will now destroy you; is this to be borne?" The sons owned themselves sensible their father was ruining the country, and drawing on general confusion; but they could not interfere, they must obey. The minister suggested that something must be done to stop him in his course. The sons said they could advise nothing, and would take no part, but would leave it to the ministers to pursue such measures as were best calculated to promote the interests of the empire. Upon this the minister called a secret meeting of the court party; consisting of the ministers, military commanders, officers of state, and chief nobility, amounting in all to nearly forty persons. They dined together, that the bottle might give them courage perhaps; and the minister proposed that the Emperor Paul should be desired to abdicate the throne; that he should retire to a palace at a distance from St. Petersburg, where he should be protected, and pass his life in private. This proposal, to which all parties had agreed individually before, was unanimously adopted; and the party proceeded in a body, late in the evening of the 24th, to the emperor's palace, to put their project into force.

The Emperor Paul had heard of a plot to dethrone him, and had for a considerable time lived in a state of the greatest alarm. He stationed the most faithful guards at the avenues of his palace, and took every precaution against surprise. The guards challenged the party when they approached; the party gave the watch-word, but that would not satisfy the guards; at last their own commanders came forward from among the party, when of course the whole were allowed to pass. They did not go up a back stair-case, as it had been reported, but went up the grand entrance, to the emperor's bed-room, knowing that was the hour of his retirement. At the bed-room door, a trusty hussar was stationed, who refused the party permission to pass on any terms, and a violent struggle ensued, in which the hussar was overcome. They then entered the bed-room, and to their utter astonishment perceived the emperor had left the bed. They saw nothing of him in the room, and concluded their design had wholly failed, that it could not be concealed, and that their lives must pay for their attempt. But in searching around, the emperor was discovered standing behind a screen, just as he had leaped out of bed, alarmed by the struggle made by the hussar, and apprehensive of some plot. The party now told him the object of their visit, stated to him the acts of injustice and tyranny of which he had been guilty, the ruin he was bringing upon the nation, and the general discontent at his conduct, concluding, by recommending that he should abdicate the throne in favor of his son Alexander, and presenting for his signature an instrument to that effect. Paul trembled, confessed his misconduct, admitted the truth of all with which he had been reproached; but promised to act with the strictest propriety, and just do as they should direct in future, if he was permitted to reign. His abdication, however, was insisted upon, and he was consenting, when, among others, Count Z. whom he had stripped of all the honors and emoluments bestowed by the Empress Catherine, began to reproach him in very severe terms for his personal ill-treatment. Paul, who disliked this person much, replied with bitterness and rage, and a violent altercation ensued, when Count Z. who is a very athletic man, lifted a chair, and striking Paul with the corner point of the seat of it a severe blow on the forehead, the emperor fell senseless to the ground.

This was a circumstance neither foreseen nor provided against; and the whole party were greatly at a loss how to proceed. After such a breach, it was thought it would be impossible to cajole the emperor into abdication; it was dreaded, that nothing could blind his rage if he recovered. Having gone so far, it was deemed necessary for their own safety to go farther; and it was agreed, that the emperor should be put to death. He was strangled, trampled upon, and bruised, for several hours, till it was quite certain he was dead. His body was then laid on the bed; and, in the morning, a physician was called in, to certify that he died of an apoplexy; and that the marks of violence which appeared were occasioned by a fall.

But the revolutionary party did not finish the business completely like masters: they left the hussar at the door, to overhear, and partly witness all that passed, and they allowed him to escape. If he had been put to death also, the truth might never have been known; but the hussar went forth, and whispered what he knew; the story got abroad, and the empress, Paul's widow, hearing it, sent for the hussar, and took him under her protection. Such is human ambition, or rather vanity, that the empress, who might have rejoiced at being freed from a husband who neglected her for the worst of favorites, and was even going to banish her from his throne, no sooner found her greatness eclipsed by the loss of her lord, and that she was to sink into the antiquated, the neglected character of an empress dowager, than she pretended the most violent grief, threw herself in public over the corpse of Paul, caressed the hussar, published his tale in every quarter, and took all possible steps to stir up a party against the government to espouse her cause. In this she had some success. Alexander sent Count Z. into exile, dismissed the minister, and took every step to shew his respect for his father's memory.

Great was the joy of the people of St. Petersburg, on the news of Paul's death. In ecstacy, transported, they seemed as if reprieved from sentence of death. This spirit prevailed so much, that the shewmen about the streets represented the whole circumstances, with explanations and names, till an order was issued by government, forbidding persons to talk of the emperor Paul's death. Count Z. who carried the first news to Moscow, was waited on by a deputation of the nobles, and next of the merchants, congratulating him in transports of joy, and bestowing on him the richest presents. Many letters were found among the papers of the Turkish valet, the favorite of the emperor Paul, who kept Madame Chevalier, announcing the plot for deposing Paul. One of these had been sent the day before his death, giving the most minute particulars of what was to be done. This letter was seized among Kutusoff's papers, unopened!

For more than a year before his death, Paul had exhibited multiplied symptoms of insanity. In this the predominant ingredient was generally anger or rage. When dispatches were presented to him from the British government, containing terms of conciliation, he returned them unopened, after piercing them in many places with a pen-knife. In a review of some troops in front of his palace, an officer was thrown from his horse, and dislocated his arm. The brutal emperor, instead of shewing any signs of compassion, kicked the officer, as he lay on the ground, with his foot. Yet his madness, though still somewhat tinged with violence, was sometimes mixed with a degree of whimsical humour. In private conversation with a nobleman of his court, without any provocation or preliminary, he gave him a hearty slap in the face, adding, "This salutation with my hand, Paul," alluding to one of the epistles from Paul, the apostle. A few days before the young king of Sweden, who had gone to concert the measures of the armed neutrality, left Petersburg, the emperor gave a tournament, a diversion of which he was very fond, and in which he performed personally as a combatant. In the evening, while the glass was in circulation with Russian briskness, a dispatch was received from Bonaparte, together with several caricatures, said to be published in England, in which Paul was represented as a lunatic. The conversation turned on the military successes of his new French friends; the projects formed by the northern confederacy to humble the pride of England, and the invincible prowess which the emperor had displayed all day long in the tournament. His majesty, fired with the spirit of chivalry, immediately resolved to send a defiance to all the potentates of Europe. The court-gazette of St. Petersburg (December 30, 1800) contained the following:—"It is said that his majesty, the emperor, seeing that the powers of Europe cannot agree, and wishing to terminate a war which has raged eleven years, intends to propose a place, where he will invite all other potentates, to fight with them in barriers closed up: for which purpose they are to bring with them their most enlightened ministers and most skilful generals, as squires, umpires, and heralds; such as Thugut, Pitt, and Bernstoff. He himself intends to have with him Count Vander Pablin and Count Kutusoff. It is not known whether this rumour is to be depended upon: meanwhile, it does not seem to be altogether without foundation, as it bears the mark of what has often been imputed to him."

The new emperor, Alexander, proclaimed on the day succeeding the night of his father's death, declared for the laws and system of his august grand-mother. It was among the first acts of his reign, to give orders that the British sailors and masters, who had been taken from the several British ships, in a state of sequestration, and sent to various towns throughout the Russian dominions, should be set at liberty and carefully conducted to the several ports from whence they were taken. All prohibitions against the exportation of corn were removed; and the exportation of all kinds of grain was permitted.

Baron Lisakewitch, the emperor's minister at Denmark, having notified these events to Admiral Parker, the latter immediately returned to Kioge Bay, on purpose to await the orders of his court, in consequence of these interesting changes; and, in the mean time, the benefits of the armistice were extended to the court of Stockholm.

However, Vice-admiral Lord Nelson, (who succeeded soon after to the command), intimated to Vice-admiral Cronstadt, May 19, "that he was not directed to abstain from hostilities; should he meet the Swedish fleet at sea." In the course of a few days though, a proclamation was published at Stockholm, by which the king made known, "that his allies having resumed their former commercial intercourse with England, and the commander of the British fleet having solemnly declared, that the Swedish merchant vessels should not be molested in the Baltic or the Cattegat, he deemed himself no longer bound to persevere in a resolution which, at present, would merely tend to impede the navigation and commerce between his subjects and those of his Britannic majesty.

The Danish troops now evacuated Hamburg; the free navigation of the Elbe, Weser, and Ems was restored; and the court of Berlin gave assurances that, after certain arrangements should be made for the quiet of Germany, the Prussian troops should evacuate Bremen and Hanover.

The termination of hostilities between Great Britain and Denmark was attended with some pleasing and affecting circumstances, such as might be expected in a reconciliation of friends. The honorable Colonel Stuart, who commanded the military on board the British fleet, and whose gallantry was greatly praised by Lord Nelson, after an armistice was agreed on, brought over a letter from the Prince of Denmark to the King of England, his uncle. When the embargo, that had been laid on the Danish ships in the British ports, was, in consequence of the pacification, taken off, the expence of both laying it on and taking it off was defrayed out of the English treasury. This mild and liberal proceeding gave general satisfaction not only to the government and people of Denmark, but also to the British.

Soon after, Lord St. Helens arrived at the court of St. Petersburg, in quality of minister-plenipotentiary from England: and by a convention, signed June 17, the emperor, on one hand, allowed the right of search, under certain restrictions, by ships of war, but not by privateers; while, on the other, the raw or manufactured commodities of the countries engaged in war might be purchased and carried away by the neutral powers; however, by a subsequent explanatory declaration, the commerce between the mother-country and the colonies was expressly excluded from the benefits of this arrangement.

Thus Great Britain, partly by the sudden demise of the Emperor Paul, and partly by a sacrifice of some of her pretensions, effectually baffled the efforts of a confederacy, which aimed at the decrease of her maritime greatness, and threatened her with a new and disastrous war.

Spain proclaims War against Portugal.—Declaration of the Court of Lisbon.—The Armies of France and Spain enter Portugal.—Treaties of Badajoz and Madrid.—Madeira occupied by the English.

PORTUGAL, on account of her attachment to the only remaining enemy of the republic, excited the indignation of the consular government, which prevailed on that of Spain to avenge her cause. Queen Mary, the widow of her uncle, Peter III. incapacitated, partly by age and partly by a terrible malady, from exercising the royal functions, still retained the semblance of sovereignty, while the kingdom was governed by her son, under the name of regent. The Prince of Brasil, conscious that his country had been repeatedly saved, and his family continued on the throne, in consequence of the support and protection of Great Britain, from whom he now expected the assistance of an auxiliary army, was devoted to that power; and, notwithstanding the menaces of a neighbouring court, had hitherto rejected the idea of any treaty that tended to exclude her ships from his ports.

For some time, the King of Spain, actuated by a natural attachment to his family, had delayed the vengeance of his ally; but, dreading the power of the first consul, and fearful of an invasion, he at length complied with his wish, and reserved for himself the task of chastising his own son-in-law.

A declaration of war against Portugal was accordingly published by the court of Madrid, on the 3d of March, because that country obstinately refused to ratify the treaty concluded with France by the Spanish court, in the year 1797; in which it was agreed, that Portugal should separate itself from Great Britain, and, as a security of its being faithful, allow its ports to be garrisoned by Spanish troops; that she had granted protection in her ports to the fleets of Britain, and aided them in their hostilities against France and Spain. "We have seen Portuguese," added his catholic majesty, "mixed with British ships, forming a part of their fleets, facilitating their movements, and participating in all those acts of hostility which the English commit against me. Their ports have become the public markets of the Spanish and French prizes taken upon their coasts, and in sight of their fortresses; while their admiralty releases all the captures made by my subjects. The French republic, irritated at these outrages, is desirous of inflicting a just punishment; and its victorious armies would have long since spread desolation through all her provinces, if my fraternal affection for the most faithful queen and her august children had not suspended the blow."

After complaining that the prince regent "had evaded the royal promise, so often pledged, in favor of peace," and, in complaisance to England, his enemy, "abused those engagements which his majesty had entered into with France," it was stated, that the King of Spain had ordered his ambassador to quit Lisbon, and given a passport to the Portuguese minister at the court of Madrid to depart, "being decided," concluded Charles IV. "to attack that power, by uniting my forces with those of the republic, whose cause is become the same as my own, as well as to avenge the particular insults that have been offered to myself. For this purpose I declare war against her most faithful majesty, her kingdom, and subjects; wishing this resolution to be promulgated through all my states, in order that convenient measures may be taken for the defence of my kingdom and my ships, as well as against the territories and vessels of my enemies."

The counter-manifesto, published by the court of Lisbon, April 24, and addressed "to the clergy, nobility, and people," was replete with energy and spirit. After congratulating the nation on retaining its independence, notwithstanding the subjugation of so many other countries, the prince regent maintained, that Portugal had always evinced a scrupulous fidelity in the fulfilment of its promises, in respect to foreign states. A remarkable proof of this, he observed, was afforded in the recent assistance given to Spain, (alluding to the troops sent to the succour of his catholic majesty, in 1793), which, by terminating hostilities against France, not only involved the nation that succoured her, but declared war, because the former had observed the faith of treaties inviolate. "This alone," added his royal highness, "is sufficient to arouse the dormant spirit of patriotism; but there are still more powerful motives to animate you. It is intended to degrade and debase, by reducing you to supplicate for the preservation of your commerce. Spain even demands that our ports should be guarded by her troops, as a security for our fidelity; but a nation who knew how to resist the Romans, to conquer Asia, to discover a passage to the east, to break, when she was still weak, the hereditary yoke of a foreign sceptre, to recover and maintain her in-

“Portuguese! we will still preserve the courage and the sentiments of honor transmitted to us by our ancestors. Justice is on our side: the true God, propitious to our cause, will punish, by means of our arms, the injuries committed by our enemies; he will crown with glory our generals and our legitimate sovereign, while our zeal, the equity of our cause, and the remembrance of our exploits, will secure us victory.”

The Prince of Peace, (Duke of Alcudia,) having been declared generalissimo of the Spanish forces, to the amount of 35,000 men, immediately entered Portugal, and in the course of fifty days overran that country, though in one of his dispatches, he allowed his troops to have been “ill-clothed, ill-fed, and ill-supplied with ammunition and accoutrements.” Having penetrated by two different routs into Alentejo, May 20, he obtained possession of Campo-Major and all the fortified places in that extensive province, compelled the enemy to retire beyond the Tagus, and transmitted eleven standards to Madrid. Immediately after these exploits, June 6, the prince regent, who had only received a subsidy of 300,000*l.* from England, was obliged to consent to a treaty of peace, consisting of the following articles:

Art. 1. “That there shall be peace, amity, and good understanding between his Catholic majesty, the King of Spain, and the Prince Regent of Portugal and Algarve, as well by sea as land, through the whole extent of their kingdoms and possessions; and all captures which shall be made by sea, after the ratification of the present treaty, shall be faithfully restored, with all their goods and effects, or their respective value paid.

2. “His royal highness will shut the ports of his whole territories against the ships of Great Britain in general.

3. “His Catholic majesty will restore to his royal highness the fortresses and places Garumena, Aronches, Portalegri, Castel Davide, Barbaamar, Campo-Major, and Ouguella, and all the territories hitherto conquered by his arms, or which may hereafter be conquered, with all their artillery, fire-arms, or other warlike stores, and in the same condition in which they were surrendered to him; and his Catholic majesty will take, as a conquest, the fortress of Olivenza, with its territory and inhabitants, from the Guadiana, and unite the same for ever to his own territory and subjects, as that river above-mentioned shall be the boundary of the respective kingdoms on that part.

4. “His royal highness the Prince Regent of Portugal and Algarva will not permit any depôts of prohibited and contraband goods, which may be prejudicial to the interests of the crown of Spain, to be formed on the frontiers of his kingdom, exclusive of such as appertain to the revenues of the crown of Portugal, or are necessary for the consumption of the respective territories in which they are established; and if this, or any other article, shall not be maintained, the treaty, which is now concluded between the three powers, including the interchangeable guarantee, shall be null and void, as is expressed in the articles of the present treaty.

5. “His royal highness will immediately repair and make good all damages or injuries which the subjects of his Catholic majesty may have sustained during the present war from the ships of Great Britain, or the subjects of the court of Portugal, and for which they can rightfully claim indemnification; and, in like manner, his Catholic majesty engages to make suitable satisfaction for all captures which may have been made by the Spaniards before the present war, in violation of, or within cannon-shot of, the Portuguese territory.

6. “Within the space of three months, reckoning from the ratification of the present treaty, his royal highness will pay to the treasury of his Catholic majesty the expenses left unpaid when they withdrew from the war with France, and which were occasioned by the same; according to the estimate given in by the ambassador of his Catholic majesty, or which may be given in anew; with the exception, however, of any error that may be found in the said estimate.

7. “As soon as the present treaty shall be signed, all hostilities shall cease, on both sides, within twenty-four hours, without any contributions or requisitions being laid, after that time, on any of the conquered places, except such as may be allowed to friendly troops in time of peace; and as soon as this treaty shall be ratified, the Spanish troops shall leave the Portuguese territory within six days, and shall begin their march within six hours after receiving notice, without offering any violence or injury to the inhabitants in their way; and they shall pay for whatever may be necessary for them, according to the current price of the country.

8. “All prisoners who may have been taken by sea or land, shall, within fifteen days after the ratification of the present treaty, be set at liberty and delivered up on both sides; and, at the same time, all debts which they may have contracted during their imprisonment, shall be paid. The sick and wounded shall remain in the respective hospitals, there to be taken care of, and in like manner delivered up, as soon as they shall be able to begin their march.

9. “His Catholic majesty engages to guarantee to his royal highness the Prince Regent of Portugal the entire possession of all his states, without the least exception or reserve.

10. "The two high contracting parties engage to renew the treaty of defensive alliance which existed between the two monarchies, but with such clauses and alterations as the connections entered into by the Spanish monarchy with the French republic may demand; and in the same treaty shall be regulated what aid shall be maturely afforded, should necessity require.

11. "The present treaty shall be ratified within ten days after it is signed, or sooner if possible. In witness of this, we, the undersigned ministers plenipotentiary, have subscribed the present treaty with our own hands, and sealed it with our arms.

"THE PRINCE OF PEACE.
"LOUIS PINTO DI SOUZA."

Done at Badajoz, June 6, 1801.

Humiliating as these articles were, to which the prince regent was obliged to accede, still Portugal was far from being in a tranquil state; the concessions having been made to his Catholic majesty alone, afforded cause of suspicion to France, and as the pacification did not appear in exact conformity with the wishes of the consular government, General St. Cyr, who had been invested with the character of ambassador to the court of Madrid, was immediately placed at the head of 20,000 troops. The French general immediately entered Portugal, and invested the fortress of Almeida, within thirty leagues of the capital. As Portugal, in her exhausted state, could make no resistance, the English subsidy having been unaccompanied by a body of troops, long expected, and no doubt originally intended to have been sent, the court of Lisbon became alarmed for its safety. This event produced another humiliating treaty between the French republic and the kingdom of Portugal, signed at Madrid, September 29, by Lucien Bonaparte, in the name of the French people, and his excellency Cyprian Bibeiro Freire, member of his royal highness's council, and minister plenipotentiary to his Catholic majesty.

By this treaty, highly favorable to France, it was agreed, in like manner, that prisoners of war should be given up on both sides, and the political relations between the two powers re-established on the same footing as before the war. Portugal engaged that all her ports and harbours should be immediately shut to all English ships of war and merchantmen, and so remain till peace between France and England; and that the same ports and harbours should be open to all ships of war or merchantmen belonging to France or her allies. She also engaged not to furnish, during the present war, the enemies of the French republic or its allies, with any aid in troops, ships, arms, ammunition, provisions, or money. The limits of the republic in Guiana were extended, on conditions that the Indians of the two Guianas, who, in the course of the war, might have been taken from their habitations, should be respectively restored; and that the citizens or subjects of the two powers, who might find themselves comprehended in the new-determined limits, might reciprocally retire into the possessions of their respective states: and that they should have power, also, to dispose of their property during the space of two years. In order to fix the commercial relations between France and Portugal, it was agreed, 1st. "That the communications shall be re-established immediately after the exchange of the ratifications, and that the agencies and commissaries of commerce shall be put in possession of the rights, immunities, and prerogatives which they enjoyed before the war.

2d. "That the citizens and subjects of the two powers shall equally and respectively enjoy, in the states of both, all the rights which are enjoyed by the subjects of the most favored nations.

3d. "That the articles of trade and commerce, the produce of the soil or manufactories of each of the two states, shall be reciprocally admitted without restriction, and without their being subjected to any duty which shall not bear equally upon analogous articles imported by other nations.

4th. "That the French cloths may be immediately introduced into Portugal, on the footing of the most favored merchandises.

5th. "All stipulations, in regard to commerce, inserted in preceding treaties, and not contrary to the present treaty, shall be provisionally continued until the conclusion of a definitive treaty."

Thus the French dominions in South America was extended from the Atlantic Ocean to the river of the Amazons; and the foundation of a vast empire was silently and secretly laid, under the specious colour and pretext of ascertaining a disputed boundary.

The English ministry, apprehending that the island of Madeira might be also delivered up to an insatiable enemy, very wisely sent a squadron thither, with a small body of land-forces under Colonel Clinton; and that officer, on the very day a landing was effected, obtained possession of the forts which commanded the bay of Funchiale.

In the mean time, such of the states of Europe as had not made peace with the French republic, being bereaved of support in consequence of the treaty of Luneville, were eager to solicit the consul's clemency. The treaty by which the King of Naples purchased his safety, and prevented the re-establishment of the Parthenopean republic, was exceedingly humiliating; he agreed to shut the ports of Naples and Sicily against the ships of war of Great Britain and Turkey; he renounced Porto Longone, with all his possessions in the isle of Elba, the presidial states in Tuscany, and the principality of Piombino. But what must have been far more disagreeable to this prince, he not only stipulated, by a specific article, to pay the sum of five hundred thousand livres, by way of indemnification for the lives lost, and the damages sustained during the late disorders in the kingdom of Naples, but he also agreed to permit all those who had been either imprisoned or banished, on account of their political opinions, to be liberated, and return to their native country.

CHAPTER IV.

State of the French Army in Egypt, after the Assassination of Kleber, and Character of the new Commander, Menou.—The English Ministry's Plan for the Conquest of Egypt.—Preparations for executing the same.—The Squadron assembles at Marmorice.—Description of the Bay.—General Orders, &c.

NOTHING gave the French army more general disgust than the attempts made by their new commander, Menou, to tarnish the glory of their late general, Kleber, who was adored by the soldiers, even more than Bonaparte; they did not forget his conduct with respect to the latter, when left by him without money or resources necessary in a foreign country. Kleber loved the service he was engaged in, and would not venture its disgrace by checking his men's spirits; he, therefore, hushed the feelings of his own breast to stifle those of his army; this reflected lustre on his name, and the army did not forget it. They abhorred the meanness of Menou, who endeavoured, in many ways, to cast disgrace on the memory of him whom he had succeeded.

Menou, who had been confirmed in the command by the French consul, having married a native, had assumed the name of Abdallah, and acted (as already intimated) in exact conformity to the customs of the country. He was alike unpopular both with the men and the generals; his conduct having given dissatisfaction to those who were his equals in military science. He displaced General Dumas without any reason; Dumas wrote to Menou, expressing his astonishment and ignorance of what cause he had given; and said he should wait for dispatches from government, unless he had charges for a court-martial; no answer was returned, and Menou refused to see him. Generals Regnier and Friant waited on Menou, to discourse on the business; the only cause he assigned was, there was an incompatibility in their dispositions; that he could not transact business with General Dumas, and protested on his honor that nothing personal influenced him. Regnier did not press the matter, as Menou very peremptorily offered to resign his command; he begged, however, he would come to an explanation with General Dumas, and either continue him in his station, or remove him to another command. Dumas, unwilling to create any controversy, retired from the situation of the chief of the staff, and took the command of the two provinces of Benisouef and Fayoum; the general orders announced his departure, and contained praises on his conduct.

Menou wished to form a party, but failed; and, finding that the major part of the army was discontented with him, in hopes of obtaining popularity, he made six new generals of brigade, and filled up the vacancies in the army. Many officers, wishing to remain in their old corps, refused the promotion, but they were forced to take their new rank. In this, political finesse was his motive; for though those he advanced deserved it for their services, yet he thought, by bestowing favors, to remove enmity. He employed spies and tale-bearers on all occasions, in order to acquire the reputation of an able general, though he had never distinguished himself as a warrior.

The finances of an army like the French, distant from their own country, with no passage over-land, and that by sea exposed to certain dangers, were of great importance; money should have been husbanded as precious; but this Menou neglected to do, and another source of difficulty flowed on the army.

When Kleber was assassinated, part of the contribution in money, and the whole of that in merchandize, were unpaid. Menou, however, collected them, with some of the usual territorial imposts. The troops were ordered to be paid regularly, without deduction, and most of the arrears discharged; several causes raised the expenses to seventeen or eighteen hundred thousand francs per month, though all was said to be meant to reduce the expenses of Kleber's administration, which never exceeded thirteen or fourteen hundred thousand francs; another instance of the hostility of Menou towards the memory of Kleber.

Large receipts from the new duties were announced in general orders, yet, in three months the funds were expended, and money was soon required. The Copts were ordered to furnish a forced loan, and were promised a mortgage on the contributions in arrear; that security would have produced more had it been put in effect. New wants succeeded; a second loan was furnished by the Copts; perhaps it was prudent to make them give up some of their plunder; but Kleber looked on them as a reserve for times of difficulty, and got what he wanted from them during the siege of Cairo.

The revenue of Egypt might amount to 2,100,000 francs per annum; but the collecting of them relied on the tranquillity of the country; any thing that might compel the troops to concentrate, would suspend the receipts; for, throughout the east, it requires a military force to collect the contributions. Economy was an essential point, in order, that if the revenue suddenly failed, enough might be found for the army; but nothing could check General Menou, nor deter him from augmenting the expenditure; he persuaded himself that want could never disturb the country.

Such was the state of the French army, and the character of its chief; and the great inducement which the English ministry had to send so small an army into Egypt, was from the information which they gained in intercepted letters from that country, whereby it appeared that the French were in a deplorable condition, without resources, and almost without a leader; dissensions in the army, and no cordiality among the generals: their numbers thinned by disease, and the survivors dispirited by a long seclusion from Europe.

The conduct of Menou in several instances gave universal discontent; the inhabitants complained that a Mussulman general, from whom they had expected so much, made them regret the loss of a Christian general. Under the Turks and Mamelukes they had borne all caprices; but experience taught them the mildness of European manners. In short, the popular odium had arrived to such a pitch, that many of the generals proposed to bring him to a trial; others thought General Regnier should take the command, satisfied that Menou was unfit; and a more moderate party wished to remonstrate and advise with him. Menou listened to them with a variety of emotions, and made many promises of alterations.

The grand vizier was at Jaffa since he retreated from Heliopolis, with 10 or 12,000 horse and foot. Some English engineers had repaired the fortifications at this place, and the breach at El-Arisch. He received reinforcements, but the desertions more than counterbalanced them, and the plague greatly reduced his numbers; no supplies could be got from the villages, and he was forced to import the subsistence of his army from Europe, subject to great disadvantages. Having obtained only a little money from Constantinople, he attempted to raise the value of the coin, but the army revolted, and he pacified them with great difficulty. He demanded aid of the English; part of the British army appeared off Jaffa; however, as the plague made ravages among the vizier's troops, they would not land, but sailed for Rhodes.

The vizier received from Constantinople the plan of the campaign, and orders to act in unison with the English generals. General Koehler, some few officers of the line, and about forty privates, were employed in putting the vizier's troops into discipline.

Menou was acquainted with these hostile dispositions by means of spies; yet he thought the vizier only would attempt a descent on Egypt, and that the English would fix themselves at Rhodes, and be ready to share in the partition of the Ottoman Empire, by getting the Archipelago. Two French frigates, which came to Alexandria, and brought some troops and some supplies, gave more certain information of the enemy's designs against Egypt; and also announced the sending more considerable succours. The Turks were unwilling to enter vigorously into active measures, the threats of the Emperor Paul having had great weight with them. Paul seemed resolved to over-run the Ottoman Empire; and the Turks dreaded the sight of a Russian army. The grand vizier had also to withstand the intrigues of the capoutan bashaw, the steady friend of the French, whose interest was high in the Seraglio.

The vizier thought the best thing he could do would be to make a peace with Menou, in order to ensure the evacuation of Egypt; this had already been nearly finished by the treaty of El-Arisch, which the English broke. A way, however, was open to renew this negotiation with Menou, without exciting the suspicion of the English. Kleber had encouraged Mourad Bey to correspond with Ibrahim Bey, in order to get at the plans of the allies. This was the vizier's channel, and he requested Mourad to offer himself as a mediator between the Turks and French; Mourad hated the Turks, but policy made him keep on good terms with all parties. This proposal to Mourad Bey was just at the time he usually sent the tribute for his provinces to Cairo, and he gave the papers to Osman Bey Bardici. This last laid before Menou a statement of the English forces, and a plan of the ensuing campaign. The English army, he insisted, was 18,000 men; they were to make a landing, while the vizier crossed the desert, and the English fleet, with troops from India, might arrive at Suez.

Menou, instead of accepting the offered assistance of Mourad Bey, and trying by dissensions to weaken the English and Turks, behaved towards Osman Bey with great abruptness, and seemed rather to look on him as a spy than the ambassador of a mediatorial power. He said he wanted no aid from any person, and observed, that Mourad Bey would do well to remain quiet in the provinces ceded to him. Osman remained to take back dispatches from General Menou. When the news arrived that the English fleet appeared in Aboukir road, he repeated Mourad's offers to assist the French with all his power; but he only got evasive answers, and was ordered to quit Cairo.

The plague shewed itself in Cairo and many of the adjoining villages, and it also broke out in Upper Egypt. There had been a great scarcity of corn since the death of Kleber, and the arrival of two ships from France at Alexandria gave a great deal of pleasure; La Regenerée brought some men and ammunition, and La Lodi news of Gantheaume's squadron, with reinforcements.

The expulsion of the French from Egypt having been determined on by the British cabinet, this bold exploit was reserved for troops who had been for some months chiefly employed in coasting along the shores of Spain and the borders of the Mediterranean in quest of adventures, thus distracting the enemy and concealing their grand object.

All minds were now anxiously directed towards Egypt. It was a novel and interesting spectacle, to contemplate the two most powerful European nations contending in Africa for the possession of Asia. Not only to England and France, but the whole civilized world, the issue of this contest was of the utmost importance. With respect to England, the difficulties to be surmounted were proportioned to the magnitude of the object. The vizier, with his usual irresolution, yet debating on the propriety of co-operation; while the capoutan bashaw, who was at Constantinople with part of his fleet, inclined to treat with the enemy. The English taking the unpopular side, that of the government, still less was to be hoped from the countenance and support of the people, whom the French had long flattered with the idea of freedom and independence. It remained also to justify the breach of faith, so speciously attributed to this nation, in the treaty of El-Arisch. These were serious obstacles to the progress of the expedition to Egypt; but they were not the only impediments. This expedition had to contend with an army, habituated to the country, respected, at least, if not beloved, by the inhabitants, and flushed with reputation and success; an army, inured to danger, aware of the importance of Egypt to their government, determined to defend the possession of it; and encouraged in this determination, no less by the assurance of speedily receiving effectual succours, than by the promise of reward, and the love of glory.

The French force in Egypt at this time, distributed in different posts, garrisons, and, we may add, hospitals, amounted to about 30,000. The number of their allies, consisting of Copts, Greeks, Arabs, Mamalukes, and the corps of camp-followers, or adventurers from France, was computed at 15,000.

The English fleet, ships of war of various kinds, boats, and transports, were assembled, in November 1800, at Malta. The command of the land-forces, declined by General Stuart, devolved on Sir Ralph Abercromby. It was determined that the fleet should sail from this place, in two divisions, for the Bay of Macri, in Caramania, on the southern coast of Asia-Minor.

The cause of repairing to one more rendezvous before they took their final departure for the sandy shores of Egypt, was to make certain preparations which could not so well be done at Malta, and also in the expectation of being there joined by a Turkish fleet, and receiving other assistance from the Porte. The stay of the English army at Malta proved an unexpected source of wealth to the island, and the Maltese had reason to remember the generosity and good conduct of the troops. The first battalion of the 27th regiment, and three companies of the second, were unfortunately left behind, in consequence of their very sickly state: they were to follow as soon as possible.

A corps of Maltese pioneers was embodied to accompany the army, and to be attached to the staff corps. Major-general Pigott was left to command at Malta, with Major-general Villettes, and Brigadier-general Moncrief under him; and Captain Ball of the royal navy, to act as civil governor, no one having then been appointed to the island.

The celebrated Tallien, unable to elude the vigilance of the English cruisers, was taken on his passage from Egypt to France, and brought into Malta. He was accompanied by a number of other French officers, having been dispatched with a note to the consular government, descriptive of Menou's conduct, which the army in Egypt drew up, as they were fully persuaded that this general had obtained a confirmation of his command by misrepresenting their situation in his dispatches. Tallien and his associates were brought to London, where they remained for a few days, and then, being liberated on their parole, they returned to Paris.

After a voyage of nine days, the first division of the fleet, commanded by Lord Keith, and with Sir Ralph Abercromby on board, came to an anchor in the harbour of Marmorice, on the coast of Caramania. Three days after, January 1, the second division of the fleet arrived, which completed the whole of the English ships of war and transports employed in this expedition.

Marmorice Bay, which must be represented as a most beautiful spot, would require the glowing language of landscape description to do it justice. It is a magnificent bason of water (though the entrance into it is narrow) sufficiently capacious to contain 5 or 600 ships of the line, and surrounded by lofty mountains, rising one above the other, like an amphitheatre, most of them thickly covered with trees, composing the richest variety of shades, and reaching down to the very edge of the water, into which some of them actually dip their pendant branches. In other parts of the surrounding scenery, huge masses of rock, broken and rugged, with scarcely a sign of vegetation on them, project into the water, varying the scene and adding considerably to its wild sublimity. From the place of anchorage, such is the land-locked state of the harbour, the entrance to it is not perceptible.

The town of Marmorice stands at the bottom of the bay: the houses being of a greyish stone, and partly built upon a rock of the same colour, jetting into the sea, it is difficult to distinguish the town from the adjoining hills. Indeed, it consists only of a few miserable hovels, heaped together without any regularity, (which portray the wretchedness of the inhabitants, who are for the most part Greeks,) and the remains of an old castle, with two or three unserviceable guns, mounted on its walls. In this castle, most of the women, on the arrival of the English, were locked up; but when the people found that they came with amicable intentions, they were soon liberated.

At the extremity of the town stands a neat mosque with a lofty minaret, from which the Iman, with a loud voice, calls the followers of Mahomet to prayers, no bells being allowed in the Turkish dominions. Near this mosque is a plentiful spring, where the Turks, previous to their entering it, perform their ablutions.

Several regiments being indisposed, from a long confinement on board ship and constant living on salt provisions, the commander-in-chief ordered all the sick men to be sent on shore, and there encamped. Every possible advantage was derived from this salutary measure, and malady thereby happily prevented. Change of diet also contributed much to this desirable end. Ships were sent to Macri, Rhodes, and the neighbouring places for cattle, vegetables, &c.; and fresh bread was occasionally issued to the army.

It is customary, in the navy, to victual the soldiers at only three quarters allowance, this quantity being deemed sufficient for men who work little, and who are only a short time at sea. The present case, however, was different, the soldiers, who were on board troop-ships weakly manned, being obliged to do as much work as the sailors, and detained on board for months together. Sir Ralph Abercromby, fully aware of this, represented the business to Admiral Lord Keith, who immediately placed the soldier on the same footing with the sailor in this instance.

Upwards of 300 horses had been purchased by order of Lord Elgin, the British ambassador at Constantinople; but they were so small, as well as so galled in their backs, that the greater part of them, if not all, was either shot or sold. Such was their condition, that some were disposed of at the low price of a dollar. It was, indeed, generally believed, that this disappointment was owing to the knavery of the people employed in conveying these animals, and that they had been changed on the road. The officers were the only mounted men at this time in the regiments. The best horses, however, were soon procured, by the parties sent into the country to purchase them. They were not more than fourteen hands high, but were spirited and handsome stallions.

During the time that the fleet remained in Marmorice Bay, the boats were exercised in their stations in a line, and practised in all the manœuvres necessary for landing troops. The coopers of the ships were also employed in making small casks, containing from eight to ten gallons, for the convenience of carrying water with the troops on horseback, and small scuttle barrels, capable of holding about an hundred weight of boiled meat, to be transported in the same way. Canteens were also prepared to hold two quarts, as well as buckets for the purpose of drawing water from the wells that might hereafter be dug in the sands of Egypt. The navy carpenters were also engaged in making sledges for drawing water or provisions over the sand, with hand-barrows, wooden pumps, &c. A part of the army had been alternately encamped on shore, and were employed in fatigue parties, cutting wood, and other preparatory exercises. An hospital was erected, and the sick conveyed from the ships to receive the advantages it afforded. The Maltese corps, of about 500 pioneers, were sent round in the Dolphin to Karacatch, and employed there in cutting wood and loading transports with fuel for the use of the army in Egypt. In short, no attention was omitted that superior knowledge and the most active zeal could suggest for the advantage of every person and every thing connected with this important expedition.

During the time the fleet and army remained in Marmorice harbour, the following were the general orders at large, issued by Sir Ralph Abercromby, preparatory to the great enterprise entrusted to him:—

“Until further orders, the brigade, commanded by Brigadier-general Finch, is posted in order of battle on the right of the second line.

BOOK V.

CHAP. IV.

1801.

"The situation of the brigades in line is from right to left, as follows:

First line, brigade of guards,
Major-general Coote,
Major-general Craddock,
Major-general Earl of Cavan.

The second line,
Brigadier-general Finch,
Brigadier-general Stuart,
Brigadier-general Doyle.

"The regiments and corps of each brigade, and of the reserve, unless when, under peculiar circumstances, Major-general Moore may think it necessary to alter the arrangement of the latter, are posted according to seniority, from flank to centre.

"As nearly as circumstances will admit, the disembarkation of the army will take place in the following order:

1st. "The infantry of the reserve, with ten pieces of light artillery.

2d. "The brigade of guards.

3d. "The remainder of the first line, with the additional pieces of light artillery.

4th. "The infantry of the second line.

5th. "The mounted detachment of cavalry of the reserve, and of Brigadier-general Finch's brigade.

6th. "The dismounted part of the same brigade.

7th. "Pioneers of the army, the horse department of the artillery, and such additional pieces of ordnance and ammunition as may be wanted.

"When the troops are ordered to land, the men are to get into the flat-bottomed boats as expeditiously as possible, but without hurry or disorder: they are then to sit down in the boats; and, in rowing to the shore, the strictest silence is to be observed. The troops are positively ordered not to load till formed on the beach. The formation is to be effected as soon as possible, the men to fall in a line opposite to where they land; nor is any individual or body of men, on conceiving themselves displaced, to attempt to regain the situation by closing to either flank, till ordered so to do by the general officer on whom they depend, or the senior officer present on the spot.

"The troops are to land with sixty rounds of ammunition, and two spare flints per man: the ammunition which cannot be contained in the pouches, is to be carefully put up in the packs. Three days bread, and three days pork, ready cooked, is to be carried by officers and men; the same quantity of rum is to be landed with the troops: it is not, however, to be delivered out, but carried in cags, and put in charge of the quartermaster of each regiment, with a party sufficient for the purpose.

"Each man will carry his canteen full of water, and the men will carry their entrenching tools, and the proportion of necessaries specified in the orders of the 15th of August, viz. two shirts, one pair of shoes, and two pair of socks, neatly made up in their packs or knapsacks, with their camp-kettles and blankets. Regiments having both blankets and great coats, will leave the latter on board.

"It is necessary that the officers should bring on shore, in the first instance, such articles only as they can carry themselves. Officers' servants are, on all occasions of service, to be present under arms with the corps to which they belong, and not to carry more than any other soldier: they are to mount all piquets and guards with their masters.

"The smallest number of batmen possible will be admitted; mounted officers alone are entitled to them. Music, drummers, and men, that are best for active service, to be selected for all regimental duties, not purely military; and officers commanding corps will be held strictly responsible for their being at all times, and in every situation, in the most effective state.

"A proportion of the general hospital staff must be attached, in the first instance, to each brigade, and will be allowed such orderlies as are absolutely necessary, from the brigades. Regimental surgeons are to be allowed an orderly man each, to carry their field chest of instruments.

"The spare arms, tents, horses, appointments of dismounted cavalry, and every article of spare baggage, to be left in charge of a careful non-commissioned officer on board of each ship.

"After the troops have landed, the sick of such regiments as are embarked in transports are to be collected in one of the vessels occupied by the corps under the care of an assistant-surgeon, who will, as soon as possible, report himself the state of the men in his charge to the inspector-general of hospitals on board his majesty's ship the Niger. In case of there being but one medical officer present, with any regiment thus situated, his duty must be assisted by a careful non-commissioned officer. The regiments embarked in ships of war will leave their sick men under the care of the surgeon of the ship, who will be entitled to the allowance established in such a case. If necessary, a small portion of orderly men may be left with the sick, selected from the convalescent men. Regiments that have women will employ them in their place.

"The women are particularly prohibited from disembarking, on any pretence whatever, until the commanding officer of the corps has obtained the commander-in-chief's express permission for that purpose.

"More detailed instructions, relative to the artillery, engineers, and commissaries, will be communicated to the respective officers at the head of each of those departments.

" In the first instance, the troops will not have it in their power to bring forward their tents; but the ground on which the army, or any considerable detachment of it may encamp, must be taken up regularly, the usual guards and piquets mounted, and patrols sent out in different directions. Every officer occupying a post will esteem it his first duty to patrol in the neighbourhood, in order to ascertain the nature of the country, the avenues that lead to it, and the means of strengthening it.

" All horses, mules, or camels, taken or found, are to be sent off as soon as possible to the commissary-general for the public service. Nor is any individual to purchase or appropriate any horse, mule, or camel, until permission for that purpose is given.

" The commander-in-chief has had much satisfaction in observing the behaviour of the troops, in their transactions with the inhabitants, during the stay of the army at Marmorice, and he trusts that their continuation of the same regular conduct will merit that approbation which he will at all times be anxious to bestow upon them. Every instance of an opposite conduct will be punished in the most exemplary manner. It will be the duty of officers of every rank to point out to the soldiers what they will expose themselves to by the neglect of discipline and good conduct.

" The manners, customs, and religious opinions of the inhabitants are to be most religiously respected, and the severest punishment will await those who give just cause of offence in those particulars.

" Straggling from camp, or lagging behind on the march, are to be strictly prohibited, and officers are enjoined to prevent it. Plundering and marauding will expose the offenders to suffer immediate death; and officers are strictly enjoined to employ every means, and use all the precaution in their power, for the preservation of the health of the troops under their command.

" The utmost vigilance will be expected from officers in situations of active duty, whether upon the out-posts, or more immediately with the army. Reports to head-quarters, or to the general officers on whom they depend, must be made with as little delay as possible, but without precipitation, and, if possible, not till the subject has been thoroughly examined.

" The circumstances under which it is probable the army will be called on to act, require that the exertion of every individual should be made to concur to enforce the most exact discipline, as well as the most rigid economy in the consumption of provisions, fuel and water, and to diminish, as much as possible, the labour of the soldiers.

" With these important objects before them, so important and so essential to the success of the expedition, the commander-in-chief is confident that officers will not repine at any temporary inconvenience they may feel, or regret any privations they may undergo; but will, on the contrary, animate, by their example, the soldiers under their command to a similar conduct.

" On the arrival of the army, however, on the ground where it is to encamp, the general officers commanding brigades will be responsible that the regimental quarter and rear-guard are immediately mounted; and that patrols are instantly sent out in the neighbourhood of their respective encampments, to ascertain the nature of the ground; and that the non-commissioned officers and men are warned for public duty, are paraded, and ready to march to their respective posts as soon as possible. They will themselves patrol in the neighbourhood of the ground they occupy, and make a report thereupon to head-quarters.

" Besides such advanced posts as it may be found necessary to place in order to cover the army, piquets will occasionally be formed from each brigade for the security of the camp; and it will be the duty of the general officers commanding each brigade to post them. They will be commanded by the field-officers of the brigade on duty for the day. In general they will be drawn in an hour after sun-rise: the hour, however, at which they will be withdrawn must be general, as the whole army will be ordered from head-quarters.

" In-lying piquets will occasionally be ordered to mount; and when the duty is done by regiments, the in-lying piquets will turn out in case of alarm, at the head of their own encampments, unless otherwise notified. If it should be necessary to do the duty promiscuously, the officers and men of the in-lying piquets will remain in their own lines, and an alarm-post will be assigned for the piquets of each brigade, at which they will assemble. If it should be necessary to mount both out-lying and in-lying piquets, an additional field-officer per brigade will be on duty daily, unless otherwise directed in general orders.

" There will be on duty daily a general officer of the day, a field-officer per brigade, a captain, and a subaltern, per regiment, and orderly subaltern per brigade, and at head-quarters an orderly adjutant and quarter-master per brigade. Mounted orderlies will only be permitted for the general officers of the day, or for such officers of the general staff of the army as may be hereafter necessary.

" In regiments furnishing the orderly adjutant and quarter-master, a subaltern of the day, or an officer named for that purpose, in regimental orders, may be directed to do their duty with the corps.

" On all duties of fatigue, the utmost attention.

of officers will be required to maintain regularity, and carry on the service with dispatch. As circumstances may require, the fatigue parties will be commanded by a field-officer, or brigaded under different officers of that rank. When fatigue parties relieve one another in the performance of the same piece of service, such as bringing forward provisions, guns, and stores, the relieving party is to be stationed in such a manner, that the least possible delay may be occasioned. It will be a general rule that men going on a detachment, whether with arms or on duties of fatigue, will carry their provisions ready cooked.

"When parties are ordered to march immediately, the field-officer of the day will, as soon as possible, report them to the general officer of the day. The majors of brigade and orderly adjutants will inspect all parties for duty. They who are unfit, from whatever cause, to go on duty, will be sent back to their regiments, and others immediately sent in their place. In general, the field-officers of the day will inspect all parties, with or without arms, that may be ordered, before they march off.

"The field-officers of the day will go frequent rounds within the camp of his brigade, both by day and by night; and will, in his report to the general officer of the day, specify the different hours at which he visited the different posts.

"In case of out-lying piquets being ordered for the security of the camp, under the field-officer of the day, the additional field-officer on duty will remain in camp to command the in-lying piquets. The general officer of the day will visit, at such times as he shall think fit, the different guards or piquets posted for the security of the camp, and will be responsible that the duty is done correctly.

"The general officers will encamp with their brigades, or have quarters immediately in their rear.

"When the army is stationary, the relief of all the common duties will be at sun-set. It will be a constant regulation, that all troops on actual duty with arms, whether at the advanced posts or with the army, comprehending the in-lying piquets, as well as the troops warned as next for duty, shall, unless otherwise ordered, be under arms an hour before sun-rise. The advanced posts of the army, distinct from such piquets as may be occasionally mounted for the security of the camp, will be put under charge of an officer named for that purpose, to whom instructions, relating to them, and suited to circumstances, will be communicated.

"In general orders, however, it is directed that all such posts shall connect themselves by patrols from each other, and avoid leaving any space unexplored, or suffer any breach in the chain. Their advanced sentries will, in general, be doubled. If attacked, or apprehensive of attack, they must acquaint the posts on each flank, and the nearest post of the army in the rear: if forced to retire, they will, on no account, omit to acquaint the posts nearest them on either flank, and will always fall back on the army: no advanced post is to detach to either flank, in order to support another, unless ordered by a general officer so to do.

"These regulations not only apply to permanent posts in the front of the army, but also to such out-lying piquets as may be posted for the more immediate security of the camp.

"The general and field-officers on duty must make themselves masters of the nearest and best communications between the army and advanced posts, in order to be able to give immediate support when necessary. Every report made from the advanced posts to head-quarters, is to be forwarded with the greatest dispatch; and any officer who should occasion delay will be called to the strictest account.

"Deserters from the enemy that may come in at any of the posts of the army, are to be forwarded immediately to head-quarters, where they will be taken charge of by the provost-marshal or his guard till examined.

"Flags of truce will be universally stopped at the advanced post until reported to head-quarters, and orders are received respecting them. As soon as the disembarkation of the army is effected, a boat will be found near the shore, with spare ammunition, which will be distinguished by an ordnance flag, from which supplies can be procured when necessary.

"Admiral Lord Keith having signified to Sir Ralph Abercromby, that a battalion of marines, under the command of Lieutenant-colonel Smith, is to be landed to serve with the army, it will be attached to the third brigade, and to take post in the order of battle, between the 50th and 79th regiments.

"As the soldiers' canteens have been out of use for some time, it will be necessary to take the precaution to have them filled with water for some days previous to the disembarkation of the army; and commanding officers of regiments are desired to give directions respecting it. When the army lands, only one day's allowance of spirits will be issued to the troops, and will be carried in rear of the regiments."

Inferiority of the British Army to the French.—Their total Ignorance of the Interior of Egypt.—Sudden Loss of Major M'Kerras, one of the Engineers.—Order of Sailing from Marmorice Bay.—The English effect a Landing.—Action of the 13th of March.—Surrender of Aboukir Castle.—Battle of Aboukir, and Defeat of the INVINCIBLES.—Capture of the INVINCIBLE Standard.—Death and Character of Sir Ralph Abercromby.—Arrival of a Body of Turks.—Capture of Rosetta and Rhamanieh.—The British Army receive his Majesty's Thanks.—Defeat of the French by the Turks.—Surrender of Cairo.—Failure of the Expedition under Admiral Gantheaume.—Surrender of Alexandria.

THE British army consisted of 15,330 men, including 999 sick and 500 Maltese: the effective force did not exceed 12,000. Among these not a single officer was acquainted with the interior of the country about to be subjugated, nor was there even a map which could be depended upon. Sir Sidney Smith, as far as he had seen, certainly gave correct information; but he had never been in the interior. So little did Sir Ralph Abercromby know of the strength of those he was getting ready to attack, that he rated them, at the highest, at 10,000 French and 5,000 auxiliaries; and this was beyond the number on which the expedition was originally formed. To complete this state of uncertainty, Major M'Kerras, one of the engineers, who had been dispatched in the Penelope to reconnoitre the coast, was killed; and Major Fletcher, of the same corps, and the crew who were also in the boat, were made prisoners.

This unexpected news did not reach the British army till a week after their embarkation, and their regret was considerably increased, on reflecting how seriously the loss of Major M'Kerras must be felt by the expedition. He had been ashore on the peninsula of Aboukir a few days previous to the arrival of the English, to compare and rectify some plans of it; and was returning to the Peterel sloop of war, when his boat was chased by a French germe, and an unlucky shot struck him in the forehead. Endued with a great share of professional talent, active, enterprising, and ever indefatigable in the prosecution of the public service, his death was no less a misfortune to the army, than a calamity to his friends.

Since the fleet had been in a state of preparation for sailing, the winds had been altogether unfavorable till the 23d of February, when, with a fine gale at N.N.W. the whole fleet got out without the least confusion or accident, and, at sun-set, made sail towards the coast of Egypt.

ORDER OF SAILING.

The squadrons to be one mile asunder.

During the passage the Greek and Turkish vessels separated from the squadron, amidst a hard gale, in which one laden with mules had foundered; and as the cavalry and artillery horses were embarked on board of them, this circumstance was productive of considerable disappointment. After a boisterous passage of six days, the Arabs' tower was descried; and in the course of the next morning the convoy arrived in Aboukir Bay, a scene endeared to the English by the battle of the Nile, and now bursting afresh upon their recollection, in consequence of having anchored in the very spot where that memorable action had been fought.

As it was impossible to make all the necessary preparations for landing in the course of that day, this was deferred until the succeeding one, when a heavy gale occurred and continued for some time. As soon as the wind had abated, (March 7), General Abercromby proceeded in a boat to examine the shore; Sir Sidney Smith also seized this opportunity of reconnoitering the neighbouring lake, and being actuated by the spirit of adventure, he went on shore, and returned soon after with a French colonel, an ass, and an Arab Fellah, its driver, to the no small amusement of the sailors and soldiers of the fleet, who considered these captives as the first-fruits of victory.

The wind being moderate, and the weather fine, at two o'clock in the morning of the 8th of March, a rocket was fired from the Foudroyant, commanded by Admiral Lord Keith, which was the signal for all the boats to repair to the appointed ships. About half-past three, the boats being filled with troops, began to move off towards the rendezvous. At dawn they had got about half-way to the shore, and began to form their line of landing out of gun-shot, agreeable to the following order:

The 40th flank companies on the right;
The 23d regiment on their left;
The 28th, 42d, and 58th regiments, with
The brigade of guards, and

The first division was under the command of Major-general Moore, the Hon. Major-general Ludlow, and Major-general Coote. Three armed vessels were stationed in a line opposite the shore, and out of gun-shot, round which the boats were to form, and wait the order for pushing to the land. Each flat-bottomed boat contained about fifty men, exclusive of the sailors employed in rowing. The soldiers were ordered to sit down on the bottom, holding their fire-locks between their knees. All the boats of the fleet were engaged, either in towing the flats, or carrying troops.

They contained in the whole near 5000 men. Six thousand had been intended for landing, but above 1000 remained in the ships from the want of means to convey them.

The moment was awful: along a space of six miles to the shore, nothing was to be heard but the deep murmur of thousands of oars dipping in the sea, and incessantly urging the flower of a brave army to the severest destiny of man.

The line of the English boats reached the rendezvous about day-light, where, after making the necessary military preparations, which were not completed till eight o'clock, they remained for some time in the midst of the bay, menacing every part of the coast, for such was the extent of anchorage occupied by the fleet, and so great the distance of many of them from any one given point, that it was not till nine o'clock that the signal could be made for the boats to advance. Under the direction of the honorable Captain Cochrane, of the Ajax, protected by the necessary vessels, and attended by those under Sir Sidney Smith, who had the charge of the launches and field-artillery, the whole division moved towards the shore. It was ten o'clock before the troops arrived at the point of disembarkation, which was narrow, and a sand-hill, that commanded the whole, seemed nearly inaccessible.

The French, fully prepared for their reception, permitted them to advance till they were within reach of their numerous batteries, with which they had occupied, at distances, a space of nearly three miles; when they opened so tremendous a discharge of grape-shot, and shells of all dimensions, as threatened the English with immediate destruction. The boats had a long way to row, and were, for some time, under the fire of fifteen pieces of artillery, and the musketry of 2,500 men. Undaunted by this dreadful prospect, with the fire of the castle flanking their right, they made good their landing, overcoming the impetuosity of the French, who poured down in torrents to the beach, and even attacked the English in their boats, breaking the charge of a body of cavalry. The English regiments went up to the mouth of the cannon, seized them, and drove the French artillerymen from their batteries with the bayonet. Emulous of the glory of this arduous day, the seamen, harnessing themselves to the field-artillery, with ropes drew it on shore, in defiance of the batteries, to which they replied only by loud and triumphant shouts.

The 23d regiment and the four flank companies of the 40th ascended the great sand-hill, to which all the fortifications of the enemy appeared to refer, with a coolness and intrepidity that, for some moments, paralyzed opposition, and reflected immortal honor on their commander, Colonel Spencer. These troops, having gained the summit, took seven pieces of artillery, and pursued the enemy down the back of the hill. The centre hill carried, all the support of the enemy's flanks was cut off, and the English were playing upon their rear. There were not more than 2000 of the English landed when the enemy began to yield. The French employed about 4000 infantry and 600 cavalry in this engagement. Victory was the reward of resolution, intrepidity, and ardor. The English took possession of the height, their advanced post being about four miles from Aboukir, while the French retreated towards Alexandria.

The fort of Aboukir was summoned to surrender; but on its refusal, a party was left to reduce it.

In this engagement 4 officers, 4 serjeants, 24 rank and file were killed; 26 officers, 34 serjeants, 5 drummers, and 450 rank and file wounded; 1 officer, 1 serjeant, 1 drummer, and 32 rank and file missing.

The return of killed and wounded in the disembarkation was 22 seamen killed, 7 officers, and 65 seamen wounded, and 3 missing.

The ordnance taken consisted of one twenty-six pounder, three four-pounders, and one six-inch howitzer; brass. One nine-pounder, one six-pounder, one ammunition-waggon, and a small quantity of shells, shot, and musket ammunition.

The following general orders were issued on the next day (March 9,) by the commander-in-chief, to demonstrate the high sense he entertained of the conduct and service of every department of the army and navy.

"The gallant behaviour of the troops in the action of yesterday claims, from the commander-in-chief, the warmest praise that he can bestow; and it is with particular satisfaction that he observed their conduct marked equally for ardent bravery and by coolness, regularity, and order.

"Major-generals Coote, Ludlow, and Moore, and Brigadier-general Oakes, who led the troops that effected the landing, and were engaged, will be pleased to accept Sir Ralph Abercromby's thanks for the able manner in which they conducted the whole operation.

"The commander-in-chief has much pleasure in acknowledging the effectual assistance received from the navy on this occasion, in consequence of the judicious arrangements directed by Admiral Lord Keith; and it is his intention to request his lordship to communicate the same to Captain Cochrane, of the Ajax, who superintended the disembarkation, as well as the officers and men employed under him on that service, and officers and men in the gun-boats and armed launches that covered the landings. Sir Sidney Smith, the captains, officers, and men from the ships of war who acted with the army on shore, will be pleased to accept Sir Ralph Abercromby's thanks, for the activity with which they brought forward the field-artillery, and for the intrepidity and zeal with

About nine in the forenoon of March 10, the line got under arms and marched against an outpost of the enemy, at the distance of three miles, which took three hours to reach in consequence of the depth of sand. On the approach of the English the enemy fled, leaving behind one twelve-pounder, which they spiked, dismounted, and threw over the works: they also destroyed a large quantity of biscuit and barley. The remainder of the troops were landed this day, and provision, ammunition, guns, and stores of every description, were brought up with the greatest facility in boats.

A flag of truce was again sent to the garrison of Aboukir, but the commander of that place would not suffer the officer who bore it to approach, and even ordered a gun to be discharged at him.

While the English were engaged in landing their stores and provisions, the French commander, Menou, took this opportunity of reinforcing the garrison, so that when the English came within sight of the enemy on the evening of the 12th, they found them strongly posted among sand-hills and palm-trees, four miles from the walls of the ancient Alexandria eastward. The English were deficient in artillery, and their cavalry was badly mounted.

At seven in the morning, March 13, the army marched in two lines by the left, with an intention to turn the right flank of the enemy; and the troops had proceeded but a short distance towards their object, when the whole cavalry of the French, and a considerable body of infantry, and several pieces of cannon, poured down from the heights to attack the heads of both lines, which were commanded by Major-general Craddock and Major-general Lord Cavan. This attack, which was very impetuous, was repulsed by the advanced guard, consisting of the 90th and 92d regiments, with incomparable gallantry and coolness. The first line then formed two lines to the front of march, with the utmost quickness and precision, and continued to advance in that manner; while the second line, with the exception of its first brigade, continuing still in column, turned the right of the French army and drove it from its position. Thus the British forces continued to advance on the enemy, driving them with the utmost vigour from position to position, till they had reached the fortified heights which form the principal defence of Alexandria. They were, however, regular in their retreat, and continued the engagement throughout the day.

It was the intention of the commander-in-chief to have attacked them on the heights, where they had posted themselves; and for that purpose the reserve, under the command of Major-general Moore, which had remained in column during the whole day, was brought forward; and the second line, under the command of Major-general Hutchinson, marched to the left, over a part of the Lake Mariotis, with a view to attack the enemy on both flanks; but, on a more attentive examination of their position, it was believed to be commanded by the guns of the forts, and consequently it was more than probable that it could not be kept. Sir Ralph Abercromby, therefore, employed a very wise discretion in seeing that those troops, who had just demonstrated such admirable courage, and were willing to continue it to whatever point the superior command might direct them, should not be exposed to a certain loss, for an uncertain advantage. They were accordingly withdrawn; and, in the evening the army took up the ground from which the enemy had been driven, occupying a position with their right to the sea, and their left to the canal of Alexandria and Lake Mariotis, at the distance of about a league from that town; a situation of great advantage, as it cut off the communication between Alexandria, except by way of the desert.

The French general in this action had his horse shot under him, and Sir Ralph Abercromby was, for a moment, in danger of being enveloped by the French cavalry; but was saved by the intrepidity of the 90th regiment, who rushed forward to receive the charge of the cavalry on their bayonets; but the impetuosity of the latter was not equal to the reception that menaced them, and they desisted, though with considerable loss, from the rash manœuvre.

The loss of the English in this action was very considerable, 1300 men being killed and wounded. The situation of the wounded was peculiarly distressing, for, as they chiefly suffered by common shot, even such as recovered were necessarily rendered cripples and wholly unfit for service. The loss of the French may justly be calculated at 700 men. General of division Lanusse was slightly wounded. The English took four pieces of cannon and one howitzer.

The force of the English in the field was about 14,000; that of the enemy nearly 7000. Although so much superior in point of numbers, the British army laboured under great disadvantages from their deficiency in cavalry and artillery; in both of which the French had the decided superiority.

The sentiments of Sir Ralph Abercromby, respecting the conduct of the troops under his command, were expressed in the general orders, dated March 14, at the camp near Alexandria.

"The commander-in-chief has the greatest satisfaction in thanking the troops for their soldier-like and intrepid conduct in the action of yesterday. He feels it particularly incumbent on him to express his most perfect satisfaction at the steady and gallant behaviour of Major-general Craddock's brigade; and he desires that Major-general Craddock will assure them, that their meritorious conduct commands his admiration. To the 90th and 92d regiment and Dillon's, an equal share of praise is due; and when it has been well earned, the commander-in-chief has the greatest pleasure in bestowing it."

Soon after this victory the Arabs came to the English with various kinds of provision; as sheep, goats, fowls, eggs, and, in short, every thing that the country afforded. They had been treated with an unrelenting barbarity during the period in which the French had possessed the sway of Egypt; and were now happy to engage in a friendly intercourse with the people who had given so fair a promise of terminating the tyranny which oppressed them. For the more speedy arrival of these Arabs, their ready undertaking to supply the army with cattle, horses, and other provisions, as well as the fidelity with which they fulfilled all their engagements, and the regulations which governed the market, the army was indebted to the activity and local knowledge of Mr. Baldwin, so well known for his long and useful residence, as his majesty's consul-general, in this part of the world.

The English with their right to the sea, near the Bochan camp, and their left to the canal of Alexandria, at this time dry, opposite the point of lake Maadie, were assiduously employed in getting their heavy cannon on shore, and fortifying their camp. They however severely felt the want of horses and camels to assist in bringing up the heavy guns; even the provisions were brought on men's shoulders from the magazine, a mile and a half distant, and the heavy casks of liquor required great labour to roll them through the sands. Through the intelligent activity of Sir Sidney Smith they had discovered plenty of water, and were liberally supplied with provisions, notwithstanding a market was forbidden under pain of death, by General Menou.

Till this time the army had no covering but their great coats; but new tents were brought up, which sheltered them from the night air, which sometimes was extremely cold.

Leaving a strong guard on the heights of Nicopolis, to impose on the English, the French employed themselves in repairing the works of Alexandria; dispatching also a vessel to acquaint the consular government with what had happened, and to inform Gantheaume of the position of the English fleet.

On the 17th a flag of truce came in from the enemy, with the information that Colonel Bryce, of the guards, had died in consequence of the wounds which he had received in the night of the 14th.

A part of the garrison of fort Aboukir made a sortie against the works that had been thrown up against it. The marine officer and 50 men who manned them were not able to resist the assault; and, if the 2d, or Queen's regiment, had not fortunately arrived at this critical moment, the French, instead of being powerfully repulsed, would have possessed themselves of the English battery.

On the 18th, after five days blockade, Aboukir Castle surrendered to the British troops, in which were twelve French guns, a considerable quantity of ammunition, and the garrison, amounting to 190 men, were made prisoners of war. The officers and men composing it were sent on board the English fleet with the private property of each individual, a liberality of conduct which doubtless would not have been adopted by the enemy, had the circumstances of the business been reversed. The Turkish Capoutan Bey having arrived about this time, the English and Turkish colours were both displayed on the forts.

On the 19th, General Menou having made some advances, the supply of provisions totally failed; by some of his patrol having killed several Arabs bringing sheep for the market. On the 20th, a column of French infantry and cavalry were seen passing the ground near Lake Mareotis into Alexandria. An Arab chief also informed Sir Sydney Smith, by letter, of Menou's approach with a large force, and of his intention to attack the British camp the next morning. On this night the position of the army was strengthened by a battery, not closed in the rear, a little to the left in front, and near the ruins of Pompey's palace. The guards had also a redoubt in front of their right, and a battery on their left, called the citadel, having the signal-staff hoisted upon it. On the left of the whole line there was also a redoubt, which, in its whole extent, contained two twenty-four pounders and thirty-four field-pieces.

The battle of Aboukir, which took place March 21, crowned the British arms with success, and at once finished the labors, and immortalized the fame of the gallant commander-in-chief. The particulars of this battle are thus related by a respectable and distinguished officer, who was in the action:

"On the memorable 21st of March, the army, as usual, was under arms at three o'clock in the morning: all was quiet till half-past three, when the report of a musket was heard at the extremity of the left; instantly afterwards a cannon fired, scattered musketry followed, and then two more guns. All were now convinced that a united attack was commencing; and General Moore, who was officer of the night, on the first alarm proceeded to the left; but was so impressed with the idea that it was too far distant, that he turned back to the right. A solemn stillness then succeeded, but it was only of a short duration; every ear was all attention, and every eye directed towards the eastern sky, when, on a sudden, loud acclamations were heard on the right, to which a roar of musketry instantly succeeded, and the enemy's attack in that quarter was now no longer doubtful. The enemy advanced upon, and continued to push in, all the videts and piquets upon the main body, but Colonel Houston of the 58th, faintly perceiving a French column advancing upon him, and dreading lest the English piquets should be between them and his men, suffered it to come so near him, that he could plainly see the enemy's glazed hats before he ordered his grenadiers to fire. Their discharge was followed by that of the whole regiment, and being rapidly repeated, made the French retire to a hollow some distance in their rear. Soon after they wheeled to the right, and attempted to pass a redoubt opposite to its left, in conjunction with another column, but the 28th regiment seeing them approach the battery, with a heavy fire checked those who attempted to storm the redoubt where they were stationed. But now the main body of the two columns joined a third, and forced in behind the redoubt, while others were to attack it in front; when Colonel Crowdjye commanding the left of the 58th, wheeled back two companies, and, after firing two or three rounds, ordered a charge with the bayonet, and being at this instant joined by the 23d, while the 42d were also advancing, the French troops that had entered the rear of the redoubt, after sustaining a very severe loss, were obliged to surrender. Here both the 58th and 28th had been attacked in front, flank, and rear. It is allowed, that the 28th experienced a momentary relief from the advance of the 42d, but, during the time they were engaged, the first line of the enemy's cavalry, passing the left of the redoubt, attacked, and, charging in a mass, for a while overwhelmed that gallant corps, but which, though broken, was not defeated. In fact, such was the dilemma in which they were placed during this contest, that Colonel Spencer, with a part of the 40th, having taken a station in the avenues of the ruins, was, for some moments, afraid to fire lest they should destroy the 42d, then intermingled with the enemy. But even when he began to fire, which in some measure checked the progress of the French cavalry, he must certainly have been overpowered, if General Stuart had not advanced with the foreign brigade, pouring in such a heavy and well-directed fire; which, as nothing could withstand, the enemy, from destruction and flight, was no longer visible.

"In this furious charge of cavalry, General Abercromby received his mortal wound. He was alone, near the redoubts just spoken of, when some French dragoons penetrating to the spot, he was thrown from his horse. From the tassel of his sword, the man that rode at him, and endeavoured to cut him down, must have been an officer. This sword, however, the veteran general seized, and wrested from him before he could effect his destruction; and, at the same instant, this daring assailant was bayoneted by a private of the 42d. Sir Ralph only complained of a contusion in his breast, supposed to have been given in the scuffle, by the hilt of the sword, but was entirely ignorant of the moment he received the wound in the thigh, which occasioned his death. After this wound Sir Sidney Smith was the first officer that came to the general, and from him received that sword which the latter had so gloriously acquired from the French officer. The cause of this present was the general's observation, that Sir Sidney's sword had been broken.

"As soon as the French cavalry were driven out of the camp, Sir Ralph walked to a redoubt, where he could take a view of the whole field of battle. Then to the right it appeared, the reserve of the French cavalry had attempted another charge against the foreign brigade, without success. After this their infantry, one battalion excepted, no longer acting in a body, fired only in scattered parties. As the ammunition of the British was exhausted, several of the regiments of the reserve not only remained some time without firing a shot, but even the guns in the battery had but one cartridge left. But while this was the state of affairs on the right, it was found the centre had been attacked. At day-break, a body of French grenadiers had advanced upon it, supported by a heavy line of infantry. The guards were posted there, and at first threw out their flankers to oppose the enemy; but these being driven in, and, as the enemy's columns had approached very close, General Ludlow ordering the brigade to fire, they did so with the utmost precision; and, after some little local manœuvring, the advance of General Coote with his brigade determined the enemy to retire, and separate themselves as sharp-shooters; and thus, while the French cannon played without intermission, the former kept up a very destructive fire: consequently the left of the British was never engaged any farther than being exposed to a distant cannonade, and a partial discharge of musketry.

"During the interval the British were without ammunition, the French on the right, advancing close to the redoubt, were pelted with stones by the 28th; and returning the same measures of offence, they killed a serjeant of that regiment, by beating in his forehead. But as these troops, as well as the British, were without ammunition, they were very easily driven away by the grenadiers, who moved out after them; and, soon after, the whole of the enemy's force moved off the ground. Thus, unable to make the impression expected upon the British lines, General Menou made a retreat in very good order, but this was principally owing to the want of ammunition among the British; otherwise the batteries, as well as the cannon on the left and the king's cutters on the right must have done great execution.

"About ten in the forenoon the action had every where terminated, while Sir Ralph Abercromby never quitted the battery he retired to; and as he continued walking about, many officers had no suspicion of his being wounded, but from the blood trickling down his clothes. At length getting faint, he was put on a hammock, and conveyed to a boat, which carried him on board Lord Keith's ship, being accompanied by his friend Sir Thomas Dwyer.

"The battle was fought by the right of the English army alone. The French army was 9,700 strong, including 1,500 cavalry, with 46 pieces of cannon. The whole British army, reduced by the actions on the 8th and 13th, by the men left in care of the wounded, the absence of the 92d regiment, the marines and dismounted dragoons, did not yield an effective force of 10,000 men, including 300 cavalry; yet it must be remembered that it was only the half of this number that contested with the whole united force of the enemy. The field of battle in front of the British works being very contracted, the killed and wounded presented a distressing spectacle. Near 1,700 French and 400 horses were found on the field. On the part of the British there were 60 officers and 233 men killed; and 16 officers and 1,190 men wounded.

"Though this battle neither decided the fate of Egypt nor gained any ground, yet it answered many important purposes, principally that of securing the position to our army, and the impression it made on the Bedouin Arabs of the British valour: in consequence of which a communication was opened with the interior of the country, and the market supplied with every commodity. For thousands of these people came to be eye-witnesses of the contest, and declared it to be such a one as their fathers never recorded.

"On the 28th of March brave Gen. Abercromby breathed his last. His death was first made known to the army the next morning. For his cure he had undergone the most painful operations with great firmness; but as the ball could not be extracted, a mortification ensued. This eminent man had also served his country in a legislative capacity. In the year 1774 he was elected to represent the county of Kinross in parliament, and continued a member of the house of commons until the next annual election in 1780. His chief talents however were of the martial kind. In his military character he was strictly uniform and regular, preserving the best order and discipline possible throughout all ranks of those under his command. In action he possessed that intrepidity, coolness, and presence of mind requisite; and characteristic of the British nation. In his private character he was modest and unassuming; in all his transactions disinterested and upright, and in his morals circumspect, and unstained by licentious vices. In company he was naturally reserved, and in promiscuous or mixed society extremely silent; yet perfectly easy of access, and free from haughtiness. In his domestic relations he was unimpeachable, and fulfilled the several duties of a son, brother, husband, father, and friend, with that rectitude inseparable to a character of his magnanimity."

Sir Ralph Abercromby died of a wound in the hip, near the thigh, and not in the breast, as mentioned in his epitaph: he was in the 68th year of his age. During the early part of the engagement, when in the darkness of night, unable to distinguish friend from foe, he was involved among the enemy, he was rescued from immediate destruction, only by the affectionate valour of his own troops. To the first of these who came up to him, he said, "Soldier, if you know me, don't name me!" At that instant, a French dragoon suspecting the prize he had lost, rode up to the general, in the midst of his own guard, made a cut at him, but, not being quite near enough, merely penetrated to his shirt, grazing the skin with the point of his sabre. The dragoon's horse wheeling about, he made a second attempt by a lunge, that passed the general's side and right arm, which he instantly closed. The dragoon being at this instant shot, the sabre remained in the general's possession, who presented it to Sir S. Smith, as before observed. When General Menou was about to order a second charge of cavalry, he was apprised by the officers of the impropriety, and that they would be totally destroyed, without being able to render any essential service. The French general, however, rashly persevered, when General Roize and the chief officers under him soon felt the fatal effects of the error which they were compelled to commit, although they exhibited the talents of brave men, furious with desperation, at being thus wantonly sacrificed. General Roize was killed, and his cavalry totally routed, broken, and destroyed. Bonaparte's invincible legion were finally defeated, with prodigious slaughter, and the invincible standard taken from them. The signal honor of taking this standard had been claimed and disputed by several corps, but of the various statements that have been made, the greatest credit is undoubtedly due to the testimony of Sir Robert Wilson, who has reconciled the seeming contradictions, and faithfully detailed the capture, loss, and recapture of the invincible standard. Sir Robert Wilson declared it was first taken by Serjeant Sinclair, who being ordered forward by an officer, gave it to a private who was killed, and the standard consequently fell into the hands of the enemy: but the honor of retaking it justly belonged to Antoine Lutz, a native of Rosheim, in Alsace. The regiment of Stuart, or the Queen's German regiment, in which this gallant soldier served as a private, pursuing the enemy's infantry, Lutz, being one of the foremost, came within a few yards of the French officer who bore this standard, and who was consequently in the rear of his regiment. Lutz levelled his musket at this officer, and shot him in the back. He immediately fell forward on his face, and the colours dropped from his left shoulder to the ground. Lutz, after taking the prudent precaution to re-load his piece, seized the colours, and was in the act of carrying them back to his regiment as his lawful prize, when two French dragoons galloped towards him. On their near approach he threw down his standard, and fired, when he killed one of their horses, and the rider's foot being entangled in the stirrup, Lutz rushed upon him, when the dragoon begged his life, and gave up his pistol as a token of submission. The other dragoon fled.—Lutz took up the colours again; and making the dragoon march before him, conveyed them both in safety to the regiment; the colours he presented to Lieutenant Moncrieff, who gave him all the money he happened to have about him and sent him off with them to the head-quarters, where he received, from the adjutant-general, by order of the commander-in-chief, twenty dollars, as a reward for his conduct. This was the substance of Lutz's account, which contained many other particulars.

This splendid trophy was soon brought to England, and hung up in the metropolitan church of the United Kingdoms, as a grateful offering to that God who giveth the victory.

The command of the British army now devolved upon General Hutchinson, who had served under General Sir Ralph Abercromby, by whom he was warmly beloved, and highly esteemed, and who lamented the death of his illustrious predecessor in genuine strains of friendship.

A flag of truce was sent to Alexandria, March 23, with an offer to the French army, that if they would surrender they should be immediately sent to France with their small-arms, colours, and private property; leaving the artillery and shipping then at Alexandria. To this proposal the French general haughtily replied, "that the French army could not listen to such ignoble terms, and that any future propositions of a similar nature would not even be received." At the same time the British commander-in-chief was desired to accept the sincere acknowledgments which he so well merited, for the very humane care and attention which had been manifested to the wounded officers and soldiers of the French army, whom the fortune of war had submitted to his power."

The French line, passing in front of the British, extended from the Rosetta gate of the ancient city along the Aboukir road, to the Alexandrian canal, then over a bridge to the edge of Lake Mareotis; and turning to their right along the edge of the lake, encompassed the gardens on both sides of the canal, to the western environ of Alexandria. Separated from the enemy by a valley of about a mile, the British extended from the sea to where the canal formed an elbow, in a southern direction; they were in possession of lakes Aboukir and Maadie, with armed launches up to the left of their front, and along the northern bank of the canal. Both armies were sufficiently exhausted, to be desirous of a temporary repose. By the engagements of the 8th, 13th, and 21st of March, Egypt had in reality been delivered from the dominion of its tyrannical invaders.

On the 26th of March, Turkish vessels, and about 5,000 troops under the Capoutan Pacha, arrived in the road of Aboukir. These men were generally armed with Tower muskets, which were new, but out of order, and without bayonets. A few were armed with rifle-pieces. They were all very indifferently clothed, except about 150 of the marines.

These Turkish troops having taken post at Maison quarrée, joined a detachment under Col. Spencer, which, encamping at Etko, on the 7th, reached Rosetta on the 8th of April. After a spirited but inadequate resistance, fort Julian and Rosetta surrendered on the 19th. The garrison of the former had been twice summoned, but terms of capitulation were peremptorily refused; it consisted of 11 officers, 264 men, 16 guns of different calibres, 2 mortars, and 2 howitzers. The reduction of Rosetta facilitated the procuring of supplies, as well as the operations of the army. Had the enemy concentrated their force at this place, superior as they were in cavalry, the contest might have terminated very differently. But the divisions of the French army were at their height; and so little was Menou acquainted with the designs and movements of his antagonist, that the death of General Abercromby was unknown to him till the 8th of April, when he was informed of that event by a deserter. He had then but recently reinforced Rahmaniah, Rosetta, and Lesbeh. El Aft, indeed, was more firmly secured by the junction of Generals Le Grange, Morand, and Valentin, who, with 3,900 men, had ably entrenched themselves in that position. The English had, April 13, cut the dyke which separates Lake Maadie from that of Mareotis, but the waters did not spread with the expected rapidity. They, however, possessed a good flotilla on the Nile; and were encouraged by a reinforcement of 2,900 men, which landed at Aboukir on the 5th of May.

Seven thousand English, and 6,000 Turks, supported by a flotilla, having advanced against El Aft, the batteries on the right bank of the Nile were so much harassed by the English flotilla, that they abandoned this post on the 7th of May, and, leaving a sufficient garrison at Alexandria, fell back on Rahmanieh. By the possession of this post, and by means of their cavalry, they hoped to keep the greatest part of the Delta in their power, preserve their communication with Cairo, and be ready, in case that Gantheaume's squadron should arrive at any point, to facilitate the debarkation of the troops which they expected, and which, of course, would not attempt to gain the port of Alexandria. By this time Lord Keith, reinforced by part of the squadron under Sir J. Borlase Warren, and also by the Capoutan Pacha with four ships of the line, had, altogether, seventeen sail of the line before Alexandria, and one in the bay of Aboukir. Sir Sidney Smith had proceeded up the Nile with a number of Albanians, and the English gun-boats. Some gun-boats of the French had been enabled to retreat, before them, to Cairo. The French at this time in Alexandria drew their subsistence from Rahmanieh, on the backs of camels, across the shallowest parts of the inundation.

In consequence of the movement of the French, General Hutchinson resolved also to move at the head of 4,000 troops; and instead of merely keeping his position before Alexandria, to commence a campaign in the field, by an attack on Rahmanieh, which he made on the 9th. Between the 9th and 10th of May, the enemy retreated to Cairo; and the greater part of their flotilla, prevented from escaping by the batteries on the right of the Nile, became the property of the victors. The loss of Rahmanieh is said to have deeply affected the French. By this event Alexandria was insulated; and the end for which Rahmanieh had been occupied by Menou, the command of the Delta, and the landing of the troops under Gantheaume, appeared no longer attainable. The murmurs of the army only augmented the jealousy of the commander-in-chief, who, dreading a mutiny in favor of a new general, sent Regnier on board a ship bound for France, where he found Damas, Daure, and Boyer, companions of his fortune, because, like himself, supposed the enemies of Menou. About this time, a convoy of germs, coming from Cairo by Lake Menouf, ignorant of the retreat of General Legrange from Rahmanieh, fell into the possession of the English, with 150 prisoners, and several guns intended for the defence of Alexandria. The convoy was extremely valuable; consisting of clothing, wine, spirits, stores, and nearly 5000*l.* in money.

When the Mamelukes took possession of Cairo, after the battle of Heliopolis, they rendered a most essential service to the vizier, by recalling the French from the pursuit of his flying forces, and employing them in the reduction of that city. His army being thus preserved from absolute dispersion, was permitted to recruit at Jaffa. But here it immoveably remained; the vizier having resolved not to move a step to the assistance of the English, till, in fact, they had conquered for themselves. It was not, therefore, until informed of the brilliant success of his allies, and aided by their artillery and officers, that he was induced to march, at the head of 25,000 men, with whom he reached Belbeis on the 7th of May, and immediately threw up entrenchments. Numbers, who waited only to ascertain whether this army would pass the desert unmolested, convinced of their security, now flocked to his standard. The French forces at Cairo, under General Belliard, being about this time strengthened by the junctions of General Legrange, from Rahmanieh, it was resolved to defeat the vizier before the arrival of the Anglo-Turkish army, commanded by General Hutchinson. Nearly 5,000 infantry, and 900 cavalry, chiefly from Rahmanieh, were selected for the execution of this design. Had the French been permitted to make an attack on such a rabble as the Turkish army, which they would have done, and probably in the night, their defeat would have been certain. Major Holloway, Major Hope, of the artillery, and other English officers present, therefore, persuaded the vizier to anticipate an attack by making one.

On the 15th of May, his highness, the grand vizier, received intelligence that the enemy were in full march from Cairo, on the road towards Belbeis. The vizier, after it was dark, ordered Tahir-Bashaw, with 3,000 cavalry, and three light field-pieces, to advance to meet them; and, if a favorable opportunity should offer, during the obscurity of the night, to attack; but, if not, to impede their march as much as possible. About ten o'clock at night they met, three leagues from the Ottoman camp, when each halted, and lay on their arms during the night, and until eight o'clock in the morning, at which time Tahir-Bashaw commenced an attack. He was soon after reinforced by 1,500 cavalry. It was now found that the enemy had come forward with about 14 pieces of artillery, 600 cavalry, and 4,000 infantry. The vizier, therefore, ordered Mahomed-Bashaw to move forward with 5,000 men, cavalry and Albanian infantry, and nine light field-pieces. The French had 8-pounders in the field. The other English officers, besides Major Holloway and Major Hope, were Captain Lacey, of the royal engineers, and Captain Leake, of the royal artillery. Captain Lacey accompanied Mahomed-Bashaw, and Captain Leake Tahir-Bashaw. Each of these officers received their orders from Major Holloway, remaining still near the person of the vizier; who, after sending forward his advanced guard, came up himself and took the command. Major Hope was with the artillery.

The enemy moved into a wood of date-trees, where they were attacked by the Turkish cavalry and infantry with great spirit for three hours, when, retiring from the wood, they took a position on the left, their left flanked by a wood, and forming a hollow square on the right. The Albanese infantry advanced to the edge of the wood, and, in this situation, galled them much; and, on the Turks threatening their right, the French changed their position, and attempted to gain the heights, in which they were prevented by a rapid movement of Turkish cavalry, who gained the summit. In this manœuvre they were annoyed by two guns, which were advanced on the occasion. At this time, the French commenced a decided retreat, and were driven beyond El-Hanka, a distance not less than seven miles from the place of the first operations. The grand vizier, who had commanded his troops, as Major Holloway reported, with great gallantry and prompt decision, then gave orders for them not to pursue them any farther. The loss on either side, for the time in which they were engaged, was small. The Turks had about thirty killed, and eighty wounded. The French had about fifty killed. The number of their wounded could not be ascertained, as they carried them off the field. The disposition of the Turkish army, the order of march, and all their movements, were arranged by Major Holloway. It was by following his counsels, that the grand vizier was enabled, during near seven hours, to keep in check the French army, to counteract its plans, to attack it, to seize every advantage of position and ground, and, at last, after manœuvring with science for so long a time, to repulse it with loss, and gain a complete victory.

While this passed on the side of Cairo, fort Lesbeh surrendered to a detachment from the vizier's army.—These successes reanimated the drooping energy of the vizier, and taught him to confide in the spirit and genius of his allies. On the same day, a detachment from the troops, under General Hutchinson, surprised a convoy, conducted by Colonel Cavalier, who had been foraging for the garrison of Alexandria. Six hundred men, (infantry, cavalry, and artillery,) the prime of the enemy, together with a considerable portion of their dromedary corps, one 4-pounder, and 550 camels, were on this occasion surrendered. From the 9th to the 20th, the English had taken near 1,600 prisoners, including those taken at fort Bourlos, which followed the evacuation of fort Lesbeh. It was about this period, that Osman-Bey-Tambourgi, the successor of Mourad, assured General Hutchinson, as the versatile Mourad himself had also done on his part, of his attachment to the English, whom he joined with 1,500 Mamelukes. While, from political motives, Osman and others encamped near the English, they privately, according to the usual policy and perfidy of barbarians, assured the French that they would commit no hostility against them, and they kept their word! Mourad-Bey died on the 21st of April, after an illness of three days, but not without strong suspicions of his having been poisoned. The situation of affairs not permitting the interment of his remains in the sepulchre of the Mamelukes, he was buried at Savuagni, near Tahta; his companion in arms breaking his weapons over his tomb, and declaring that no one was now worthy to wield them!

On the capture of Rahmanieh, Gen. Hutchinson proceeded to invest Cairo. Owing, however, to the low state of the river, the bar at Rosetta, and the consequent difficulty of bringing the heavy artillery up the river, as well as procuring provisions, General Hutchinson did not arrive at Embabeh, before Ghazah, till the 20th of June. He resolved to attack Ghazah on the left, while the vizier pressed Cairo on the right bank of the Nile; and a bridge of boats was thrown over the river at Chobra, to keep up a communication between the armies. The fortifications of Cairo, which were commenced by Kleber, had been assiduously continued by Menou; but, extending over a space of twelve miles, they did not admit much defence with a garrison of 8,000, who had, besides, to overawe the inhabitants, agitated at the proximity of a victorious army, and dreading the resentment of the vizier.

On the 21st, the combined forces advanced on both sides of the river. A capitulation was desired by the garrison on the 22d, which, being assented to, was negotiated by Brigadier-general Hope, and ratified on the 27th. The French could not have effected a retreat: as little were they competent to the defence of Cairo, their ammunition nearly exhausted, their treasury empty, and provisioned only to the middle of July. By this capitulation, they were to be conveyed to the French ports, in the Mediterranean, with their arms, artillery, baggage, and effects, within fifty days from the date of the ratification; men of letters and naturalists were permitted to retain their papers and collections; an exoneration was granted to such of the people as had adhered to the cause of France; and it was stipulated, that Menou might avail himself of these conditions, for the surrender of Alexandria, provided his acceptance of them was notified to the general commanding before Alexandria, within ten days from the date of the communication being made to him. It was also stipulated, in a private article of this convention, that the wife, daughter, aid-de-camp, and all the effects of General Menou, should be sent from Cairo to Alexandria by the allied powers. There were embarked, in all, from Cairo, at Aboukir, upwards of 13,000 persons, exclusive of 1,000 sick, and a number of invalids. During a novel and critical march, in conducting this garrison through the country, notwithstanding the mixture of Turks, British, and French, considerable harmony prevailed.

The articles were not published to the British army till a copy, printed by General Belliard, was got from Cairo. The 30th regiment took possession of a fort, and the grenadiers and some of the body guards of the Capoutan Pacha the gate of Ghazah.

At this moment, when such an important and commanding acquisition was obtained by the British arms, when the possession of the capital of Egypt had added to the achievements of British prowess, the commander-in-chief received his majesty's orders to communicate his royal thanks to the army for their conduct and services in Egypt; and they immediately appeared in the general orders, which were issued July 14, 1801.

"Lieutenant-general Hutchinson has received his majesty's orders, dated Horse-guards, May 16, to return the generals, officers, and soldiers of the army, his thanks for the brilliant services that they have rendered to their country, and for the manner in which they have sustained and increased the honor of the British name, and the glory of the British arms.

"You landed in Egypt to attack an enemy your superior in numbers, provided with a formidable body of cavalry and artillery, accustomed to the climate, flushed with former victory, and animated by a consciousness of hard and well-earned renown.

"Notwithstanding these advantages, you have constantly seen a warlike and a veteran enemy fly before you; and you are now in possession of their capital. Such are the effects of good order, discipline, and obedience, without which courage itself must be unavailing, and success can be but momentary.

"Such are the incitements which ought to induce you to persevere in a contest that has led you to victory, acquired you the applause of your sovereign, the thanks of parliament, and the gratitude of your country.

"To such authorities it would be superfluous for me to add my testimony: but he assured that your services and conduct have made the deepest impression on my heart, and never can be eradicated from my memory.

"During the course of this arduous undertaking, you have suffered some privations, which you have borne with the firmness of men and the spirit of soldiers. On such painful occasions no man has ever felt more forcibly than I have done; but you yourselves must know, that they are the natural consequences and effects of war, which no human prudence could obviate. Every exertion has been made to diminish their extent and duration: but they have now ceased, and, I hope, are never likely to return.

"Nothing now remains to terminate your glorious career, but the final expulsion of the French from Egypt; an event which your country anticipates; and a service which, to such troops as you, can neither be doubtful or difficult."

The French evacuated Cairo in the night of the 10th of July, and sent notice to Colonel Stuart. An arrangement had been made previously, that when Cairo was taken possession of, part of the Pacha's body-guard should enter also; but, as the evacuation was not known till very late at night, the quarter-master-general directed the 39th to march and occupy the citadel. The Capoutan Pacha, when he knew this, could scarcely be appeased, though every circumstance was explained to him.

The French totally evacuated Ghazah on the 15th; and with the allied army began their march for Rosetta. Gen. Hutchinson remained at Cairo, both from indisposition, and a wish to settle the government of Egypt.

Menou received the news of the surrender of Cairo with great vexation; he was anxious that General Belliard should have held out, as the reinforcements expected by Admiral Ganteaume might have made a great change in affairs; the negotiations for peace he knew, too, were commenced; and when the Nile rose, the siege could not be carried on.

Scarcely was the capitulation of Cairo signed, when an army, under General Baird, appeared on the banks of the Nile, from India. A part of that force had arrived from the bay of Bengal, September 14, 1800, at Trincomalé, in the isle of Ceylon, where it staid two months, and where it was augmented by a number of troops that had been sent down there from Bombay. The fleet leaving Ceylon on the 18th of February, 1801, steered along the coast of Malabar, still ignorant of their destination, till they arrived, March 23, at Bombay. The health of the troops much impaired, was soon restored by the vegetables of that place. Here General Baird took the command of the little army, which, after a passage of twenty weeks from Trincomalé, arrived at Cossir in Egypt. The troops that landed, under Colonel Murray, at Suez, was an advanced division of the Bombay detachment. The navigation of the Red Sea was arduous, difficult, and dangerous; from rocks and shoals, and contrary winds blowing sometimes directly from the quarter of their destination. Two of their transports were lost, and many others damaged. After staying a short time at Cossir, they crossed the desert of Thebes, with many difficulties, in ten days, and arrived at Gennat, on the banks of the Nile, about 400 miles from Grand Cairo. The route of the army from Cossir was through a defile of 150 miles, between hills and barren rocks. In this desert not a particle of herbage was to be seen, and scarcely any kind of vegetation, until they arrived at the banks of the Nile, which was first descried at Reneh. This long and toilsome march they could not have performed without the friendly aid of the Mamelukes and Arabs.

The joy which the soldiers expressed, at the sight of water, is not to be described: though the vehemence of their thirst was thereby increased, and also their impatience to allay it. The army marched along the river from Gennat to Kingé, from whence they fell down in boats to Cairo. This, though the distance was above 300 miles, was effected, through the rapidity of the stream, in nine days. The French, as the English army advanced, evacuated their posts on the river, and retreated to their head-quarters. The whole of the Indian army now assembled, under General Baird, opposite Grand Cairo, consisted of 5000 British, and 2000 sepoys. After halting here for some weeks, they were marched down the country, and encamped before Rosetta, twenty-five miles from Alexandria. It was extremely mortifying to this brave army from the east, that, after tasting so deeply of the toils and hardships of war, fortune did not permit them to participate on this occasion in its glories.

General Menou, far from appearing to approve of the article in the capitulation at Cairo, agreeably to which he might have surrendered on the terms acceded to by General Belliard, increased the fortifications round Alexandria, particularly at Necropolis, and avowed, in his dispatches, the determination of burying himself under its ruins. To relieve the place of a number of useless mouths, about the middle of May, the members of the institute, and the commission of arts, though they had been formerly put in military requisition, were ordered to depart for France. They embarked in a small vessel; but, when they were quitting the port, the English refused to let them pass. Attempting to return, they were menaced with being sunk by the French! And it was not till after several days anxiously passed, during which they were supported by the English, that Menou could be prevailed on to take off his prohibition of their return. Nor did Menou yet despair of receiving the reinforcement intrusted to Gantheaume, who, after remaining two days within thirty leagues of Alexandria, was obliged to bear away on being discovered by the English fleet. It was therefore resolved by the allies to accelerate their attack. On the 17th of August, 2000 Albanians attempted a sand-hill commanding the sea-shore, to the left of Necropolis. A party of 200, under Colonel Spencer, took possession of a hill, in front of the enemy's right, between the lakes and the first bridge of Alexandria. General Menou, who was in that part of the French intrenched camp opposite the hill, sent about 600 men to drive Colonel Spencer from his position. They advanced in columns with fixed bayonets, and without firing a shot, till they got very close to the English. The colonel then gave immediate orders to charge. It was obeyed, and the enemy were driven back with great slaughter.

At sunrise on the 18th, the inundation having taken effect, Lake Mareotis was covered with vessels and boats, containing troops, which were protected by fifty gun-boats.

The troops commanded by Major-general Coote, being gallantly assisted by the Turkish corvettes under Captain Cochrane, as well as by a flotilla on the lake, commanded by Captain Stevenson, landed at the castle of Marabout, which soon became a heap of ruins, and capitulated on the 21st. In endeavouring to fire the English shipping, the French had consumed their own flotilla, and two of their frigates were sunk near the fort. Thus terminated the expedition under Gantheaume, on which Menou so much depended.

On the 22d, the allies entered the harbour of the old port, opening a severe cannonade on some troops posted on the bank of the ancient canal, in which they were supported by the flotilla on Lake Mareotis. A detachment under Major-general Coote took seven pieces of cannon, and made considerable impression on the French, who had fixed themselves to the right of fort Le Turcq, strengthened by reinforcements from Necropolis.

An aid-de-camp of General Menou having brought a letter on the 24th, addressed to General Hutchinson, which was the first communication Menou had permitted by land, it was generally believed he wished to surrender; it was, however, merely complimentary, for the attention shewn his wife; whom the Turks, when she fell into the hands of the English at the surrender of Cairo, would have beheaded for marrying a Frenchman had not General Hutchinson interposed his authority. The letter also requested his brother-in-law might be admitted into Alexandria, and some trunks belonging to his wife. This letter was looked on as a preliminary. The English army made various movements; the French fire was silenced, and finding that they had withdrawn their guns, the English batteries ceased to fire.

The first aid-de-camp of General Menou came in the evening of the 26th, with a letter to demand an armistice for three days, while he might prepare articles of capitulation; this was agreed to, and hostilities were to cease immediately; but the date of the armistice was only to commence from the time the French fired three unshotted guns, to be returned by three from the British, when the colours of both armies were to be lowered from the flag-staff; this was to take place at twelve next day.

General Menou's aid-de-camp on the 29th came in, but in place of the articles of capitulation, he brought a proposal to continue the armistice for thirty-six hours. General Hutchinson was much incensed at this, and wrote back that he should order hostilities to recommence at twelve at night. At nine, however, the aid-de-camp returned, and told him that proposals should be sent next day by two o'clock; this was accepted; the next day, at one o'clock, two officers arrived at the head-quarters with the articles of capitulation; many were refused, yet the purpose of surrendering was confirmed. The articles were returned at night; and agreed to as corrected by General Hutchinson. General Hope went into Alexandria next day to begin them. General Menou received him with great attention, and invited him to dinner. Lord Keith came on shore to ratify the terms. The same conditions were granted to Menou which were allowed to Belliard.

The French general, who had pompously declared his determination to bury himself in the ruins of Alexandria, declared he had been necessitated to this capitulation by the evacuation of Cairo; but Alexandria could not long have resisted this necessity independently of the evacuation, a fact known to General Hutchinson, and which probably induced him not to precipitate the fate of the enemy as he might have done, by more vigorous measures. The garrison was in great distress, and threatened by the near approaches of famine, having for a long time subsisted on horse-flesh.

The return of the garrison of Alexandria given in by General Menou, was in total of the military and civil departments, 11,213; with such a force it must be confessed, that Menou, entrenched within a fortified town, capitulated dishonorably as a military man; and the victory of the 21st must reflect constant honor on the British arms.

The articles of capitulation were in number 22. An attempt was made to include the acquisitions of the learned men among the articles of confiscation; but, on their resolutely declaring that they would burn their papers rather than resign them to the English, the contest was relinquished. A cargo, however, of Egyptian antiquities, which they could neither conceal, nor consume by fire, was brought to the British Museum. The inhabitants of Constantinople, considering the surrender of Alexandria as the termination of the war in Egypt, manifested on the occasion the most enthusiastic joy. The cannons of the serag-lio were fired; the city was splendidly illuminated; and the sultan ordered fifty gold medals to be struck, bearing a crescent and star in the centre, with a suitable inscription, to be distributed among the English officers in Egypt; to several of whom the grand vizier, in the name of his sovereign, had before made both honorable and valuable presents. A magnificent palace was built in Pera, and dedicated to be the residence, in all times to come, of the English ambassador at the Ottoman Porte.

During this arduous and interesting contest, the English lost twenty-four officers, and about 7 or 800 private men, including the naval as well as the military service. Very different was the fate of France: which, in this memorable expedition to the East, united not less than from 30 to 40,000 of their best troops, and almost annihilated her navy. Of the whole number of French sent to Egypt, in the course of three years, there returned 23,000. They were accompanied by several hundreds of the natives of both sexes.

The joy in England was universal at the successful termination of the war in Egypt, and all wished to pay some mark of respect to the brave men who had sustained the honor of the British name in so noble a manner. General Hutchinson was created a peer, and a pension of 2000*l.* a-year settled on him. Admiral Keith was also created a British peer. General Coote invested with the order of the Bath, and each regiment on that service allowed to carry a sphinx in their colors, and the word "Egypt" inscribed. The grand signior established an order of knighthood, which he named the "Order of the Crescent," which included the general officers of the English army and naval officers of equal rank. The remains of Sir Ralph Abercromby were carried to Malta, and there buried in one of the bastions of La Vallette. A tomb-stone of black marble, with an inscription in Latin, was placed on the spot of his interment. A peerage was granted to his widow, with a pension of 2000*l.* a-year.

General Hutchinson obtained leave, on account of his health, to return to England, and resigned his command to Lord Cavan, who remained in Egypt. Part of the English troops returned at the same time with Lord Hutchinson. The British force left in Egypt in October, was 5000 men, exclusive of the Indian army: forming, altogether, a body of 12,000 men.

From the commencement of the war in Egypt, the Porte had formed a secret resolution to change the government of that country, at the same time that both the grand vizier and Capoutan Bashaw held out to both the Beys and Mamelukes the most unequivocal assurances that their authority would be immediately restored on the destruction of the infidels.—On the expulsion of the French from Egypt, accordingly, seven of the Beys were invited to Alexandria, to hold a conference with the Capoutan Bashaw, on the subject of certain arrangements necessary to be made for their re-establishment. They were received, on their arrival, with every demonstration of hospitality and respect. On pretence of a wish that they might accompany him, in a visit of ceremony, to the British commander at Alexandria, but, in reality, with a view to send them to Constantinople, he treacherously engaged them to go on board a ship of war, whither he was, himself, to accompany them. However, after they had gone into the boats that were to carry them to the ship, they began to recollect the repeated advices and warnings that had been given them by General Hutchinson, never to trust themselves on board any Turkish vessels, and to apprehend some violence, after they should be lodged in the frigate. They required of the officers who had charge of them, to re-conduct them to the shore. The officers, pleading the orders of the high-admiral, refused to comply with their request. The Beys, grasping their arms, began to use force. A conflict ensued, in which four of the Beys were killed, and three wounded. Several of the boatmen shared the same fate. The grand vizier too, at the same time, attempted to secure as many of the Beys as he could by force, or fraud. Some fell into his hands: others made their escape into Upper Egypt.

General Hutchinson, apprised of all this, ordered his troops under arms, remonstrated severely with both the grand vizier and Capoutan Bashaw, and reclaimed, in a menacing tone, the wounded Beys, the bodies of the slain for honorable sepulture, and the Beys also who were in the power of the vizier. The Capoutan Bashaw imputed the disaster that had befallen the seven Beys, whom he had invited to his residence, to themselves: whose suspicions, he said, were without foundation; and excused his own conduct from the orders that had been sent, both to himself and the grand vizier, from the Porte: which was well assured, that it was never the intention of the court of London to take any part in the internal regulations, or government, of Egypt; but, after the expulsion of the French, to leave the Ottomans to establish there what form of government they should think proper. The Capoutan Bashaw maintained great pomp and splendor: such as he deemed suitable to the sovereign dignity of the Porte. He affected to treat General Hutchinson, in some sort, as the guest of the grand signior; in sending regularly a second course, consisting of all the delicacies that could be provided, to his table. Thus he artfully combined an air of hospitality with an air of superiority and supremacy in Egypt. There were not a few, who said, that the general should have declined to accept the hospitality of the Turkish high-admiral, assumed greater state himself, and, in a word, a tone of mastery and control, for a time, in a province recovered, almost solely, from the French, by the British arms. They were even of opinion, that it would have been a wise magnanimous policy to have punished the treachery of the bashaw, and avenged the death of the three Beys, by hanging him up at the yard-arm of the frigate on board of which he meant to decoy them. So great an act of justice would have struck the East with an admiration and awe of the British name, and exalted it above every other in the world.

There were, however, other considerations that weighed down the opposite scale in the balance. Had it been the purpose of the English government to retain possession of any post or posts in Egypt, such a measure might perhaps have been accounted not less eligible than daring. But it was not the design of Britain to do any thing that might offend, and alienate, but, on the contrary, to cultivate the favor of her Turkish ally.

General Hutchinson did not embrace a line of conduct that would probably have been condemned by his court as extravagant and imprudent: nor yet did he tamely and meanly acquiesce in a measure dictated by barbarian perfidy. But, steering a middle course, he demanded, with inflexible firmness, the freedom of the Beys, which was granted. There could not have been a fitter agent in this business than General Stewart, who, at the head of a strong detachment, carried the remonstrances and demands of the British commander-in-chief to the Capoutan Bashaw.

But the Beys, though left at their own disposal, foresaw the evacuation of Egypt by the English, and the establishment of the power of the Turks, at least in the lower regions of that country. Their faithful Mamelukes were either dispersed, or had fallen by the sword. They listened, therefore, to the fair promises that were made to them by the Capoutan Bashaw and grand vizier, and solemnly confirmed by their oaths on the Koran, of protection, favor, and preferment, if they would throw themselves into the arms of the sultan. They consented to relinquish their pretensions to any authority in Egypt; and signified this consent, in writing to the grand signior, and also to General Hutchinson. The Porte extended to Egypt the system of government by Bashaws.

Thus terminated the revolution occasioned by the French invasion of Egypt. In the midst of all the toils, dangers, and conflicts of war and insurrection, the French were assiduous in exploring that renowned land, under all the views of physical and moral science; and in making collections in antiquities and natural history.

Though they failed in the attempt to extend their political power, they enlarged the sphere of their knowledge; and they acquired information that might be of great use in the case of their ever engaging in another expedition, with or without the consent of the Porte, to Egypt. Bonaparte, the author and conductor of the expedition to Egypt, on a retrospect of its progress, vicissitudes, and termination, consoled the French nation with the reflection, that "the army of the East had left, in Egypt, an immortal memory, which would, perhaps, one day revive there the arts and institutions of society. And that history, at least, would not pass over in silence all that the French had done to introduce into that country the arts and improvements of Europe. BOOK V.

It is a remarkable circumstance, that, by the surrender of Alexandria, the French frigate, La Justice, fell into the hands of the English, and was by them ceded to the Turks. The capture of this completed the total annihilation of the fleet of Admiral Brueys. Of the four sail which escaped, under Admiral Gantheaume, on the morning of August 2, the Genereux, Guillaume Tell, and La Diane frigate, had already been captured at different periods by the English; La Justice had alone, till this period, escaped the defeat in Aboukir Bay. CHAPTER VI.

Great Object of Bonaparte in the War.—Menaces of invading England.—By whom such Invasion was first projected.—Policy of the Consul's Threats.—Inadequacy of his boasted Preparations.—Effects of the same on the British Nation.—Preparations for repelling the intended Invasion.—Vain-glorying of the Consular Government.—Martial Law proclaimed in Ireland.

WHILE the possession of Egypt was uncertain, the establishment of a French colony there was Bonaparte's chief design: it was the grand pivot on which the aggrandisement of France, and his own glory and fame were to turn. Around this favorite project, other collateral objects were arranged: To harass, distract, and exhaust the financial resources of England, by menaces of invasion, was, of itself, a wise measure of war: but it derived an additional interest and importance, in the eyes of the chief consul, as it might afford an opportunity, while the English fleets should be detained on their coasts, of slipping out a fleet, with succours to the French army in Egypt. While all was in movement on the side of the land, and camps were formed near the sea-coast, ships were equipped and victualled in the principal ports, and gun-boats, and other light vessels of war, were constructed and drawn, from time to time, to places of rendezvous on the British channel.

The plan of a descent on Britain in flat-bottomed boats, from Boulogne, was first proposed by the famous Lally, in 1744. It was for a moment adopted by the French ministry, but quickly abandoned, as impracticable. There had not arisen any circumstances in the British army, or in the character of the British nation, and certainly not in the navy, that presented greater facilities of invasion, in the course of the last fifty years, than could be hoped for at any former period. Nor was the first consul of France so devoid of prudence, or desperate in fortune, as to hazard so extravagant and frantic a project: At the same time, therefore, that the necessity of vigilance, and preparation for defence was allowed on all hands, the most reflecting and judicious part of the British nation were fully persuaded that no descent of any consequence would be attempted, unless it should be invited by too great carelessness or contempt of the enemy. The policy of Bonaparte was two-fold: to divide and distract, and to exhaust the resources of the British government; and, at the same time, to occupy and keep in exercise a very numerous army. This army he could not, in prudence or with safety, either to the republic, as it was still called, or to himself, permit to languish in absolute idleness, or to indulge the restless genius of Frenchmen, in listening to various schemes of endless innovation.

The state of the continent was still critical and unsettled. The indemnities of Germany were yet to be fixed; the clamours of discontented states, and the intrigues of cabinets to be overawed. It was natural, therefore, in these circumstances, that France should station her disposable troops along the frontier, in a sort of activity, and in the expectation of services, in order to prevent idleness, cabal, remissness, and desertion.

But, while it was ridiculously asserted, and as ridiculously believed by many, that France had, in the month of August, from 60 to 80,000 men assembled in the neighbourhood of Dunkirk, 30,000 near Calais and Boulogne, 30,000 in Flanders and Holland, and 60 or 70,000 more in the neighbourhood of Rochford and Brest, all her preparations were, in reality, but slight, and utterly inadequate to the object which she professed to have in contemplation. There was little danger of an attack from an enemy, whom even light ships of war every where insulted on their own coasts, who were every where attacked, and almost constantly with success, by British squadrons, and individual ships of inferior force, and the amount of whose progress towards invasion was little more than to smuggle a few gun-boats along their own coasts, when they had the good fortune to escape being captured in the main seas, by regaining the ports from whence they came. The vessels were frequently drawn along shore by horses.

After the battle of Maringo had led to a negotiation with Austria, and preliminaries of peace were signed on the part of that power, though afterwards disavowed by the Count St. Julien, a grand camp began to be formed at Amiens, in September, 1800. It was occupied by detachments from what was called the chosen army, commanded by General Murat, and was strengthened, from time to time, by additional numbers. A camp was also formed between Bruges and Ostend; another between Gravelines and Dunkirk; and a third at Boulogne: which was destined, as it was generally understood, to be the principal point from which the French, like the Romans, under Julius Caesar, were to pass over into Britain. These three camps, by the month of July, 1801, were occupied by a great number of troops, among whom were many emigrant Irishmen; as there also were in camps formed at Brest, St. Maloes, and on the coast of Normandy. The building of ships, and other preparations for an immense naval armament, were carried on with great activity, all along the Dutch and Flemish coasts, as well as those of France. Rumours were industriously circulated, and by almost all the French, and by many of the English, credited, that a corps of 25,000 men, all chosen troops, under the command of General Hedouville, conveyed by thirty French and Spanish ships of the line, and a proportionable number of frigates, would sail from Brest; that a second corps of 12,000 men, under the command of General Humbert, and escorted by five ships of the line, and a frigate, would sail from the harbours of Normandy; and a third corps, consisting of 20,000, under the convoy of one ship of the line, eight frigates, and a great number of smaller ships of war, from the harbours of Flanders and Piccardy. This is the most moderate computation of the force that was destined by the French government for the invasion of England, or of Ireland. Other statements raised it to twice that number of men. All was in motion, from the mouth of the Scheldt to the mouth of the Garonne. The islands of Jersey and Guernsey were threatened with immediate invasion from St. Maloes, Granville, and Cherbourg. Besides the armament at Brest, destined, as was supposed, to make a descent on the west of England, or, more probably, on Ireland, there was a fleet of eight or nine vessels, under the command of Admiral Gantheaume, ready to sail on some unknown expedition; and another, of five ships of the line, under Admiral La Touche. The combined fleets of France and Spain, that lay in the harbour of Brest, ready, according to every appearance, to sail, amounted, so early as January, to fifty-two sail of the line.

Bonaparte, in order to combine his preparations at land with his preparations by sea, and to restore and improve the navy, had lately divided the whole extent of the sea-coasts of France into six maritime prefectures; namely, those of Brest, Toulon, L'Orient, Rochford, Havre, and Antwerp. Not only ships, but gun-boats, and flat-bottomed boats, were equipped under the direction of the prefects, along the whole line of the coast. Redoubts were thrown up, and furnaces prepared for the heating of balls, in the places supposed to be most liable to attacks by the English. Telegraphs were erected for communication among the different prefectures, with one another, and with Paris. Proclamations were issued, from time to time, by the prefects, calculated to animate the courage and the hopes of the French seamen. If any little advantage was gained, by accident or by superiority of numbers, over any of the British ships, it was magnified into an important victory, and a signal instance of naval prowess. The British isles, and all the wealth of their commercial towns, were pointed out as the modern Carthage, whose spoils were to reward the enterprise and valour of the modern Romans.

The British government and nation beheld these hostile preparations and threats without dismay, though not without a degree of anxiety as well as indignation. From Caithness to the Land's End, all glowed with ardour to meet the enemy on the theatre of either land or sea. The French had acquired the greatest glory, throughout the whole course of the present war, by their martial achievements on the continent. Their title to fame and renown was just, and not to be disputed. Yet all their exploits were found insufficient to overcome the inveterate and salutary prejudice, that one Englishman is fully a match for two Frenchmen. Not only the soldiers, but many of the officers, and even some of the commanders of the militia regiments, professed a firm persuasion of that maxim; not at any popular meetings, but in their social and convivial parties with one another.

Orders were given, early in 1801, by the British ministry, to construct, as soon as possible, a number of gun-boats for the protection of the English coasts, particularly at the entrances into ports and the mouths of navigable rivers. Application was made, with success, by government, to the directors of the East-India company, for the use of such ships as were not taken up, for the commerce of India, for the current year, to be employed in different ways and for different purposes. The town of Liverpool solicited and obtained permission, from the legislature, to provide various means for their own defence: and this noble example was followed in other parts of the kingdom.

As the hostile preparations of the enemy increased, the activity of the British government, and the zeal of the people, were increased in proportion. In the end of July, a circular letter was issued from the office of the secretary of state for the home department, to the lord-lieutenants of counties; communicating intelligence which had been received, "That the naval and military preparations which had been for some time past carried on, in the ports and on the coasts of France and Holland, had of late been pursued to a great extent, and with increased activity; and that these preparations being apparently directed to the object of making an attack on some part of the United Kingdom, his majesty considered it as of the utmost importance, that the most effectual steps should be taken without loss of time, for employing, to the best advantage, that part of his military force, which the voluntary zeal and spirit of his subjects had placed in his hands, for the public security. The lords-lieutenant were requested by the secretary, in the name of his majesty, to signify to the commanders of the several corps of volunteer cavalry and infantry within their respective counties, his majesty's earnest wish that all corps of that description might be kept in a state of the utmost readiness for such immediate service as might be conformable to their respective engagements, and as the exigencies of affairs might require. And it was particularly recommended, that, under the present circumstances, the respective corps of volunteer cavalry and infantry should assemble, for the purpose of performing their military exercises, as frequently as their necessary avocations would admit."

This recommendation and request was obeyed, throughout every part of the united kingdom, with the utmost alacrity. Field-days and reviews were to be seen at every town, and almost in every parish. The whole country assumed a military air, and an attitude of defiance. The volunteers were ready either to march to any place where any body of the enemy should land or attempt a landing, or to take upon themselves the duty of the garrisons, if it should be thought necessary to withdraw the regulars. As it was understood that the Dutch fleet, under Admiral De Winter, was ready to put to sea, and that the flotilla at Dunkirk, reinforced from time to time by detachments of troops from Amiens and Calais, and other parts of the coast, was ready to act at the same time that the flotilla at Boulogne was in a like state of forwardness, the lord-lieutenant of the counties of Suffolk and Essex, as well as the lieutenants of Kent and Sussex, directed inventories to be sent to them of the horses, waggons, and other articles in the counties. A number of posting and hand-bills were printed, by order of government, to be distributed, in case of necessity, among the people, calling upon them to take up arms, and to employ other means calculated to embarrass and obstruct the progress of the enemy in case of actual invasion.

Towards the end of July, when the preparations of the enemy were so forward as to menace an actual attempt, strong piquet guards were mounted all along the coast, and orders issued for all the volunteers of the southern districts to be alert, and in a state of preparation to march, on immediate notice. Four complete parks of artillery, forming a hollow square, were so arranged, at Woolwich, as to be able to set off, at a moment's warning, to any part of the country. The horses were harnessed in the centre, and the drivers and engineers slept on the spot. In the rear of the guns, which were in general 9 and 12 pounders, were the chevaux-de-frize, and ammunition-waggons.

Orders were given for re-embodiment of the supplementary militia, disbanded at Christmas, 1799, and their joining their respective regiments. Instructions were given out respecting the state in which the troops were required to move at a moment's warning. "Being properly provided with country carriages, ammunition, and provisions, and leaving all incumbrances behind them, they were to march, as much as possible, together, in the small brigades of contiguous regiments into which they should be divided, agreeably to the particular routes and orders that would be immediately forwarded from head-quarters, on the certainty of the enemy's appearance. Such brigades were to have each an appointed commander, or otherwise to be commanded by the eldest officer in rank for the time. In the first hurry of assembling the troops, on the landing of an enemy, it might not be possible, in all cases, to prescribe positive routes, and to prevent crossing, crowding, and interfering in the march of so many bodies, moving from different places, and tending to the same point. The prudence and the arrangement of the senior officers, must therefore, in the best manner, obviate such unavoidable difficulties. When the troops marched in corps, and encamped, they would be the more easily provided for: but when it was necessary that they should be cantoned, or hurried on, they would be under a necessity of putting up with the most crowded and slightest accommodation; and a rigorous discipline must prevent them from requiring more than the country and circumstances could allow. On the routes where troops were to march sufficient bread might certainly be provided, in the large towns, on a short notice. Should this not be the case, commanding officers were, themselves, to obviate the difficulty in the best general mode they could, and not to permit individuals to trespass or commit outrages. Whether the troops should be cantoned, or encamped, a commissary was to attend each brigade, to regulate, and provide for the march, and to whom every necessary assistance was to be given. If there should be no commissary or assistant quartermaster, and the pressure should be such, that provision of straw, forage, or bread, must be had on the spot, the commanding-officer was to appoint one or more intelligent officers to act as commissaries, and assistant quartermasters for the time, who should go forward with proper assistance, call upon the magistrate or magistrates of the neighbourhood, and, representing the necessity of the case, as the only means of preserving property, and the regularity of the troops, induce them to take such immediate measures, and give such orders, as would, on the spot, produce the necessary supplies: for all which the commanding-officers of each regiment would give full and distinct acknowledgments (signed also by the commissary or assistant quartermaster) in writing, specifying in words the quantities of each article received, the number of persons and horses thereby provided for, and for what time. Registers of every receipt, so granted, were to be kept by commanding-officers, as necessary checks if called on. And the receipts themselves were to be afterwards collected, and discharged by the commissary-general, at the fair rates of the country. The troops were to encamp on the commons, wherever there were such. Otherwise, they were ordered to encamp on such grass-fields as should be most convenient for their march, and to which they could do the least damage. But, if unavoidable damage should be done, the commanding officer of the encamping corps was to grant a certificate of the nature and amount."

BOOK V.

CHAP. VI.

Thus, in the inland arrangements, the government united the safety of the public with justice to individuals.

On the sea-coast, all along the channel, from the Nore to Falmouth, a system of night signals was employed to announce any approach of danger. Frigates and gun-boats were stationed at proper places near the British shore. The return of the Baltic fleet, while it added to the amount of England's disposable naval force, inspired, if possible, into her seamen and marines, still higher sentiments of courage, honor, and glory. Such was the immensity of Britain's navy, that her fleets, squadrons, and cruisers, blocked up the enemy in their principal ports, and watched their flotillas of gun-boats, while they endeavoured, with various success, to skulk close to the shore, from one place to another, and annoyed, and quashed their trade in every quarter of the world. A chain of English vessels of war stretched along the whole extent of the French coast on the channel, generally about two or three miles from land. Frigates were stationed behind the promontories, for intercepting any vessels that should venture to put to sea, not knowing their danger. Sometimes the English frigates, and other lighter vessels, would dash in, and cut out the enemy's ships from their creeks and harbours. The Dutch fleet, and the preparations in the adjacent ports of the enemy, were watched, and held in check by squadrons under the command of the admirals Dickson and Greaves. That under Dickson, who had the chief command of both, amounted to twelve sail of the line, besides frigates. That under Greaves, to five or six sail of the line, besides other vessels. The harbour of Toulon was watched, and the neighbouring coasts scoured by Sir John Borlase Warren. Admiral Cornwallis, with fourteen sail of three-deckers, and one 80 gun-ship, besides frigates, and other armed vessels, cruised off Brest. A squadron of eight sail of seventy-fours, and two of eighty-four, besides frigates, cutters, and gun-boats, under Rear-admiral Sir James Saumarez, blockaded Cadiz.

So great, at this time, the summer of 1801, was the immense strength of the navy of England, that she had a fleet in the Indian ocean; a fleet in the Red Sea; a fleet at the mouth of the Nile; two fleets in or near the Mediterranean; a small fleet in the Baltic; a fleet in the West Indies; detached cruisers and convoy-ships in every direction; and a channel fleet: while a flotilla of vessels of different descriptions, under the command of Lord Nelson, who was invested with the supreme command of maritime affairs from the Land's End to Yarmouth, guarded the British shores, and struck terror into those of France.

Such was, in general, the disposition of Britain's fleets in the months of February, March, April, May, June, and July; though, on so variable an element, and amidst such complicated and shifting scenes, they underwent, of course, many variations, which shall be noticed in our chapter devoted to naval history.

The nature of the maritime war that was, at this time, carried on close in on the French side of the channel, and the extreme absurdity of the threatened invasion will appear from the mention of one circumstance, that when their vessels were enabled to skulk along the shore, and to escape from the British ships of war, by means of batteries on land; this was published as matter of congratulation and triumph. The following article, extracted from the French journals, was considered as a piece of great and good news.

Brest, August 22d. "Four chasse-marées, laden with salt, having doubled the point of Penmarck, were chased about nine o'clock in the morning by an English frigate, which endeavoured to cut off their retreat from Audierne. The troops of artillery and infantry were at their post; already the frigate had discharged several shots on one of the chasse-marées, and had considerably damaged it. It was on the point of surrendering when the crew were loudly encouraged from the battery of Cremence to continue their voyage, with assurances that they would receive the necessary degree of protection from a battery near at hand. Encouraged by this, the vessel continued its course, and arrived in safety at the place of its destination.

"The officer commanding the battery, seeing that the three other vessels were making the shore at an intermediate point, and that the frigate had manned three boats, to defeat their design, for want of horses, caused the cannoniers to drag along the beach a field-piece three quarters of the way. But their strength failing them, they took up their muskets, and, conjointly with the infantry, flew to the place where the vessels were aground. But the enemy had previously reached the place, and had time, in spite of a very brisk fire from the battery of Sock, to set fire to two of the chasse-marées, and to carry off the third. Two officers of the 40th, with a number of the fusileers and cannoniers precipitated themselves on board the vessels. In the face of 150 shots from the frigate, which was at anchor opposite to them, they succeeded in extinguishing the fire on board one of them, and brought her safe into the port of Audierne. Too much praise cannot be bestowed on the activity and zeal of the officers, fusileers, and cannoniers."

Thus the French and English were busily employed in keeping each other on the alert. A mighty force was collected on either side of the channel. More and more troops were continually drawing to the French coast. Reinforcements, on the other hand, were daily sent to the British, so that, by the beginning of August, the sea was covered in a manner with their ships of war along the whole extent of the coast, from which the enemy might attempt to execute their threats of invasion. But a system of mere defence was not considered as worthy of the British nation. Even menaces of invasion were not to pass with impunity. It would have been madness to have attempted an invasion of France; but there were different points on the coasts of France, Flanders, and Holland, where deep wounds might be given; and where the painful and tedious preparations of the enemy might be disconcerted in a moment.

To turn the tide of war from defensive to offensive, was deemed a not less wise than magnanimous conduct. The nature of war merely defensive was dispiriting. It gave the enemy not only the choice of his time and place, but the advantage of courage and energy in his attack. It was better to hazard something in offensive war than to lower the public mind by suspense. At the very point of time, therefore, when the project of invading England appeared to be ripe for execution, it was determined that Lord Nelson, with a flotilla of gun-boats and other armed vessels, backed by some ships of the line, should carry the terrors of war home to the doors of France. A fitter agent for this purpose could not have been chosen than Lord Nelson. His very name was a tower of strength: and every thing possible to be done was to be expected from the skill as well as gallantry of his conduct.

While the armament to be directed by Lord Nelson was drawing together at Sheerness and the Nore, and of which further mention shall be made in our naval history, a stop was put to all intercourse between England and the opposite coasts. Orders were sent by government not to suffer any persons whatever to land from France, Flanders, or Holland.

The French, instead of making attacks on England, were wholly employed in preparations for defence against the dreaded attacks of the English armament. At Boulogne, Dunkirk, Dieppe, Havre, Cherbourg, and other places, where the English might direct their attacks, land-forces were collected from the neighbouring quarters; batteries were constructed, and furnaces erected for heating red-hot shot; all which had fires in them ready for service. The French were every where on their coasts; they kept on the alert, and felt that anxiety and alarm which unavoidably arise in the most courageous breasts from ignorance of the particular point to be attacked by a brave and enterprising commander.

The war between France and Britain assumed now an aspect extremely interesting to every individual of the French and British nations. In former wars, and in the preceding part of the present, hostilities were carried on in distant colonies. In Italy, Germany, or other parts of the continent, the nations seemed now to come to close quarters with each other. The contest bore somewhat of the character of the struggles between the French and English in the days of the Henrys and Edwards. The French encampments, on the coast of Picardy, were seen BOOK V. with the aid of glasses from Dover, and bodies of English troops were in like manner seen from Calais.

CHAP. VI.

Among the principal measures of precaution which the legislature of Great Britain thought proper to adopt for the internal security and peace of the empire, was a bill for continuing the execution of martial law in Ireland. This bill was introduced to the House of Commons by Lord Castlereagh, March 12, who observed, that after the union of England and Scotland it was necessary to pass laws for Scotland of unusual severity, and unconstitutional in their nature. He alluded to the laws for disarming the Highlanders: which laws were passed by a parliament strenuous in the support of the rights of the subject. Lord Castlereagh, therefore, only called on the house to do that for Ireland, which, on a former occasion, it had done for Scotland. Without a continuance of the same system of prudence and precaution, with regard to Ireland, that country would be placed in a most unfortunate predicament. He had always entertained a firm conviction, that neither the constitution nor the liberties of Ireland could be preserved, but by the measures adopted for the suppression of rebellion. The house would see in what a situation Ireland would be placed if parliament, from any scruples, should withhold its sanction to a measure on which its safety and existence depended. It would have the effect of instilling into the government such apprehensions, that it would be impossible for those to whom it was intrusted, to discharge their duties to the public in the manner they had hitherto done, under the idea that the local parliament would always give them the means of acting with vigor. As to waiting for a communication from his majesty, the habeas corpus suspension-act had been frequently renewed, without either any communication from the crown, or inquiry by a committee, and merely on the idea that the circumstances of the country remained the same as when it first passed. The suspension of the habeas corpus in Ireland, in 1799, was without any communication. It was, no doubt, in the power of parliament to go into an inquiry if they thought this necessary; but where there were grounds for the house to proceed without inquiry, it had never been usual, nor was it necessary to chain it down to the suspension of its proceedings, till an inquiry had taken place. His wish was to propose that this bill should only be continued for a limited time, namely, for three months, in order that parliament might have time to go into an inquiry. Lord Castlereagh having clearly shewn that, on the present question, there was no necessity for either a communication from the throne, or an inquiry by parliament, proceeded to state the reasons that appeared to him to be conclusive, for the measure to be proposed. From an examination of facts and circumstances, respecting the origin, progress, and termination of open rebellion, and the actual state of Ireland, in which there was still a secret rebellion; he shewed that nothing but the exercise of martial law could give free course to justice, and save the country. Though Jacobinism had been put down in the field, it yet continued to afflict the land in a manner not less destructive to the jurisprudence of the country, but more difficult to be attacked by the king's forces in the field. The whole nature of the remaining disturbances in Ireland was directed, first, against the properties and persons of the well-affected; and, secondly, against the course of justice. The house would therefore be sensible, that unless those persons, who were engaged in acts of rebellion, could be brought summarily to trial, the friends of government would be subjected to certain destruction.

Lord Castlereagh did not expect that rebellion would altogether cease to exist during the war. He knew that the spirit of rebellion had too many friends in every part of the empire: but he did not, at present, propose to extend the rebellion act beyond three months. There was a measure which his lordship took the liberty of proposing, as subsidiary to this. There were persons in custody in Ireland, under the suspension of the habeas corpus act. His lordship wished to leave them in the hands of the civil power; and for that purpose he would propose, that the act for suspending the habeas corpus be continued for the same period as that for the suppression of rebellion.

The necessity of martial law was strenuously maintained by all the gentlemen from Ireland, Sir Lawrence Parsons alone excepted, who considered the measure wholly unnecessary. "Were not," he asked, "the courts of law open, at this time, to try rebels?" During the last two years, assizes had been regularly held throughout Ireland, twice a year, without a single exception. He defied the noble lord to bring one instance of its being otherwise. He was astonished to hear that juries could not discharge their duty. In what county had that happened? He knew of no complaint on that topic, but that juries were sometimes too prompt to condemn. He had a respect for the army, and he knew that, in their proper stations, they graced their professions. But he would not choose to take officers from the horse-guards, to supersede the legal judges of the land. He asked Mr. Pitt, if he, when he was a barrister, would have trusted the case of any of his clients to be decided by a colonel of the horse-guards? Courts-martial could not ascertain the difference between innocence and guilt. They had no principles on which to decide; but were, in their decisions, creatures of mere caprice and accident. If it were so easy to decide on such questions, if there were no such thing as the science of evidence and law, why had we judges? Why one law for England, and another for Ireland? It was not pretended that this act helped, in any way, to take the rebels. No: they were in custody; and the pretence was, that no jury would try them. He desired to know of an instance of a jury not being found to try rebels? No one had ever occurred, though it had sometimes happened, that juries were sometimes too prompt to do their duty in such cases. Judges of the law should not be sent to administer justice steadily and severely, but to administer justice. They would then be feared and loved. Courts-martial might be feared, but never could be loved." Sir Lawrence called the attention of the house to the opinion of a great lawyer, on the means of calming the minds of the Irish. He spoke of Sir John Davies, the best present that England ever sent to Ireland. He was the attorney-general of James I. and he wished that every attorney-general of the day had as much respect for the constitution as that great lawyer. He was sent to Ireland after a rebellion. The rebels having been put down by the king's arms, the administration of justice was restored. The judges went the circuits; and most sweet and welcome, said Sir John Davies, was this course to the common people; and so happy and effectual was this policy, that in six circuits, held in five years, there was a less number of criminals than in one circuit in England. Sir Lawrence recommended this example to the house. "Arbitrary measures never civilized men. If they could have done so, Morocco would have been civilized and happy long since. The present measure was in the spirit of a quack; it might heal the sore, but not correct the habit." He recommended to the house, to grace its first act towards Ireland, by rescuing that country from military tyrants.

Mr. Grey also contended, that the act proposed was a suspension of all law, and a violation of the constitution, without necessity. So did Mr. Whitbread. This position they rested chiefly on the evidence that had been given by the honorable baronet, who had just delivered his sentiments on the question before the house. Mr. Grey asked, why it had not been necessary to use martial law against the Whiteboys? Mr. Bouverie did not contend whether martial law was necessary in Ireland or not; all he should insist on was, that it was not proposed in regular shape and form.

Doctor Lawrence asked, why, with 100,000 men in Ireland, the number of officers constituting a court-martial was limited to three, when, even in Wales, five were required? Immediately after the rebellion, he observed, there was, indeed, a murmur, a general dismay, arising from various causes, into which he would not then enter, as well as from Jacobinical principles: but the moment it burst out, it vanished. The danger was not such now as rendered the present measure necessary. He should applaud a vigorous government, under strict responsibility in dangerous times; but a system of the kind now creeping in, and, as it were, begging the question, he should always oppose.

Mr. Dennis Brown referred to the report of the secret committee, and the confessions of the traitors; and affirmed, that had it not been for martial-law, they should not now see an Irish member in that house. He declared, that jurors and witnesses had been murdered by the rebels, for acting on trials. He would mention a fact, that would shew the state of the country. Many persons, who were loyal and well-disposed, had subscribed to support the traitors in prison.—And when he asked, how they could do so improper an act? they declared, that they were compelled to subscribe, to protect themselves and families from the partisans of the traitors.

Sir George Hill contended, that palliatives were unfit for Ireland. The instance of Sir John Davies, quoted by the honorable baronet, was not applicable to the present state of Ireland. The mode of conduct then pursued was adopted long after a rebellion subdued; but the present measure, in the midst of rebellion still existing. Sir George corroborated the statements of Mr. Dennis Browne, as to the danger of jurors and witnesses.

The bill was strongly supported by Mr. Pitt; and after some interesting debates in both houses, became a law. The acts for suspending the habeas corpus act, and preventing seditious and tumultuous meetings, were also revived.

ALTHOUGH no grand or decisive battle took place, the naval campaign of this year was, as usual, brilliant on the part of Great Britain; and the fleets, squadrons, detachments, and cruisers, either employed for home defence, or occupied in distant quarters of the globe, under the superintendence of Earl St. Vincent, (now at the head of the admiralty-board) did not fail to convey a proper idea of the maritime greatness of this country.

Having, in the preceding chapter, alluded to the expedition against the flotilla at Boulogne, we shall, in the present, give an accurate account of this bold and interesting exploit.

On the 30th of July, Lord Nelson hoisted his flag on board the Leyden, of sixty-eight guns, at Deal, and took the command of the armament destined for an unknown expedition. The force comprehended, besides the Leyden, the De Ruyter of sixty-four guns, the Isis of fifty guns, the Hind and Brilliant frigates, together with a great number of bombs and gun-boats, revenue-cutters, and armed pinnaces, in all about forty sail. Lord Nelson afterwards shifted his flag to the Medusa frigate; and, on sailing from Deal, August 1, stood over to the coast of France.

Curiosity was greatly excited, and all was anxious expectation. Boulogne sur Mer was the place on which it was resolved to make the attack, this being the principal place of rendezvous, on the opposite coast, where the enemy had been assembling their numerous small craft, as reported, for the invasion of Great Britain. The gun-boats and flat-bottomed boats, in the harbour of Boulogne, had been reinforced by a flotilla from Calais, consisting of six gun-brigs, four luggers, and two schooners. The design of the enemy to come out, having been soon perceived by the cruisers in that quarter, they slipped their cables, and gave them chase, but found it difficult to get within shot of them; so that, by keeping in close by the shore, they got into Boulogne. In this harbour there were then, besides the flotilla from Calais, two schooners and sixteen gun-boats and luggers. On either side of the town there was formed an extensive encampment. Lord Nelson, having arrived off Boulogne, employed all Monday, August 3, in reconnoitring the fortifications of the place, and concerting the best plan for an attack.

The shore at Boulogne stretches nearly towards the east and west. Towards the east, a point of land runs out, forming a bay. In the middle of this is the mouth of the harbour, which looks out to the north. The enemy's vessels, consisting of six brigs, two schooners, and about twenty gun-boats, were arranged in a line along the beach, not half a mile from shore, one half east, but the longest half west of the harbour's mouth, in front of which was the largest brig. On the beach of the harbour was a strong battery, and another on the pier-head, east of the harbour.

Lord Nelson, on Monday evening, stood close into Boulogne, with some of the bomb-vessels, and threw several bombs, to try how they would reach the enemy. Finding that they reached the shore, he made a signal of recal, and the whole armament anchored about four miles from the land. Orders were given to begin the attack at break of day next morning, 4th of August. At four o'clock he himself stationed the bombs, five in number, in an oblique line, stretching from the west end of the line of the enemy. They came to anchor, and began to throw bombs about five o'clock. The other ships of war were stationed, under weigh, in another line, behind the bombs, ready to render assistance. His lordship's own flag was placed in front of the harbour, having his two lines, one of bombs, and another of small ships of war, stretching from his right. Behind these was the Leyden man of war.

Lord Nelson's first intention was to attack the enemy's vessels with bombs only, as these reach much farther than shot, and would prove effectual, while the enemy's shot could not reach the English vessels. At six o'clock, however, it being then high water, his lordship, in order to induce them to disclose their strongest points, (for it was difficult to discover their batteries, the cliffs being of a brown clay), sent his ships of war very close to the shore, in face of the batteries, where they fired first one broadside, and tacking round, fired the other: and then sailing away, they loaded again for another such attack. This produced a heavy firing on both sides; but when the water fell, the firing of course was given over. The French batteries, on each side of the harbour, could only fire straight out, or nearly so, while the English bomb-vessels were stationed so much to their left, that the batteries could not bear upon them. The French soon discovered the inutility of their batteries; they therefore set on a number of men to throw up works and batteries on the hill, in the eastern turn of the bay, which flanks the whole line of coast. But still they could not reach the bomb-vessels, which were at the extremity of the line of vessels to the westward. Only a few shells, therefore, were thrown from them. The object which the British admiral had in view, in the disposition of his vessels, was, to have all the French ships to retreat towards the mouth of the harbour, that, being in a cluster, their destruction might be effected at night.

The wind being favorable for the bomb-vessels to act, he made the signal for them to weigh, and to throw shells at the enemy's vessels, but previous orders had been given, as little as possible to annoy the town. Six of the French vessels were so much damaged, that they were towed from the scene of action. Five of them were forced into the mole: one sunk; three others were also sunk; and one bulged. It was Lord Nelson's intention when dark to have sent three bombs close upon the enemy, each bomb towed by ten boats, which were also to tow the boats away, in case of accident. But the wind shifting, the attack became impracticable, without the utmost danger: and his whole fleet was obliged to haul off, without making the attempt. In this affair, one of the English engineers was wounded, and one seaman lost an arm; this was all the loss sustained by the British on this occasion. As to the advantage gained, Lord Nelson made no great account of it. "It would serve to convince the enemy," he said, in his dispatches to the admiralty, "that they could not come out of their harbours with impunity."

While his ships of war were firing their broadsides at the French on shore, about seven in the morning, as before-mentioned, Lord Nelson moved about in his barge, making observations and minutes, which might be useful in a future attack. That some attack, either here or elsewhere, was intended, he signified, in general orders, dated Medusa, off Boulogne, August 5. "Lord Nelson has reason to be very much satisfied with the captains of the bombs, for their placing of the vessels yesterday. It was impossible that they could be better situated: and the artillery officers have shewn great skill in disabling ten out of twenty-four, opposed to them. The commander-in-chief cannot avoid noticing the great zeal and desire to attack the enemy in a closer and different combat, which manifested itself in all ranks of persons, and which Lord Nelson would have gladly given full scope to, had the attempt at this moment been proper. But the officers and others may rely, that an early opportunity shall be given them for shewing their judgment, zeal, and bravery."

On the 6th of August, the British admiral sailed, with part of his fleet, to Margate-roads. A number of his gun-boats returned to Deal, and a sufficient force remained off Boulogne. From Margate-roads, Lord Nelson, without ever having gone ashore, again set sail on the 8th, directing his course, at first, not to the Downs, but to the eastward, as if it had been his design to make an attack on Flushing, or some other port on the Dutch coast. But the real point of attack was no other than Boulogne. To an active and daring mind, accustomed to overcome all obstacles in the pursuit of victory and glory, the late success, in disabling so great a proportion of the flotilla, appeared in the light of a disappointment, if not a defeat, rather than a matter of triumph. He was inflamed with an ardent desire of bringing off the enemy's flotilla, which was moored in the front of Boulogne, to the number now of twenty-five armed vessels.

This attempt, the effect of courage, carried by a tide of success to the length of temerity, and almost madness, was made on the night between the 15th and 16th of August. The force collected at the Downs, for this second attack, amounted to about seventy vessels, of different descriptions, on board of which were some thousands of marines. On the evening of the 15th, about dusk, the English vessels were ordered to form in four divisions, to storm the French line of boats, brigs, and luggers, defended by long poles, headed with spikes of iron, projecting from their sides, and with a very strong netting braced up to their lower yards, moored head and stern across the harbour, with iron chains, in the strongest manner, containing each from one hundred and fifty to two hundred soldiers, and under the protection of land-batteries as well as musketry from the shore. Since the first bombardment, the enemy had erected batteries on every favorable point, and the army collected on the heights occupied a line of nearly three miles in length. But the circumstance of the vessels being made fast to one another, and to the ground, by means of strong iron chains, was then unknown to the English, who were provided with boarding-pikes, tomahawks, and cutlasses only. Fire-arms were forbidden, lest they should have been induced to fire, and alarm the enemy before they could be well up with their boats.

The plan of the attack was as follows: The fleet was put into four divisions of boats for boarding, each under the command of a captain; and a fifth division of howitzer-boats. The first four divisions consisted of flat-bottomed boats, armed only with marines, and the boats belonging to the different ships and cutters in the squadron. Each of these divisions consisted of three flat-bottomed boats, and about ten six-oared boats. The first division was commanded by Captain Somerville, of the Eugene; the second, by Captain Parker, of the Medusa; the third, by Captain Cotgrave, of the Gannet; the fourth, by Captain R. Jones, of the Diligence. The division of howitzer-boats were under the direction of Captain John Conn. The whole flotilla was formed into the different divisions by the senior master and commander, Captain Somerville. Each division had its proportionate number of enemies vessels to attack; the first beginning to the eastward, and so on in the order westward. The boats, in their respective divisions, put off from the Medusa, at half past eleven at night, of the 15th. The second division, under Captain Parker, closed with the enemy first, at half past twelve, Sunday morning. Captain Parker ordered Captain Williams, with the sub-division under his orders, to push on to attack the vessels to the northward of him, while he himself, with the others, ran alongside a large brig off the mole head, wearing the commodore's pendent. The boats were no sooner alongside of this ship, than they attempted to board; but a strong netting baffled all their endeavours, and an instantaneous discharge of guns, from about 200 soldiers on her gun-wale, laid Captain Parker, with two-thirds of the crew, on their backs in the boat, all either killed or desperately wounded. A part of the officers and crew of the Medusa were in the boat with Captain Parker; and another part of them in the barge, under Lieutenant Longford, who nobly seconded the efforts of the captain, until all her crew was disabled from making any effort. The barge, being on the outside, was enabled to get off with the tide; but the boat, in which Captain Parker was, hung alongside; and, as there was not an officer or man left to govern her, must have fallen into the hands of the enemy, if she had not been taken in tow and carried off by the Hon. Mr. Cathcart, who commanded the Medusa's cutter. Mr. Cathcart sustained the attack with the greatest intrepidity, until the desperate situation in which Captain Parker was left obliged him to call Mr. Cathcart to his assistance.

Mr. Williams led his sub-division to the enemy with the utmost gallantry. He took one lugger and had begun to attack a brig, while his crews suffered equally with those under the immediate command of his captain. Nearly the whole of his own boat's crew were either killed or wounded.

The next division that came up with the enemy, was that under the direction of Captain Cotgrave. The captain, wishing to reduce the largest vessel first, lost no time in making the attack; but in consequence of his leading the division, and of the enemy's opening a heavy fire from several batteries, thinking it advisable to give the enemy as little time as possible, he cut the tow-rope, and did not wait for the other boats: so that it was some little time before the other boats could get up. He received so many shots through the boat's bottom, that he soon found her in a sinking state; and, as it was not possible to stop so many shot-holes, he was obliged, with the men, to take to one of the boats of the ship, (the York), which soon came up with the rest of his division. Finding, from the number of men killed and wounded in the different boats, and the constant fire of grape and small arms from the shore, that there was not any prospect of success, he thought it for the good of his majesty's service to withdraw the boats between two and three in the morning.

The first division, carried by the rapidity of the tide, did not gain the place of its destination at the time intended; and Captain Somerville, finding that he was not likely to reach it in the order prescribed, gave directions for the boats to cast each other off. By so doing, he was enabled to come up with the enemy's flotilla, a little before the dawn of day, and, in the best order possible, to attack, close to the pier-head, a brig, which, after a sharp contest, he carried. Previously to this her cables were cut; but the captors were prevented from towing her off, by her being secured with a chain. Not seeing the least prospect of being able to get her off, and in consequence of a heavy fire of musketry and grape-shot that was poured on them from the shore, by three luggers, and another brig, within half pistol-shot, they were obliged to abandon her, and push out of the bay, as it was then completely daylight. The fourth division, notwithstanding every exertion, could not, on account of the rapidity of the returning tide, get to the westward of any part of the enemy's line, until near daylight. On approaching the eastern part of the line, in order to assist the first division then engaged, they met them returning. Under these circumstances, and the day breaking apace, Captain Jones judged it prudent to direct the officers commanding the different boats to return to their different ships.

Captain Conn, with the howitzers, in support of Captain Parker's division, advanced towards the pier, until he was aground in the headmost boat. He then opened his fire, and threw about eight shells into the harbour. From the strength of the ebb, he was not able to keep his station off the pier-head. He continued, however, his fire on the French camp, till the enemy's fire had slackened, and almost totally failed, and Captain Parker's division had passed without him.

One French lugger only was brought off, with a lieutenant, eight seamen, and eight soldiers; being all that remained out of about double that number, with which she had been manned.

The loss of the English, in this second attack on Boulogne, in officers, seamen, and marines, killed and wounded, amounted to not less than 172. Among the wounded was Captain Parker, who lost a leg and thigh. The loss of the French is not known: though it is reasonably supposed to have been very considerable; not only from the havoc made by the English seamen and marines, but from the volleys of musketry poured by the enemy, regardless of their own men, into their own brigs and boats, after they were boarded, and had fallen, or were likely to fall into the hands of the English. The French admiral, Latouche Treville, in his dispatches to the minister of the marine, stated the loss of the French at no more than ten men killed, and thirty wounded. This diminution, of what must have been the real loss, was carried so far as to be wholly incredible. The admiral did not pretend to deny that the English boarded the French vessels with the utmost intrepidity; nor attempt to conceal that they were compelled to retire, merely in consequence of the impracticability of getting the ships off, and the strong fire of musketry kept up on them from the troops in the gun-boats, and that lined the shore. He denied, however, that a single shot was fired from the land batteries, from a dread of wounding and killing their own men.—Eight of the English boats, according to the French accounts, were sunk; and four barges taken. They described also the shocking spectacle that was presented on board their vessels after the action. The decks strewed with dead and dying; and fingers, hands, wrists, and arms, every where discovered, after the dead bodies were thrown into the sea.—The attempt was, in truth, a deplorable act of temerity: a prodigal exposure of human life.

The gallant admiral ascribed the failure of success “to the darkness of the night; the rapidity of the tide and half-tide; the separation of the divisions; and the circumstance of their not arriving all at the same happy moment with Captain Parker. But it is sufficiently accounted for, by forests of cutlasses and bayonets; volleys of musketry and grape-shot, poured on our men, both from gun-boats, and from the shore, while they were employed in clearing away the strong boarding netting; the projecting spikes; and the chains which remained after the brave seamen had cut the cables of the enemy’s vessels; and the barricades covering numerous troops about their mainmasts. The French commodore addressed the first boat’s crew that approached his ship, and in which was Captain Parker, as already noticed, in the following words, which were spoken in pretty good English: “Let me advise you, my brave Englishmen, to keep your distance. You can do nothing here; and it is only uselessly shedding the blood of brave men to make the attempt.”

The tremendous engagement at Boulogne, in which the roar of so much artillery, at sea and on shore, seemed to shake both heaven and earth, were heard on both sides of the channel. During the whole of the first action, the hills near Boulogne were covered with spectators. The heights around Dover were, in like manner, covered with thousands of people. It was a clear day, and the wind at south-east; so that the greater part of the English ships were to be seen, while they kept up a fire on the harbour of Boulogne. The smoke of the French batteries, firing in return, was also distinctly seen. This is, perhaps, the first engagement of any magnitude, between France and England, that was seen from the shores of both countries.

On Sunday afternoon, Lord Nelson, with part of his fleet, returned to the Downs. The remainder continued, for some time, to cruise on the French coast.

On the 14th of September, the commander of the English cruisers, Captain Somerville, anchored at the distance of a league and a half from the French line, which was called the advanced guard, with two large ships and a frigate, and ten vessels of inferior note.

At Deal, Lord Nelson did every thing in his power for the relief or comfort of the brave men who had suffered in this unfortunate expedition; and his kind and cordial sympathy afforded his brave and generous seamen and marines a very sensible consolation and pleasure. His time was chiefly occupied in visiting the wounded in the hospital. He paid the utmost attention to every individual; inquiring into their several cases, and consoling them with a promise, that he would shortly bring them good news. On asking one man, whom he recollected, how he was, he learnt that he had lost an arm. Lord Nelson told him never to mind that; for that he himself had lost one also, and perhaps should shortly lose a leg; but that they could never be lost in a better cause than the defence of their country. This had a wonderful effect on the seamen. Several of them exclaimed, that they only regretted their wounds, as they prevented them from accompanying him in another attack on their enemies.

The failure of this expedition occasioned great exultation in France: the subprefect of the district, as well as the mayor and other magistrates of Boulogne, addressed a letter, full of hyperbolical compliments to the commander of the naval forces on the channel, in which they presented “the testimony of their admiration and gratitude to him and the brave flotilla under his command, at the front post nearest to England.”

BOOK V. They also congratulated him, at the same time, "on the unshrinking firmness and invincible courage with which his companions in arms had withstood a bombardment of fifteen hours."—"We have seen," added they, "the thunder of the English arsenals fall harmless on the waves, without touching one of those gallant men, who have it in charge to defend our own coast, and to spread terror and desolation on that of Britain. What reception will those dastards give to our heroes, who, guided by the auspicious genius of Bonaparte, and the flag of Latouche Treville, are eager to avenge the wrongs of the world on a land that has, during a period of twelve years, fostered the war, distractions, and monopoly, which have so long desolated Europe."

CHAP. VII.

It is probable, however, that the first consul was by this time aware, that neither his ports nor fleets were secure from the valor and enterprise of English seamen, as he affected to treat this engagement as a mere skirmish, in which the "advanced guards of the grenadiers of Italy" had displayed their ordinary bravery, and obtained their usual success.

In the course of the spring, the islands of St. Thomas, St. John, St. Martin, St. Bartholomew, and St. Croix, in the West Indies, surrendered to a squadron under Rear-admiral Duckworth, having a body of land-forces on board, commanded by Lieutenant-general Trigge. The resistance experienced upon this occasion was trifling, and these possessions were soon afterwards restored, on the dissolution of the armed neutrality. The colonies of St. Eustatia and Saba, the former of which had been evacuated by the French, were also taken possession of soon after by Captain Perkins, of the Arab, with a detachment of the 3d regiment of foot, under Lieutenant-colonel Blunt.

On the 21st of June, Ternate, the chief of the Molucca islands, surrendered to the arms of the East India company. Captain Hayes, an officer in the service of that powerful corporation, with a small squadron of armed vessels, intercepted the annual supplies, and blockaded Fort Orange, while Colonel Burr, with a body of troops, besieged the place by land. On this occasion the Dutch governor held out during a siege of fifty-two days; and while he displayed great courage, at the same time evinced an uncommon degree of fidelity to the Batavian republic.

In the Mediterranean two severe actions took place; the first, however, proved unfortunate, but the second was not a little flattering to the British arms. Rear-admiral Sir James Saumarez, after cruising off Cadiz, in which he had descried six sail of large ships ready for sea, and seven more in a state of equipment, proceeded towards the entrance of the straits, in consequence of information from Gibraltar that three French sail of the line and a frigate were then at anchor off Algiers. Having made a signal to prepare for an engagement, and also for a general chase, (the latter with a view of collecting such of the ships as had got to leeward), he resolved to reconnoitre the enemy's position; and the order of battle was issued, in case an attack should be deemed prudent. The squadron, led by Captain Hood, of the Venerable, and reinforced by the Calpe, two gun-vessels, and several boats from the neighbouring garrison, on opening Cabareta Point, July 6, beheld the enemy, consisting of two ships of eighty-four guns, and one of seventy-four, with a large frigate, being at a considerable distance from the batteries; and when, in addition to this circumstance, the advantage of a leading wind was taken into consideration, an attempt to obtain possession of them not only seemed feasible, but afforded well-grounded hopes of success. The signal was accordingly given for the ships to take their stations, and engage as close as possible: however, the failure of the breeze, at a critical moment, enabled the French commander to warp nearer the land, and exposed the armament to the most imminent danger; for the Venerable, instead of weathering the enemy, was under the necessity of dropping her anchor. The Pompée, Captain Stirling, taking advantage of a light and partial air, assumed a position opposite to the inner vessel, which proved to be the Formidable, bearing the flag of Rear-admiral Linois, and commenced the action in a spirited and gallant manner, until disabled. Some of the other ships were prevented, for some time, by a failure of wind, from coming up; but at length the Hannibal, receiving the benefit of the breeze, was endeavouring, by a bold and decisive measure, to get between the French admiral and the batteries, when she struck on a shoal immediately under the enemy's guns, and became unmanageable. In this situation, being exposed to the joint fire of the ships and land batteries, as well as gun and mortar vessels, which were so placed as to rake the squadron, and rendered incapable of fighting to advantage, Captain Ferris, after losing no less than 375 men in killed, wounded, and missing, was reduced to the painful necessity of striking his flag. The Cæsar and Audacious, which had endeavoured to cover his vessel, were also forced to make sail, the former being at this period only three cable's length from one of the enemy's batteries. In the mean time the admiral, finding that the enemy by drawing closer to the shore had increased his distance, took advantage of an occasional breeze to approach nearer, and the Cæsar and Audacious were for a considerable time opposed to the Indomptable and Dessaix; but it having soon after become calm, they drifted along with the current close to the island battery, on which they opened a heavy fire. On receiving the benefits of a gentle gale, they instantly prepared to resume their former station, when the wind again died away, and rendered all their efforts useless.

After an action of nearly five hours continuance, the squadron retired to Rosia Bay, leaving the Hannibal aground, and in possession of the enemy; while two French sail of the line appeared at the same time on the shore, and the whole detachment was supposed to be rendered nearly unserviceable.

Governor O'Hara and the principal inhabitants of Gibraltar subscribed the sum of 800*l.* for the relief of the brave men wounded during the action; and, by the further liberality of the garrison, and the indefatigable exertions of the British officers and seamen, the whole squadron, one ship only (the Pompée) excepted, was nearly re-fitted and ready for sea, when a more propitious opportunity occurred of distinguishing their valour. The enemy's three sail of line of battle, disabled in the late action, had been reinforced by five more, under the command of Don Juan Joaquin de Moreno, as well as by a French 74, (St. Antonio), carrying the broad pendent of Commodore Le Roy. This combined squadron consisted of two ships of 112 guns, one of 94, two of 84, one of 80, and four of 74, including the Hannibal, (which was with some difficulty warped into deep water, but which returned to Algeiras before the second action), besides four frigates, two armed vessels, and a number of gun-boats. These got under weigh, with an intention of reaching Cadiz, safe, in consequence of their numbers, and assured, as they imagined, of an easy victory, in case of a contest with a detachment which had been so recently foiled.

The British squadron consisted only of the following ships:—

Names.	Guns.	Captains.
Cæsar	80	{ Rear-adm. Sir J. Saumarez, Capt. Jahleel Brenton,
Spencer	74	Capt. Darley,
Venerable	74	— Hood,
Superb	74	— Keates,
Audacious	74	— Peard,
Thames	32	— Hollis,
Calpe	12	Hon. Capt. Dundas,
Louisa	8	Lieut. Truscott.

Notwithstanding the great inferiority of this force, Sir James Saumarez, burning with eagerness to avenge the late disaster, once more hoisted the signal for battle, and followed the enemy, who had just cleared Cabareta Point, at eight o'clock in the evening, July 13. Captain Keates having received orders to attack the sternmost ship, and keep between the fleet and the shore, the Superb accordingly made sail, and began the engagement at eleven o'clock at night, by firing on several ships, particularly the Real Carlos, which formed a cluster; and, in consequence of the darkness, engaged with each other. In the course of a few minutes, the Cæsar also began to open on a Spanish three-decker, that had hauled her wind; but she was observed to be in flames, and shortly after ran on board another vessel of the same force, to which the conflagration extended with uncommon rapidity; so that, after the lapse of a short but awful period, they both blew up. These proved to be the San Herminigeldo and the Real Carlos, of 112 guns and 1,250 men each; the former carrying the admiral's flag, and both officered by some of the noblest families in Spain.

The English commander having seen, from the beginning, that these ships could not be of any service during the rest of the action, had, in the interim, passed on to the assistance of the Superb, then engaged with the St. Antonio, which had been before silenced, and now struck her colours.

As soon as the firing had ceased, it became so dark that none of the enemy's squadron was visible: the Cæsar, however, continued her course, during a heavy gale, in chase of the remainder of the fleet; and, at the approach of morning, could only discover three English, (the Venerable, Thames, and Spencer), and one French ship, which proved to be the Formidable, of 84 guns, endeavouring to reach the channel leading through the shoals of Conil. As the wind, however, suddenly failed at this moment, one ship alone was enabled to bring her to action; and Capt. Hood, after a spirited engagement, had nearly silenced the enemy, when his main-mast, which had been injured before, was unfortunately shot away, and a calm ensuing, the French ship effected her escape into Cadiz. The Venerable soon after struck on a bank, and was very near being wrecked; but she was fortunately got off, though with the loss of all her masts; and being taken in tow by the Thames frigate, returned with the fleet to Gibraltar.

Thus terminated an action, in which the superiority of the enemy was immense; and although the confused state of the whole fleet, and the accidental destruction of two first-rates, rendered the victory less difficult, yet the original design of the admiral to engage with such odds, evinces a degree of gallantry which reflects honor on the English name. Sir James Saumarez accordingly received the thanks of both houses of parliament, and was afterwards rewarded with a pension of 1,200*l. per annum.*

An action, singularly severe, was also fought in the Mediterranean, February 10, between the Phœbe, Capt. R. Barlow, and the French frigate, L'Africaine, of 44 guns and 715 men, of whom many were soldiers, bound for Egypt. The commander of the latter would not yield until his ship had become a mere wreck, with five feet water in her hold; his guns were also dismounted, and his decks encumbered with the dying and the dead; the number of the killed amounting to 200, and of the wounded to 143. The loss of the English on this occasion was incredibly small, one seaman only having perished, and but ten, with two officers, being wounded.

Lord Cochrane, in the Speedy sloop, of fourteen 4-pounders, and fifty-four men and boys, performed a brilliant exploit by the capture of the Gamo, a Spanish xebec frigate, of thirty-two guns and 319 seamen, off Barcelona. His lordship perceiving, from the great disparity of force, that a cannonade would only endanger the loss of his own vessel, without affording any chance of subduing the enemy, determined on boarding; and such was the impetuosity and success of the attack, that she was carried with the loss of one man only, although thirteen were killed on the part of the enemy.

Sir Richard Strachan, with a detachment of small vessels, intercepted the supplies of the enemy on the western shores of France; while Capt. Rowley Bulteel, in the Belliqueux, with a convoy of East Indiamen, which were mistaken for men of war, captured the French frigates La Concorde, of forty-four, and La Madée, of thirty-six guns, in the neighbourhood of Brazil, forming part of a squadron which had committed great depredations on the coast of Africa.

The fleet under Vice-admiral Rainier, in the East Indies, seized a number of valuable prizes, particularly two Dutch ships in the neighbourhood of Java. Captain T. Manby, in the Bourdolois, belonging to Rear-admiral Duckworth's detachment in the West Indies, nearly about the same time dispersed a small armament fitted out by Victor Hughes, for the purpose of intercepting the outward-bound convoy. On this occasion he captured La Curieuse, of eighteen 9-pounders and 168 men, after thirty minutes of close firing. In consequence of the numerous shot-holes received during the engagement, the prize sunk, while two gallant midshipmen, (Messrs. Frederick Spence and — Auckland), with five of the heroic crew, were endeavouring to rescue the wounded Frenchmen from the wreck.

Sir E. Hamilton, in the Trent, chased a ship under protection of a cutter, and some lugger privateers, on the rocks near the isles of Brehat, notwithstanding the fire from five batteries; when the largest vessel was boarded and taken possession of by his first-lieutenant and officer of marines, the latter having, on this occasion, lost his leg.

When the French troops entered Tuscany, in October, 1800, the English then resident at Leghorn, under the conduct of Mr. Grant, vice-consul at that port, took refuge in the isle of Elba; and having received from the squadron cruising off that coast, under Sir John Borlase Warren, the necessary supplies, with a reinforcement of 300 soldiers and artillerymen, they established themselves in the fort and harbour of Porto-Ferrajo. Four hundred Corsicans, and about an equal number of Neapolitans and other military adventurers joining them, formed altogether a considerable garrison; the command of which devolved on a meritorious officer, Lieutenant-colonel Airey. It was quickly invested, on the land side, by an army of 3 or 6000 men; and batteries being raised, the town was bombarded, and attempts were twice made to storm the fortress. The garrison, however, not merely repelled the different assaults, but made a sally on the besiegers, and destroyed the batteries. The besieging army was reinforced, and the batteries reconstructed; but the garrison still defended themselves with vigour and success. At length, after the lapse of some months, Porto-Ferrajo was again summoned to surrender, in the name of the King of Etruria; but Governor Grant replied, that he acknowledged no authority in Tuscany but that of Grand Duke. This year, in the month of September, Sir John B. Warren made an attempt, by landing a considerable body of troops, to relieve the brave garrison, and reduce the island; but, after an obstinate engagement, the English were overpowered by numbers, and compelled to retreat. This event, far from discouraging the garrison, incited them to new efforts; and, in a subsequent sally, they forced the French intrenchments, and drove the enemy from their advanced posts, with great effusion of blood. This extraordinary defence justly attracted great attention and admiration. A squadron of French frigates, employed in the blockade of Porto-Ferrajo, were all captured or destroyed in the course of a single month. Among these, the Success, formerly belonging to Great Britain, and La Bravoure, carrying forty-six guns, were taken possession of by Captains Halsted, Cockburn, and Gower, of the Phoenix, La Minerve, and La Pomone; but the last of these vessels was lost, in consequence of having run on shore during the pursuit.

About the same time, another spirited and successful attack was made by Lord Cochrane, of the Speedy, in company with Captain Pulling, of the Kangaroo sloop of war, on a convoy anchored on the coast of Spain, and protected by a battery of twelve guns and several armed vessels; on which occasion a detachment landed, and the tower of Almanara was blown up. Capt. Charles Adam, also, of La Sybille, captured the French national frigate, La Chiffonne, in Mahé Road, after a short, but gallant action, notwithstanding the guns on the enemy's fore-castle were supplied from a furnace for heating red-hot shot.

During this career of success on the part of Great Britain, no prize of any importance was taken by the enemy, except the Swiftsure. Capt. Hollowell having separated from his convoy, on his return to Malta, June 24, discovered four ships of the line and a large frigate, which proved to be Rear-admiral Gantheaume's squadron. Three of these having come nearly up to him, in consequence of their superiority of sailing, he determined to bear down, hoping to disable one before the rest could be brought into action, and thereby effect his escape. An engagement accordingly took place, with an eighty and seventy-four gun ship, the former of which bore the flag of the commander, and one of these received considerable damage; but two more having, by this time, assumed their stations on the larboard-bow and quarter, the captain reluctantly consented to strike his colours, after having two men killed, and a lieutenant and seven others wounded.

Among other individual instances of exertion, mention must also be made of Lieut. C. Roger, of the Gipseey, of ten 4-pounders and forty-two men, who captured an armed sloop off the north end of Guadaloupe, called Le Quiproquo, of eight

6 and 9-pounders and eighty men. Lieutenant Dick, of the Melpomene, with fifty-five volunteers, assisted by thirty-six soldiers, under Lieutenant Christie, belonging to the African corps, also attacked and captured an armed brig, carrying ten guns and sixty men, off the bar of Senegal, after two boats had been sunk and seven seamen killed; but they were unable to bring her out, under a heavy fire from the land batteries, in consequence of having grounded.

Lieutenant Mather, of the Mercury, failed in an endeavour to navigate the Bull-dog, formerly belonging to the British navy, from behind the Mole of Ancona, after that vessel had been three hours in his possession. Bold as the attempt was, success would have been certain, but for a calm. However, the Bull-dog was afterwards recovered from under the batteries of Gallipoli, in consequence of the gallant exertions of Lord William Stuart, in the Champion.

It must be also observed, that the six-oared cutter of the Atalante, with eight men, captured the French armed lugger L'Eveillé, notwithstanding a discharge of cannon and grape-shot: the lieutenant, Pipon, with the boats of the Fisguard, the Diamond, and the Boadicea, cut out a twenty-gun ship, a gun-boat, mounting a long 32-pounder, and a merchantman, from the harbour of Corunna.

Affairs in the West Indies.—Toussaint an over-match for the French Commissioners.—His Letters to the First Consul, and Proclamation to his Countrymen.—Bonaparte's Project.—Leclerc's hostile Proceedings.—Interesting Meeting between Toussaint and his two Sons.—Hostilities.—Peace made with the Negro.—He and his Family suddenly taken away.—Their rigid Confinement.—Character and Anecdote of the African Chief.

AFTER the English had evacuated St. Domingo, the French repeatedly endeavoured to become masters of that island; and what the first consul could not effect by dint of arms, he was resolved to accomplish by artifice. For a while the cause of royalty was as triumphant in St. Domingo as it was unsuccessful in Europe; but events arose which rendered it impossible for Toussaint to refuse his adherence to the existing government of France.

The committees, directors, and other successive rulers of France, from time to time, sent commissioners to the island; and these men were as fond of plunder and confiscation in the West Indies, as their masters were in Europe. Every man who had property to forfeit, was sure to be cried down as a traitor. But happily in St. Domingo there was such a mind to check them as that of the generous Toussaint. This great man conducted himself with so much prudence, as, without giving offence to the French government, to make its commissioners mere cyphers. He suffered nobody to injure or insult them, and obliged every one to treat their office with respect, and yet left them no power, because he found they would only use it for purposes of cruelty and mischief. He protected the planters from the commissioners, and both from the natural jealousy of the negroes.

The French government more than once re-

BOOK V. called its commissioners, and sent out new ones; but the case was still the same. There were among them very able men, but Toussaint was an over-match for them all. They were obliged to leave in his abler hands all the actual power, and to lean on him for protection.

CHAP. VIII.

More than once his power and credit with the negroes saved these men from destruction. General Laveaux, in particular, once clearly owed his life to this chief, and publicly acknowledged the debt. Laveaux was at that time commander-in-chief for France; and the negroes of Cape François, suspecting him of a plot against their freedom, rose against him, threw him into prison, and were preparing to put him to death, when Toussaint, with a band of faithful followers, marched into the town, and delivered him out of their hands. General Laveaux was on this occasion so struck with the conduct and talents of Toussaint, that he did not scruple to declare, in a public letter, his resolution to take no measure in future in the government of the island, without that great man's advice and consent.

The commission declaring this worthy negro general-in-chief of the armies of St. Domingo, had been confirmed by Bonaparte, who was pleased to pay him many compliments, in a letter, from which the following is an extract:—

"We have conceived for you esteem, and we wish to recognize and proclaim the great services you have rendered to the French people. If their colours fly on St. Domingo, it is to you and your brave blacks that we owe it. Called by your talents and the force of circumstances to the chief command, you have destroyed the civil war, put a stop to the persecutions of some ferocious men, and restored to honor the religion and the worship of God, from whom all things come."

Rigaud, whose name has been mentioned in Book II. Chap. x. was also a brave and active mulatto leader in the south of the island, but not a man of principle, like Toussaint L'Ouverture. Though he long kept himself at the head of a large party, he was obliged to yield to the superior merit of his rival. Still, from the perverseness of Rigaud's party, Toussaint had a new insurrection to quell, and also to obtain possession of the Spanish part of that large island lately ceded to France, which the Spanish governor, upon various pretences, and perhaps by the secret request of the French government, long withheld. But at length the genius and activity of the negro chief triumphed over all obstacles; and before peace was concluded between Great Britain and France, every part of St. Domingo was in quiet submission to his authority, and rapidly improving in wealth and happiness under his wise administration.

The following is a letter from this chief, adressed to Citizen Bonaparte, first consul of the French republic:—

At St. Domingo, Feb. 12, 9th Year of the French Republic, one and Indivisible, 1801.

Citizen Consul,

Disaffection, alarmed at the determination by which the Spanish part of St. Domingo was about to be annexed to the dominions of the republic, employed every art and intrigue to raise obstacles to the measure. That which best suited its views was to recal Citizen Roume, agent of the government, and to engage him to adopt means for postponing the possession of that settlement which he had himself decreed.

Resolved to obtain it by force of arms, I felt it my duty, before I began my march, to invite Citizen Roume to terminate his functions and to retire to Dondon, until he should receive new orders; because intrigue and disaffection would be there less capable of leading him astray. He continues there ready to obey your orders. Whenever you shall claim him, I will send him to France. Whatever may be the calumnies which my enemies may have prevailed upon him to transmit to you against me, I shall abstain from any justification of myself; but while my delicacy compels me to silence, my duty enjoins me to prevent him from acting improperly.

The necessity of carrying on a strict correspondence with my government, and the few opportunities that present themselves for the purpose, induce me to request, Citizen Consul, that you will appropriate L'Enfant Prodigue corvette to that object only, and that you will dispatch it to St. Domingo, once at least in every three months, in order that I may be enabled to transmit to you regularly, at the periods of its return, the precise state of this fine colony, for the prosperity of which you may be assured I shall continue, on all occasions, to exert myself.

Health and profound respect,

TOUSSAINT L'OUVERTURE.

In another letter to the consul, dated Cape François, July 16, he says, "I have this day the satisfaction to inform you, that a constitution has been formed, which promises happiness to the long-suffering inhabitants of the colony, and which I transmit for your approbation." The following is Toussaint's proclamation:—

"Equality.

"French Republic.

"People of St. Domingo,

"The colonial constitution for this important island has just been handed to me by the central assembly, composed of legislators, who, in virtue of my proclamation of the 16th Pluviose last, have met to establish laws which are to regulate and govern us.

I have read that law with attention; and persuaded that it will ensure the welfare of my fellow-citizens, as it is founded on good morals, on localities, and principally on religion, I approve it.

"But when I consider that I am charged with the execution of these constitutional laws, I see that my task is more difficult than that of the legislators has been. Nevertheless, I announce, that however vast and spacious this undertaking may be, I will do my best to go through with it.

"O you, my fellow-citizens, of every age, of every station, and of every colour, you are free; and the constitution, which is this day remitted to me, is to render this liberty eternal.

"Let us, in the first place, prostrate ourselves before the Creator of the Universe, to thank him for his blessings so precious.

"It is my duty to speak to you in the language of truth. This constitution assures to every individual the enjoyment of his rights; it requires of every citizen the practice of the virtues, as it calls within our climate the reign of good morals, and the divine religion of Jesus Christ.

"Therefore, then, magistrates, serve as an example to the people of whom you are to consider yourselves the fathers and the defenders. Let probity and righteousness guide your actions and dictate your sentences. You will secure to yourselves the esteem of your fellow-citizens: it is the sweetest consolation a man in office can desire.

"Brave military men! generals, officers, subalterns, and soldiers! observe discipline and subordination; give activity to culture; be obedient to your chiefs; defend and maintain the constitution against foreign and domestic enemies, who might endeavour to injure it. Let your motto always be Bravery, and your guide Honor; you will deserve well of the country.

"Cultivators! avoid indolence, it is the mother of vices. Guard principally against the seductions of men, as ill-intentioned as malevolent. You will at all times find in me, as well as in the generals my representatives, the repressors of injustice and abuses.

"Industrious inhabitants of the towns! be submissive to the laws; they will not cease to be your protection.

"People, magistrates, and soldiers! I lay before you your duties and mine. For me, I promise, in the face of heaven, to do whatever will depend on me, by the permission of God, to preserve union, peace, and public tranquillity, and consequently the happiness of my fellow-citizens. I promise to execute what is prescribed to me by the constitution. Swear to me, in like manner, before the Supreme Being, that you will submit yourselves to those laws which are to ensure your happiness, and consolidate your liberty.

"Citizens! I inform you that the law is the compass of every citizen; that when it speaks they must yield obedience. The civil and military authorities are to be the first to submit to them, and to give thereby an example to the people. Follow, from point to point, the constitution, which the central and legislative assembly of St. Domingo has just presented to you; and may the sublime principles it has just consecrated remain eternally engraven upon your hearts.

"At all times, my dear fellow-citizens and friends, my desire, my wish, and my ambition, consisted in finding and preparing the means to render you free and happy: if I can attain an object so dear to my heart, I shall not regret life, and I shall go, without any remorse, to render an account of my actions to the Almighty God, the sovereign author of all things.

"Live for ever the French republic and the colonial constitution!

"The general in chief,
(Signed) "TOUSSAINT L'OUVERTURE."

The French consul dispatched a fleet to St. Domingo, consisting of twenty-six ships of war and transports, commanded by Admiral Villaret, with an army of about 25,000 men, at the head of whom was placed General Leclerc, the consul's brother-in-law, assisted by several generals of note, particularly Rochambeau, well known in the West Indies for his attachment to the cause of slavery. Bonaparte sent before this army a proclamation, dated Paris, 8th of November, 1801.

"Inhabitants of St. Domingo!

"Whatever your origin or your colour, you are all French, you are all free, and all equal in the sight of God, and in the estimation of the republic.

"France has been, like St. Domingo, a prey to factions, torn by civil and foreign wars. But all has changed; all people have embraced the French, and have sworn towards them peace and amity; all the French have embraced each other also, and have sworn to be all friends and brothers. Come also, embrace the French, and rejoice to see again your friends and your brothers of Europe.

"The government sends you the captain-general Leclerc: he has brought with him great forces for protecting you against your enemies, and against the enemies of the republic. If it be said to you, 'These forces are destined to ravish from you your liberty;' answer 'The republic will not permit it to be taken away from us.'

"Rally round the captain-general. He brings you abundance and peace. Rally all of you around him. Whoever shall dare to separate himself from the captain-general will be a traitor to his country, and the indignation of the republic will devour him, as the fire devours your dried canes.

Two sons of Toussaint, one about fifteen and the other fourteen, had been sent to France for their education. He had trusted them to French honor and gratitude; yet, to take these youths from their studies, and send them out to inveigle their father, was the project of Napoleon. And lest the news of the great armaments that were preparing should put the negro chief on his guard, means were found to deceive him grossly, both as to the amount of the forces and its destination. Toussaint supposed them to come only with friendly views, and by proclamations enjoined the negroes to receive them with affection, confidence, and respect.

While this chief was working night and day for the good of France, by restoring with all his might the tillage of her richest colony, the French fleet and army were stealing over the sea to destroy him and his useful labours. They at length arrived, and it might be supposed, perhaps, that the first step of General Leclerc was to send notice of his arrival to the lawful governor of the island, whom he was sent to succeed, and demand peaceable possession of the town and forts in which he meant to quarter his forces. No such thing. General Leclerc went to work exactly like an invading enemy in time of war, though he had the modesty afterwards to complain, that he was not received as a friend. The moment he saw the coast of St. Domingo, he broke his force in three divisions, which fell like a sky-rocket, as nearly as possible at the same time, on the three principal towns of the island. At Fort Dauphin, where General Rochambeau arrived with the first division of the army, before the two others could get round to their points of attack, the troops were instantly landed. No summons was sent to give the poor wandering colonists a chance of saving their lives by submission. The troops were drawn up in battle array, on the beach. The negroes ran down in crowds to behold so strange a sight, and before they had any notice of what was designed against them, they were charged with the bayonet, and routed with the loss of many innocent lives.

While by such means possession was obtained of Fort Dauphin, the main body of the fleet and army under Villaret and Leclerc were hastening round to the Cape. They arrived the next day, and instantly prepared to land and take possession of the town; but Christophe, the black general, who commanded at this important post, having heard, no doubt, of the massacre at Fort Dauphin, bravely and loyally refused to suffer them to enter the harbour until he should receive orders from Toussaint, who was absent in the interior country. The French resolved to profit by Toussaint's absence, and therefore landed the troops by force, under cover of the ships, at the expence not only of many lives, but of the destruction of the town, which was set fire to by Christophe, after repeatedly warning the invaders that he should find it his duty so to act. Every where the French demanded instant possession of the forts, and every where punished the refusal by as much murder as they were able to commit.

During this time, the period of about forty-eight hours, Toussaint was at some distance from the coast; and, in order to try the forces of corruption upon this African patriot, Coisson, the tutor of his sons, was sent to him from the smoking ruins of Cape François. The poor lads, ignorant of public affairs, had been taught that it was for their father's good to comply with the wishes of the chief consul; and Bonaparte himself had talked with and caressed them at Paris, in order to impress that opinion on their minds.

With these innocent decoys in his train, and with letters both from General Leclerc and the consul, full of the most high-flown compliments to Toussaint, and the most tempting offers of honors, wealth, and power, Coisson set out from the Cape, and proceeded to the place of the negro's usual abode. His cruel orders were to let the boys see and embrace their father and mother, but not to let them remain: if the father should agree to sell himself, and betray the cause of freedom, he was to be required to come to the Cape to receive the commands of Leclerc, and become his lieutenant-general; but if he should be found proof against corruption and deceit, the boys were to be torn from his arms, and brought back again as hostages. If nothing else could move him, the fears and agonies of a parent's breast might, it was hoped, be effectual to bend his stubborn virtue.

On their arrival at Toussaint's country dwelling, the father was not at home, his urgent public duties having called him to a distant part of the island, where he was probably endeavouring to collect his scattered troops, and to make a stand against the invaders. The mother, however, the faithful wife of Toussaint, was there; and caught her dear long-absent children to her bosom.

Coisson professed to her, as he had declared to all the negroes he met with on his journey, that the consul had no design whatever against their freedom, but wished only for peace, and a due submission to the authority of the republic. The fond mother was ready to believe all he said. She ardently wished that it might be true, and that her beloved husband, with his superior knowledge and judgment, might see cause to confide in these pleasing assurances. She instantly sent off an express to him, to let him know that a messenger from the consul was come, with the offer of peace, liberty, and their children.

Toussaint was so far distant, that, with all his wonderful speed in riding, he did not arrive at Ennery (the place of his home) till the following night. On his arrival, he pressed first the elder boy, then the younger to his heart. Next he stepped back for a moment, to gaze on their features and their persons. Isaac, the elder, was so much grown, that he was almost as tall as his father; his face began to wear a manly air, and Toussaint recalled in him the same image that sometimes met his youthful eyes when he bathed in the clear lake among the mountains. The younger was not yet so near to manhood, but his softer features were not less endearing. The father saw again the playful urchin that used to climb upon his knees, and the very expression that won his heart in the object of his first affection. Again he caught both the youths to his bosom, and his tears dropped fast upon their cheeks.

The father, when he recovered himself, stretched out his arms with an emotion of ill-placed gratitude to the tutor, who seizing this moment as the most favorable for his treacherous designs, retired from the embrace, and assailed him in a set speech, with persuasions to submit to the consul, and join the French standard. On this condition he was assured of "respect, honors, fortune," the office of "lieutenant-general of the island," all, in short, that the gratitude of the republic could offer, or his own heart desire. On the other hand, if he should refuse to submit, the most dreadful horrors and miseries of war were denounced against him and his followers. The implacable vengeance of the great nation was threatened; and the eloquent envoy did not omit to point out to him how hopeless must be all his efforts to resist the armies which had conquered Europe, and which now would have no enemy to contend against, but the rebels of St. Domingo. Above all, he was desired to reflect upon the fate that awaited the hostage youths, so beloved, and so worthy of his affection. "You must submit," said Coisson, "or my orders are to carry my pupils back to the Cape. You will not, I know, cover yourself with infamy, by breaking faith and violating a safe conduct. Behold, then, the tears of your wife; and consider, that upon your decision depends whether the boys shall remain to gladden her heart and yours, or be torn from you both for ever." The orator concluded by putting into the hero's hands the letters of the captain-general and the consul.

Isaac next addressed his afflicted father in a speech which his tutor had, no doubt, assisted him in preparing. He related how kindly he was received by the consul, and what high esteem and regard that chief of the republic professed for Toussaint L'Ouverture and his family. The younger brother added something which he had been taught, to the same effect; and both, with artless eloquence of their own, tried to win their father to a purpose, of the true nature and consequence of which they had no suspicion.

During these heart-rending assaults on the virtue and firmness of Toussaint, the African, checking his tears, and eyeing his children with glances of agonized emotion, maintained a profound silence. "Hearken to your children," cried Coisson, "confide in their innocence; they will tell you nothing but truth." Again the tears of the mother and her boys, and their sobbing entreaties, poured anguish into his bosom. He still remained silent. The conflict of passions and principles within him might have been seen in his expressive features, and in his eager glistening eye.

At length he suddenly composed his agitated visage, gently disengaged himself from the grasp of his wife and children, took the envoy into an inner chamber, and gave him a dignified refusal. "Take back my children," said he, "since it must be so. I will be faithful to my brethren and my God."

After many bloody actions, and six or seven weeks of almost perpetual marching and fighting, the French general thought himself master of St. Domingo. He boasted to his brother-in-law, and the consul proclaimed to all Europe, that the object of the war was accomplished. "Toussaint, without stations, without treasure, without army, is no more than a brigand, wandering from morne to morne, with some brigands like himself, whom our intrepid warriors are pursuing, and whom they will soon have caught and destroyed."

At length a peace was concluded with Toussaint, and all the generals and troops under his command, and the African chief obtained leave to retire. He accordingly went to his peaceful family mansion at Gonaives, which is on the south-west coast of St. Domingo, at a little distance from St. Marks. He had there a little estate, which was called by his own surname, L'Ouverture, and where he perhaps hoped long to enjoy the peace and leisure to which he had for ten years been a stranger, and to indulge his warm affections in the society of his beloved wife and their surviving children; for the two promising youths from whom he had been torn, it is supposed, he never afterwards saw.

On a sudden, at midnight, the Creole frigate, supported by the Hero, a seventy-four gun ship, both dispatched on purpose by Leclerc, from the Cape, stood in towards the Calm Beach, near Gonaïves. Boats, with troops, immediately after landed, and surrounded the house of Toussaint, while he was at rest with the faithful companion of all his cares and dangers.

Brunet, a brigadier-general, and Ferrari, aide-de-camp to Leclerc, entered the chamber of the hero with a file of grenadiers, and demanded of him to go, with all his family, on board the frigate.

Toussaint submitted, as far as concerned his own fate, without gratifying his base enemies by a murmur: but, alive to the fears and to the dangers of his wife and children, he requested that they might be left at home, and would have made that the condition of his own compliance. This condition, however, his ruthless oppressors would not grant; for the destruction of all who were dearest to Toussaint, was part of their perfidious purpose. An irresistible military force appeared, and the whole family, including the niece of a deceased brother, were carried on board the frigate, and from thence embarked in the Hero, which proceeded with them immediately to France.

This unfortunate chief was absolutely refused the comfort of conversing with his family on the passage. He was treated with the utmost rigour, for even the public French accounts disclosed, that he was confined constantly in his cabin, and there guarded by soldiers with fixed bayonets.

No sooner had he arrived in the harbour of Brest than he was hurried on shore; and it was now that his fortitude had to sustain its severest trial. Even the fierce and cruel Leclerc had thought it too harsh to separate him from his beloved wife and children; but he was forced by the merciless consul to bid them a last adieu. They were detained prisoners on ship-board, while he was carried to a solitary cell in a distant castle in the country.

Here he was confined a long time, in a way, the strictness of which may be supposed from the darkness which prevailed as to his fate. His afflicted wife and family were not imprisoned with less closeness than himself; and as their removal was never ascertained, it is naturally concluded that they were all murdered!

This celebrated negro was of the middle stature; he had a fine eye, and his glances were rapid and penetrating; extremely sober by habit, his activity in the prosecution of his enterprizes was incessant. He was an excellent horseman, and travelled, on occasion, with inconceivable rapidity, arriving frequently at the end of his journey alone, or almost unattended; his aid-de-camps and his domestics being unable to follow him in journeys which were often fifty or sixty leagues. He slept generally in his clothes, and gave very little time either to repose or to his meals. Having been born in St. Domingo, he was by birth a slave. By the uncommon kindness of his master, or, as some say, by his own unassisted pains, he learned to read and write, and became the astonishment of his ignorant countrymen. He was remarkably devout, being a sincere Christian, and rose by degrees to be the chief of the blacks. As he was very tenacious of his honor, the greatest reliance was placed on his promises, as may be seen by the following well-authenticated anecdote:—

When he entered into a treaty with General Maitland, by which the island was to be evacuated by the English, (see Book III. Chap. viii.), Toussaint came to see the British commander at his head-quarters; and the general, wishing to settle some points personally with him before the English should embark, returned the visit at Toussaint's camp in the country.

So well was his character known, that the British general did not scruple to go to him with only two or three attendants, though it was at a considerable distance from his own army, and he had to pass through a country full of negroes, who had very lately been his mortal enemies. The commissioner of the French republic, however, did not think so well of the honor of this virtuous chief; for Monsieur Roume, thinking this visit of General Maitland a good opportunity to make him prisoner, wrote a letter to Toussaint, begging him, as he was a true republican, to seize the British general's person. General Maitland proceeded towards Toussaint's camp. On the road he received a letter from one of his private friends, telling him of Monsieur Roume's plot, and warning him not to put himself into the negro general's power: but the known character of Toussaint made the British general still rely upon his honor: besides, the good of his majesty's service required, at that period, that confidence should be placed in this great man, though even at some risk; and General Maitland, therefore, bravely and wisely determined to proceed.

When they arrived at Toussaint's head-quarters, he was not to be seen. General Maitland was desired to wait; and, after much delay, the negro chief still did not appear. The general's mind began to misgive him, as was natural upon a reception seemingly so uncivil, and so conformable to the warning he had received. But at length, Toussaint entered the room with two letters open in his hand: "There, general," said the chief, "read these before we talk together; the one is a letter just received from Roume, and the other my answer. I would not come to you, till I had written my answer to him; that you may see how safe you are with me, and how incapable I am of baseness." General Maitland read the letters, and found the one an artful attempt to excite Toussaint to seize his guest, as an act of duty to the republic; the other, a noble and indignant refusal. "What," said Toussaint, "have I not passed my word to the British general? How then can you suppose that I will cover myself with dishonor, by breaking it? His reliance on my good faith leads him to put himself in my power, and I should be for ever infamous, were I to act as you advise. I am faithfully devoted to the republic, but will not serve it at the expense of my conscience and my honor."

CHAPTER IX.

Negotiations for Peace between Great Britain and France.—Preliminaries signed.—Violent Debates in both Houses of the Imperial Parliament upon the same.—Congress at Amiens.—Definitive Treaty signed.—Observations.

WHILE every shore re-echoed with the thunder of hostile squadrons, and opposing fleets and armies alternately threatened the coasts of Britain and France with insult and invasion, an active intercourse had taken place between the two governments. Flags of truce and of defiance were actually displayed at the same time and in the same strait; so that while Boulogne and Dunkirk were bombarded or blockaded by inimical fleets, the ports of Dover and Calais were frequently visited by the packet-boats, and the messengers of the courts of St. James's and the Thuilleries. Although it was well known, that discussions relative to peace had taken place between the two governments, the public opinion augured ill of the success of the negotiation. Almost three weeks elapsed before an answer was returned by the French government to Lord Hawkesbury's letter to M. Otto, dated June 25; and it noticed the offers of the court of London, merely to express the indignation excited by them. "Can it be believed," said the minister, M. Otto, "that the French people are reduced to such a sad extremity as to sign a disgraceful peace? If, after eight years of a war, which has caused so much blood to be shed, after so many assurances of moderation, so many reciprocal protestations, the French people see themselves obliged to continue the war, is it to be doubted that it will find in its constancy, its population, and its strength, the means of repairing the losses which its allies and itself have only in part restrained; occupied by treasons, by the consequences of the revolution, and the efforts of continental nations?"

The reply of Lord Hawkesbury, dated July 20, after expressing the surprise which he felt at the rejection of proposals so equitable; concluded by demanding, "that the French government would distinctly state to what part of the propositions of his majesty its objections applied; and that it would communicate, with the same frankness which had marked the conduct of his majesty, the conditions which, after a general consideration of circumstances, it might judge proper, to conduct the negotiations to a prompt and happy conclusion."

M. Otto, without delay, made a rejoinder, couched in language extremely cold, and approaching to contempt. He declared, "that the French government was forgetful of nothing that might lead to a general peace, because it was at the same time the interest of humanity and of the allies. It was for the King of England to calculate, if it was equally for the interest of his politics, his commerce, and his nation." M. Otto then stated, that England should keep Ceylon; adding, in explicit terms, "that Egypt should be restored to the Porte; that Minorca should be given back to Spain; that Malta should be restored to the order; that the Cape of Good Hope and the other conquests of England should be restored to the allies: as to Martinico in particular, France would never renounce her right to it. Nothing now remains," added the French minister, in a tone somewhat haughty, "for the British cabinet, but to manifest the part which it will take; and if these conditions cannot satisfy it, it will be proved in the face of the world that the first consul has neglected nothing, and that he has evinced his disposition to make every kind of sacrifice, to re-establish peace, and to spare to humanity the tears and blood which will be the inevitable consequences of a new campaign."

Lord Hawkesbury's answer to the above note was delayed till the 5th of August. "His majesty," the minister said, "had every right to expect that the unreserved and moderate propositions to which he was disposed to accede, for the re-establishment of peace, would have been favorably received by the French government, or, at least, that in the plan of pacification which was offered, there would have been no essential difference. His majesty was convinced that no reasonable objection would be made by the French government to the substance of the conditions which he had proposed : he had therefore a right to expect, that every proposition that might spring from it should be conformable to those principles which had been acknowledged, as those were which appeared in his last communication.--The undersigned flattered himself that the French government would be guided by the same principles, and that the success of the negotiation would not be frustrated by a demand, on its part, of restitutions which the relative situations of the belligerent powers would not allow, and which its own example, in regard to its conquests, did not give it any right to expect, and which his majesty did not consider as according with those principles on which alone an honorable and permanent peace could be concluded. In this view his majesty was disposed to give a new proof of his moderation and sentiments ; and he did not make any difficulty in declaring, that, if the French government would admit of a reasonable arrangement relative to the East Indies, in conformity to the principle which had been acknowledged as the true basis of the negotiations, his majesty was ready to enter into further explanations relative to the island of Malta, and desired seriously to concert the means to form an arrangement which would render it independent both of Great Britain and France."

After this great concession on the part of England, the discussions were resumed, and tended rapidly towards a favorable conclusion. M. Otto informed Lord Hawkesbury, by a note dated 24th Thermidor, (August 11,) that he did not delay a moment to communicate to his government that which he had received of the 5th of August. "It was," said that dexterous negotiator, "with the sincerest satisfaction that the first consul perceived, in the last communication of the British government, that the negotiation began on its part to assume a character calculated to inspire confidence, and to afford the prospect of a termination to those evils which are the inevitable consequences of a war of so long duration. His Britannic majesty having consented that the island of Malta and its dependencies should be placed in such a position as to belong neither to France nor to England, the sole obstacle was removed which the arrangements respecting the Mediterranean still continued to offer. And as to America--his majesty having declared that he was not influenced by any view of ambition and aggrandisement---he thought proper to remark, that the ancient possessions of his majesty in that quarter have their central point in Jamaica, an extensive and opulent colony, strong from its position, but impregnable by the accumulated works which render it superior to all attack ; consequently the ancient possessions of his majesty in America did not require to be augmented, in order to their consolidation or to assure their means of defence. Nevertheless, the French government would not put the peace of the world in balance with the possession of an island but of secondary consequence to France and its allies, and which had been conquered by the arms of his Britannic majesty."

The cession of Trinidad being thus virtually secured to England as a compensation for the acquisition of Olivenza by Spain, nothing of magnitude, long to impede the conclusion of the preliminary treaty, seemed to remain. Another effort was however made, in these circumstances, by Lord Hawkesbury, to retain the island of Martinico, or at least to obtain something, though of inferior value, by way of exchange. In a note, addressed August 14, therefore, to M. Otto, the English minister declared, "that, if the possession of Martinico by his majesty be considered by the French government as an insurmountable obstacle to the return of peace, his majesty might be induced to renounce his just pretension in this respect, on condition that the French government would consent to the following alternative : In the 1st place, That his majesty might keep, in the West Indies, the islands of Trinidad and Tobago ; and, in this case, Demerary, Essequibo, and Berbice, should be free ports. 2dly, That his majesty should retain possession of St. Lucia, Tobago, Demerary, Essequibo, and Berbice."

This note occasioned some discussion ; and France being desirous to spare his Catholic majesty the mortification of ceding the island of Trinidad, in which case Portugal might doubtless have preserved the district of Olivenza, the first consul was induced---"contrary to the immoveable basis which had been so long established in France, that the peace ought not to cost any personal sacrifice to the republic"--to offer Tobago and Curaçao in lieu of Trinidad ; for, as to the cession of Martinico, the French government would not deign to hearken even for a moment to the mention of a proposition so degrading. But the English government refused to depart from its demand of Trinidad.

On the 7th of September a long conference took place between the two ministers, in which the substance of the preliminary articles was finally arranged. The most remarkable difference which arose on this occasion related to the article stipulating the integrity of the kingdom of Portugal. For Lord Hawkesbury proposing to substitute, for the word kingdom, the words "territory and possessions of her most Faithful majesty," citizen Otto refused to consent to the alteration, as it might weaken the arrangements made at Badajoz respecting the limits of Guiana.— Agreeably to the views of the English cabinet, Lord Hawkesbury still continued to exert some efforts to gain the island of Tobago from France, in addition to Trinidad, as well as to prevail that Demerary, Essequibo, and Berbice should be declared free ports—concessions which the utmost firmness, combined with the greatest address, could alone hope to obtain. But, by their wavering conduct, the English ministry incurred the mortification of a peremptory, not to say imperious, declaration, on the part of the French government, as communicated from M. Talleyrand to M. Otto, 24th Fructidor (September 11), "that, if the propositions in question were sustained, they would destroy all the dispositions announced on the part of the English government, and which they had given room to hope for, and to have seen the salutary work of peace immediately terminated. For, in fine," said this minister, "it is not when it has ceded all that is compatible with its honor that a government can suffer new sacrifices to be torn from it; and the first consul, treating in the name of the French people, will never subscribe to conditions in which the honor of the nation is compromised. It is prescribed to you, citizen, to give a formal assurance of it." M. Otto was also charged to add verbally to this declaration, "that the first consul having gone as far as honor would permit him, there was no room to hope that he would make one step more."

In the reply, September 22d, to this ultimatum on the part of France, Lord Hawkesbury consented that the limits of French Guiana should be extended to the river Ariwari, provided that the integrity of all the states of her most Faithful majesty in Europe be maintained. He also renounced the pretensions of his Britannic majesty respecting the settlements of Demerary, Essequibo, and Berbice: but, persisting in the indulgence of a hope as to the third point of difference, this nobleman added, "From the disposition that his majesty has shown to get rid of every other difficulty, he cannot suppose that the French government will raise a new obstacle on the possession of the island of Tobago. It is an ancient property of his crown; the people are almost entirely English colonists; and it is not of any value or interest to France."

This attempt being rejected by the French government, the preliminary articles of peace, fifteen in number, were at length signed, on the evening of the 1st of October (1801), by the two ministers plenipotentiary.

Conformably to the tenor of these articles, his Britannic majesty agreed to restore to the French republic and her allies all the possessions and colonies conquered by the British arms during the war—the island of Trinidad and the Dutch possessions in Ceylon excepted. "The port of the Cape of Good Hope shall be open to the commerce and navigation of the two contracting parties, who shall enjoy therein the same advantages. The island of Malta, with its dependencies, shall be evacuated by the troops of his Britannic majesty, and restored to the order of St. John of Jerusalem. For the purpose of rendering this island completely independent of either of the two contracting parties, it shall be placed under the guarantee and protection of a third power, to be agreed upon in the definitive treaty. Egypt shall be restored to the sublime Porte, whose territories and possessions shall be preserved entire, such as they existed previously to the present war. The territories and possessions of her most Faithful majesty shall likewise be preserved entire. The French forces shall evacuate the kingdom of Naples and the Roman territory. The English forces shall, in like manner, evacuate Porto Ferrajo, and generally all the ports and islands which they may occupy in the Mediterranean, or in the Adriatic. The republic of the Seven Islands shall be acknowledged by the French republic. The fisheries on the coasts of Newfoundland, and in the Gulph of St. Laurence, shall be restored to the same footing on which they were before the present war. And, finally, plenipotentiaries shall be named on each side, who shall repair to Amiens for the purpose of concluding a definitive treaty of peace in concert with the allies of the contracting parties."

Fortunately for ministers, the desire of peace was so great, that few persons were inclined very severely to scrutinize the articles of this preliminary treaty. The intelligence that peace was concluded, diffused through the nation the most sincere and cordial satisfaction. The public were well aware that France was made great by the war, and not by the peace; respecting the specific conditions of which they displayed almost a frigid indifference. Even judges of a far superior class, knowing the difficulties with which ministers had to contend, confiding in their good intentions, and weary of a senseless contest, seemed willing to view the errors and omissions of this treaty with extreme indulgence. It was thought, indeed, an extraordinary procedure, virtually to transfer the possession of Porto Ferrajo to France, without securing either Malta or Minorca to England. It was believed that abler negotiators might at least have obtained the restitution of the island of Tobago, which England was under the necessity, in very different circumstances, of ceding to France by the treaty of 1783. But, above all, it excited astonishment, not altogether unmixed with indignation, that no regard whatever was paid, in this preliminary treaty, to the interests of the antient and unfortunate ally of England, the King of Sardinia; the integrity of whose dominions had been, at the commencement of the war, guaranteed by Great Britain, who had even engaged, by a positive convention with that power, not to conclude any peace with France till Savoy was restored. This omission, however, they hoped might be rectified by some provision of the definitive treaty.

On the 12th of October the ratification of the first consul was brought to London by Colonel Lauriston, one of his aides-de-camp, who was welcomed with loud and universal acclamations; and the event was celebrated in both countries by every public demonstration of joy. The Count D'Artois, then anxiously waiting in London the issue of the negotiation, and other emigrants of distinction, acknowledging this treaty as the utter extinction of their hopes, and dreading the arrival of a French ambassador, retired precipitately to their former asylum in the city of Edinburgh.

The second session of the Imperial parliament was opened on the 29th of October, 1801, by the king in person, who in his speech announced the favorable conclusion of the negotiation begun during the last session of parliament. He declared his satisfaction that the difference with the northern powers had been adjusted by a convention with the Emperor of Russia, to which the kings of Denmark and Sweden had expressed their readiness to accede. "The essential rights," said his majesty, "for which we contended, are thereby secured; and provision is made that the exercise of them shall be attended with as little molestation as possible to the subjects of the contracting parties." He then proceeded to state, that preliminaries of peace had also been ratified between himself and the French republic; and he trusted that this important arrangement, whilst it manifested the justice and moderation of his views, would also be found conducive to the substantial interests of this country, and honorable to the British character.

In the house of peers the address was moved by Lord Bolton (formerly Mr. Orde), who observed, that it was a magnificent triumph for England, to make a peace in the very midst of her conquests from the frozen seas of the north to the Pillars of Hercules, and from Africa to the remotest shores of Asia and America. His lordship contrasted, on this occasion, the conduct of Great Britain with that of Germany, which he styled "disunited, parricidal, and treacherous."

Our allies, he said, had in an evil hour chosen to desert us, and we had been left to fight the battle for ourselves; but the struggle was glorious, and the termination happy. At the period when the peace was made, it was evident that the integrity of Europe could not be preserved: had this been possible, it would have been effected by the power of Great Britain.

The Duke of Bedford, in a speech which contained much censure of the late, and praise of the present administration, declared his cordial concurrence in the address, which was carried without a dissentient voice.

In the house of commons Mr. Fox expressed the same sentiments of approbation respecting the peace, in which he was warmly seconded by Mr. Pitt. On the other hand, Mr. Windham, the late secretary at war, professed his entire disapprobation of the preliminaries recently signed with France, and avowed himself to be a solitary mourner in the midst of the public rejoicings upon that event. In signing the peace, he thought that his honorable friends, the present ministers, had signed the death-warrant of the country.

Mr. Sheridan adverted to the language in which Mr. Pitt had spoken of the terms of the peace as glorious and honorable—in which he could not agree. It was, in his opinion, a peace of which every one was glad, but no one proud: it was such a sort of a peace as might be expected after such a sort of a war—a war the most pernicious in which this country had ever been engaged; and the peace was, perhaps, as good as any minister could make, considering the circumstances in which the country was placed. The motion was finally carried with the same unanimity as in the upper house.

On the 3d of November the subject of the preliminaries was taken formally into consideration by the lords, and a decided opposition to the terms of the peace expressed by the Earls Spencer, Caernarvon, and Fitzwilliam, the Marquis of Buckingham, Lord Grenville, and the Bishop of St. Asaph. It was defended by the Lord-chancellor, the Duke of Bedford, the Earls of Moira, Westmoreland, and St. Vincent, Lords Hobart and Pelham, and the Bishop of London. On this occasion Lord Nelson avowed it to be his opinion, that Malta was, in a naval and political view, of trivial consequence, being at too great a distance from Toulon to watch the French fleet from that port. In time of peace it would have required a garrison of 7000 men, and a much larger in time of war, without being of any real utility. The island of Minorca also (though in the vicinity of Toulon) his lordship declared to be of no importance as a naval station; neither did he consider the settlement of the Cape as of any great value. The war had, indeed, been long; but he believed his majesty had seized the first opportunity of making peace, the conditions of which, he was convinced, were the most advantageous that could be procured in the existing circumstances.

The house at length divided, when there appeared for the address, as moved by ministers, 114—against it, 10.

On the same day a similar address was moved in the house of commons; when the peace was fiercely assailed by Mr. Windham, Mr. Thomas Grenville, and Lord Temple.

Mr. Pitt said, that it was his misfortune to differ from those with whom it had been his happiness to live in habits of the strictest friendship. He did not pretend to state that this peace fully answered all his wishes; but the government had obtained the best terms they could; and they were such as could not be rejected without incurring the imputation of continuing the war without any adequate necessity. He spoke highly of the value of the conquests Britain had retained—Ceylon and Trinidad: and though he would not depreciate the importance of Malta, he thought it, compared with the Indies, but a secondary consideration. It appeared to him sound policy rather to place Malta under the protection of a third power, capable of defending it, than, by retaining it ourselves, to mortify the pride and attract the jealousy of the enemy. He asserted that the resources of the country ought not to be lavished away in continuing a contest with the certainty of an enormous expense, and when it was by no means clear that we might not ultimately be obliged to sit down in a worse relative situation than the present. He would not occupy the attention of the house by going back to the origin of the war; but, peace being restored, forbearance of language and terms of respect were proper.

Mr. Fox expressed his cordial concurrence in the address. Upon the whole, and in reference to situation and circumstances, he regarded the peace as both safe and honorable. A glorious peace he could not style it; for such a peace could be the result only of a glorious war. He confessed himself not one of those who deemed Trinidad or Ceylon preferable to Malta; but, by insisting on Malta or the Cape, either the war would have been prolonged, or a loss of national dignity sustained by making the concession on our part from compulsion; for these were points which France, he was convinced, would never have yielded. He commended ministers in not having sought to delude us by the jargon of their predecessors; by senseless assertions of the French being now on the verge, and now in the gulf of bankruptcy. They justly considered France as a great and formidable foe, in treating with whom, they had wisely tempered firmness of conduct with moderation of tone. As to the real object of the war, Mr. Fox confessed, that he always understood it to be the restoration of the house of Bourbon. Not that it was the sine qua non; but he contended that the late ministers had avowed it with confidence, prosecuted it with perseverance, and relinquished it with reluctance. Not having been able to obtain their end, it was now allowed that the nation must content itself with gaining its secondary purpose. But what rational person ever deemed even this secondary purpose to be attained by the acquisition of Ceylon and Trinidad? Who could have thought that ministers, who had for a series of years entertained such grand and magnificent designs, should at last content themselves with Ceylon in the east, and Trinidad in the west, wrested from Holland and Spain, by way of indemnity for the past, and security for the future, against the ambitious projects of Gallic aggrandisement in Europe?

The terms of the treaty were, on grounds analogous to those argued upon by Mr. Pitt, zealously defended by Lord Hawkesbury and the other members of administration; and the house, justly weary of the war, was easily impressed by the reasonings of ministers in favor of the peace. The chancellor of the exchequer concluded the debate with some judicious and conciliatory observations. He remarked, "that the duty of negotiation commenced when all hope of continental aid in checking the power of France was at an end. We had closed the contest on our part with honor." But he acknowledged it to depend upon the wisdom of government, whether this peace should be a blessing or a misfortune to the country. He could only say, as it had been made sincerely, it should be kept faithfully. No encouragement should be given to any person in this realm to subvert the present government of France; and a line of conduct ought to be pursued, not of suspicion and jealousy, but of prudence and circumspection: and it would be necessary, he added, "to provide means of security never before known in times of peace." The motion was then agreed to without a division.

In the course of a few months, Amiens, the city assigned for this meeting, was visited by the ministers of the respective powers, and after long and tedious delay, the definitive treaty was signed by Lord Cornwallis, Joseph Bonaparte, the chevalier D'Azare, and Mr. Schimmelpenninck, on the 25th of March, 1802.

The principal point gained by England in the course of the negotiation, was the concession made by France respecting the treaty concluded by that power with Portugal, at Madrid, almost at the same moment in which the preliminary articles were signed between Great Britain and

BOOK V.

CHAP. IX.

1802.

France at London. By that treaty, the limits of French Guiana were extended to the Orellana, or river of the Amazons; and the free navigation of that mighty stream would, doubtless, in time, have proved of infinite importance to the establishment of the Gallic power in South America. But by the definitive treaty, the first consul consented that the river Arawari, to the north of the Orellana, should constitute the future boundary between the two countries. On the other hand, the cession of the district of Olivenza, contrary to the obvious meaning of that article of the preliminaries which declared, "that the territories and possessions of her most faithful majesty should be preserved entire," was confirmed to Spain.

The article respecting Malta, framed by the court of London, was guarded by so many minute and studied precautions, as to exhibit, in a striking view, the hostile spirit of distrust and suspicion subsisting in the midst of the reciprocal professions of peace. By the fourth regulation under this article, it was expressly stipulated, "that the forces of his Britannic majesty should evacuate the island and its dependencies within three months from the exchange of the ratifications, or sooner if possible. At that epoch it should be given up to the order in its present state, provided (1st), that the grand-master, or commissaries fully authorised, according to the statutes of the order, should be in the island to take possession; and (2dly), that the force which was to be provided by his Sicilian majesty should have arrived there."

Conformably to this article, regarded both by France and England as one of the most important in the treaty, the absolute surrender of the island to the order of St. John was clearly and unequivocally engaged for by the latter, on the two conditions annexed. But by the sixth regulation, it was likewise agreed, that the independence of the isles of Malta, of Gozo, and Comino, as well as the present arrangement, should be placed under the protection and guarantee of France, Great Britain, Austria, Spain, Russia, and Prussia.

In reference to the specific guarantees required on this occasion, it may be remarked, that Spain was manifestly and entirely under the controul of France; that Prussia was a power, which, conformably to the fixed and obvious rules of her policy, would be anxious to maintain an amicable correspondence with France; that Russia was too potent, and placed at too great a distance from France, to entertain any serious apprehensions from the growth of her power; that Malta was not to her a subject of much interest or importance; and divers of the stipulations relative to the new arrangement, particularly the introducing of a Maltese langue into the order of St. John, were known to be displeasing to her, and contrary to the engagements she had entered into with the knights of that order. Austria was the only power who upon this, and indeed upon all other occasions, could be expected fully and cordially to enter into the views and interests of Great Britain.

The intelligence of the conclusion of the definitive treaty was, notwithstanding all previous jealousies, received both in France and England with much satisfaction, and celebrated with great rejoicings; the streets of London were uncommonly brilliant; but the thunder and lightning which suddenly happened on this very night, (by the latter of which the illuminations were frequently eclipsed), marred, in a great measure, the public merriment, and filled the superstitious, who judged it as ominous, with consternation and alarm.

CHAPTER X.

Review of Occurrences in Europe during this Period.—Conduct of the Court of St. Petersburg.—Situation of Germany, Switzerland, and Holland.—Treaties between France and Turkey.—Russia and the Pope.—American Affairs.

WHEN the negotiations were renewed at Luneville, subsequent to the fatal defeat of Hohenlinden, the first consul insisted that the emperor should treat not only for himself, but for the empire, conformably to the example of the emperor Charles VI. at the treaties of Baden and Rastadt. In vain did the Count Cobentzel urge, that no such powers were granted by the diet in the present as in the former instances: the chief consul, justly suspicious of the consequences of protraction, absolutely refused to conclude with the emperor in his royal capacity merely; and the treaty was at length signed, without any special authority from the diet of the empire, by Count Cobentzel, according to his instructions from the court of Vienna, as plenipotentiary of his imperial majesty, in his capacity of emperor as well as king; engaging that it should be ratified by the diet in the space of thirty days.

Immediately consequent to this very unusual if not unprecedented exercise of power, the emperor addressed an apologetical letter to the diet, dated February 21, 1801, in which he excused his own conduct in terms the most handsome and respectful to the princes of the empire; stating the urgent necessity of the case, "from the consideration of the melancholy situation in which a considerable part of Germany then was; and that of the still more unhappy fate with which the superiority of the French threatened the empire, should peace be longer deferred." The diet, on their part, with cheerfulness and deference acquiesced in these reasonings; expressing "their gratitude to the chief of the empire for the patriotic zeal he had shown in that negotiation;" and, not only did that assembly ratify the treaty of Luneville, but, by a subsequent conclusum, dated April 30, they intrusted and impowered his imperial majesty "to take upon himself the adjustment of all the objects which by that treaty were reserved for particular arrangement," only communicating the result to the diet in order to its final decision and ratification.

In the month of April, while the question of peace and war between Great Britain and Russia was still doubtful, the new emperor, Alexander, through the medium of his ambassador at Paris, Count Kalitcheff, made very pressing instances to the first consul to reinstate the King of Sardinia in the possession of the dominions which he had enjoyed previous to the irruption of the French armies into Italy, conformably to the engagements entered into by France with the late emperor. He even went so far as to declare, that, if this demand was not acceded to, there could be no restoration of harmony between the two countries. And in the beginning of May the ambassador required a specific answer, "whether the French government intended to keep its promise concerning the integrity of the kingdom of the Two Sicilies, and the re-establishment of the King of Sardinia in his dominions?" To this requisition M. Talleyrand replied, in terms civilly evasive, "that the first consul was disposed to do every thing that might be pleasing and agreeable to the court of Russia; and that this end would have been attained sooner, if the negotiations with England, the situation of affairs in Italy and Egypt, and the war with Portugal, had not thrown certain invincible obstacles in the way of the business."

Though there is no reason to doubt the sincerity and good-will of the court of Petersburg in relation to the Kings of Sicily and Sardinia, it was an object of far superior importance, in her estimation, to avoid embroiling herself anew with either of the two great belligerent powers, France or England. On the one hand, therefore, immediately subsequent to the conventional pacification with the latter, the emperor issued an edict, not only commanding the property of the British merchants, which had been sequestered during the late reign, to be restored, but that, for such effects as had been irretrievably alienated, a full equivalent should be granted to the respective proprietors. And on the other hand, nearly at the same time, a circular letter was transmitted by that court to all its diplomatic ministers and agents, informing them, "that negotiations for the purpose of establishing a reconciliation with France were in train," and enjoining them "to testify on all occasions to the ambassadors of the French government, that respect which is usual between the ministers of powers that are in good understanding with each other." Such was the wisdom and moderation by which the counsels of Russia, under the auspices of the present sovereign, were conducted.

The Elector of Cologne (who also held the bishopric of Munster), uncle to the emperor, dying about this time, the King of Prussia signified to the court of Vienna, and likewise to the chapters of Cologne and Munster, "his request that no new election might be proceeded upon; but that, on account of the great existing embarrassment, the archbishopric and bishopric do remain vacant for the present;" adding, that "if such election should nevertheless be proceeded upon, he would be obliged to declare the same null and void." This was seconded by a declaration of M. Bacher, minister of France at the diet, then sitting at Ratisbon, that the French government would support with all its power the determination of his Prussian majesty; and requiring that "all appointments to ecclesiastical dignities and possessions, and especially the election of a new elector of Cologne and bishop of Munster, be deferred till the indemnifications for the hereditary princes shall be definitively determined."

The emperor, however, prompted rather by pride than policy, encouraged and authorized the two chapters to proceed to the respective elections at the usual time, and in the accustomed form; agreeably to which the Archduke Anthony, a younger brother of the emperor, was chosen to fill the vacant sees. This event was formally notified by the court of Vienna to that of Berlin; his Imperial majesty at the same time declaring, that the course of the accomplishing of the indemnities, by means of secularization, would not be altered from personal consideration or secondary views; and that the late election of the archduke would not have the smallest influence on the conduct of the high imperial court; in fine, that BOOK V. the government of those sees would in the mean time be continued in all respects in the same manner as if they were vacant."

CHAP. X.

1801.

The good sense and moderation of the King of Prussia induced him to appear satisfied with this explanation; and, in his reply, he applauded the wise resolution of the emperor to postpone the further steps which one or both of the chapters might wish to adopt with respect to the election of the archduke.

The business of the indemnities proceeded very slowly and heavily. About the end of the summer, a conclusum passed the diet, appointing an extraordinary deputation, consisting of eight members, four of the catholic and four of the protestant religion, to "co-operate, on the part of the states of the empire, in the work of peace." And to this deputation were given "full and unlimited powers to examine, treat, and regulate, in concert with the French government, the objects which, by the 5th and 7th articles of the treaty of Luneville, were reserved for a particular arrangement." This conclusum was ratified by the emperor, with strong expressions of commendation—the former mode of negotiating, agreeably to the usual forms, experiencing, as he expressed it, "powerful and multiplied obstacles;" and his imperial majesty was probably far from being eager to take the entire responsibility of this arrangement upon himself. But the negotiation appeared still to languish: and a more energetic interposition was too evidently necessary to bring so complex and difficult a business to a final decision.

By the 11th article of the treaty of Luneville, the independence of the Batavian, Helvetic, Cisalpine, and Ligurian republics, was expressly recognised; and "the right of the people who inhabit them to adopt what form of government they pleased." With a view to carry into effect this inestimable privilege, a convention of the Helvetic cantons was, in the month of September, held at the city of Berne, to consider of a definitive organization. This assembly, composed of very dissonant materials, determined, after vehement debate, upon certain articles, as the basis of a permanent constitution, importing, that the Helvetic republic formed only ONE state—that there was only ONE right of Helvetic citizenship—and no political rights of citizens relative to distinct cantons. The senate possessed, together with the proposal of laws, the direction of the general measures of government by the medium of an executive council; the diet was to assemble ordinarily on the 1st of February every year, and to consist of deputies from all the cantons in proportion to their population.

This plan of government was, however, extremely odious to the lesser or democratic cantons, and the deputies from Uri, Schweitz, and Underwald, with that distinguished soldier and citizen Aloys Reding at their head, after protesting against the decision of the assembly, suddenly departed for their respective homes. This produced a great sensation, and thirteen other members of the convention formed a schism, and declared, that "the deputies of the three most ancient cantons, the nursery of true Helvetic liberty, having separated, the diet must be considered as imperfect and incompetent."

Their firmness, but still more the influence of public opinion, brought over in a few days a majority to the dissidents, who, on the 28th of October, proceeded without delay to the formation of a central government, composed of a senate and an executive council, from which the most intractable innovators were excluded: a government which recognised and sanctioned the sovereignties of the democratic cantons within their own jurisdictions, and at the head of which Aloys Reding was placed as first landamman of Switzerland.

During the space of two months which succeeded this event, France observed a profound silence respecting it. The ardent mind of Reding, impatient of delay, and disdaining uncertainty, determined him to resort in person to Paris, in order to demand a categorical answer from the French government as to its final intentions respecting Helvetia. On the arrival of the landamman in that metropolis, he was received by M. Bonaparte with great civility and distinction; and, after the first compliments, a letter was delivered by Aloys Reding to the first consul from the three ancient cantons, vindicatory of their conduct. "Deprived of all resources," said they, "the three cantons of the Helvetic confederacy, Uri, Schweitz, and Underwald, feel too strongly the absolute necessity of a constitution founded on the simplicity and economy of their ancestors, not to signify to you, citizen first consul, the ardent desire which they have of preserving, as much as possible, that which the fathers of liberty have founded, and which during nearly five hundred years has constituted the happiness of their children. Europe knows with what firmness, and with what devotion, out of all proportion to their strength, the descendants of TELL have struggled for its preservation. The diversity of worship, manners, education, customs, wants, and many other circumstances, render a uniformity of administration impossible, and the attempt could not fail totally to destroy us. Citizen first consul, one word from you would render impotent those ambitious individuals, who have influence only in proportion as they impress the idea that they are supported by France. We request this word with confidence, persuaded that it can neither be your intention, nor for the interest of France, to increase the misfortunes of a people who have already suffered so much, and who desire only tranquillity and repose."

The first consul seemingly listened with attention to this application: he even went so far as to declare to the landamman, in a conference which took place between them on the 20th of December, that the democratic cantons should enjoy their ancient laws and customs. After a short interval, nevertheless, a letter was addressed to the landamman by the first consul, dated 16th Nivose, year X. or January 6, 1802, containing some remarkable passages which seemed to indicate intentions less favorable to the re-establishment of the ancient system. "You," said he to the landamman, "appear actuated by a desire for the happiness of your country. May you be seconded by your countrymen; and may Helvetia resume her place among the powers of Europe! You have experienced great evils. A grand result remains to you—the equality and liberty of your fellow-citizens. Whatever be now the birth-place of a Swiss, the shores of Lake Lemman or those of the Aar, he is free. This is the only thing I see distinctly in your present political order of things. Why should not your countrymen make an effort? Let them call forth the patriotic virtues of their ancestors! Let them sacrifice the spirit of faction to the love of public happiness and public liberty!"

To this letter a second conference succeeded, in which the first consul declared to the landamman, that the re-admission of the oligarchs of Berne into the federative body could by no means be approved of by France; but that, in consideration of the high esteem M. Reding personally enjoyed in the little cantons, she would not oppose his continuing to be president, provided six individuals, whom the first consul pointed out, all leaders of the revolutionary party, and who had been left out two months before, were again introduced into the senate, in order to pass from thence into the executive council, and there fill the place of certain ministers equally pointed out by name.

On the return of the landamman to Switzerland, which speedily ensued, he communicated this declaration to his colleagues; who considering this compromise in the light of a compact, acceded, not without regret, to the conditions required of them; and the persons nominated by the first consul were accordingly introduced into the senate.

Under the auspices of the landamman, a new federal code was framed, founded on principles of equity, and holding a kind of medium between the extreme pretensions of both parties. Three months had been employed in these labours, when the landamman adjourned the senate, with the view of retiring during the Easter holidays to his domestic residence in the canton of Schweitz, enjoying apparently a very fair prospect of soon seeing the prosperous termination of his arduous and patriotic exertions. To the grief, however, of the friends of liberty throughout Europe, who held in veneration the heroes of Morgarten, Sempach, and Morat, and to whom the very name of Switzerland was dear, the calamities of that devoted country had not yet attained to their destined period.

Nearly at this time very considerable changes, and, probably, improvements, were made by the Batavian government in its existing constitution, no doubt with the approbation, if not the previous suggestion, of France, but apparently also with the willing concurrence of the people, to whom they were formally presented for acceptance. Conformably to the present model, the republic was divided into eight departments, corresponding to the ancient provinces, and the generality, or acquired territory. The government was vested in a regency, consisting of twelve members; one member to be annually chosen from a list of four persons nominated by the departments conjointly, and transmitted by them to the regency, which should reduce the names to two; the legislative body finally appointing one of these to the vacant seat. The members of the regency to vacate their seats in rotation, one in each year, on the 1st of November. The legislative body to consist of thirty-five members, to be chosen by the active citizens of the several departments. The laws to be proposed by the council of regency to the legislative body, and discussed by a committee of twelve, chosen by a plurality of voices for the term of session ordinary or extraordinary; and the members of the legislature to pronounce on the projects presented to them by a simple negative or affirmative.

In the autumn of this year, a treaty of peace was signed between France and the electoral-palatine of Bavaria, who had been ever secretly attached to the French interest, justly apprehensive, agreeably to the policy of his ancestors, of the Austrian power and insatiable passion for aggrandisement, to which that electorate seemed obviously and incessantly in danger of being made the sacrifice. "Convinced that it is her interest to prevent the Bavaro-Palatine possessions from being reduced to a state of weakness, the French republic," by this treaty, "engaged to use all its influence, and all its means, to obtain for the electoral-palatine house a territorial indemnity, situated as well as possible for its convenience, and equivalent to the losses of every kind which have been the consequence of the present war."

Immediately subsequent to the signature of the preliminaries of peace with Great Britain, the first consul hastened to conclude a treaty with the Ottoman Porte, which was signed at Paris, October the 9th, by the French minister Talleyrand and Esseyd Ali Effendi, formerly ambassador from Turkey, but who had been detained as a hostage at Paris some years, and was now again recognised in his diplomatic capacity to answer the present purpose. The tenor of this treaty was very advantageous to France, which was restored by it to all her pristine rights of commerce and navigation, and also to a full participation of those privileges which might in future be granted to the most favored nations.

At the same period, a formal treaty of peace was also signed between France and Russia; another between Spain and Russia; by which the political and commercial relations of the respective countries were re-established as before the war.

Another treaty, or convention, of a nature equally singular and important, and which had been for several months past under discussion, was finally concluded and signed on the 10th of September, between his holiness Pope Pius VII. on the one part, and Bonaparte, first consul of the French republic, on the other. The object of this convention, which obtained the appellation of a concordatum, was the re-establishment of the Roman catholic religion in France; not indeed in that mode or form in which it had subsisted under the monarchy, but in a modest and humble guise, adapted to present circumstances, and to the feelings and wishes of the French nation; a great majority of whom were attached to the catholic doctrines, though perhaps not properly papists in the strict or rigid sense of the word. The sovereign pontiff, who had long since regarded France as sunk into the depths of heresy and infidelity, thought scarcely any concessions too great to make on this occasion, for the purpose of reclaiming and recovering this great country to the profession of the true faith, and of receiving back so many millions of erring souls into the bosom of the church.

In the month of November, and not till then, the King of Prussia yielded to the pressing instances of the court of London, and withdrew his troops from the electorate of Hanover, where he had probably determined that they should remain during the continuance of the war. They were maintained for the space of eight months at the expence of the electorate. But the discipline of the Prussian army was meritorious and exemplary; and the policy of the monarch of Prussia, on the whole, appeared firm, steady, and laudable.

At the close of the preceding year, Mr. Jefferson was, after a violent and long-protracted struggle, elected President of the United States of America, in the room of Mr. Adams; and, on the 9th of March, 1801, he made to the two houses of congress, upon his first entrance on his high office, a most admirable speech, in which he stated, with luminous energy, the principles upon which he proposed to act, and which, in his view, constituted the basis of all just government. "About to enter, fellow-citizens," said this statesman, "on the exercise of duties which comprehend every thing dear and valuable to you, it is proper you should understand what I deem the essential principles of our government: equal and exact justice to all men, of whatever state or persuasion, religious or political; peace, commerce, and honest friendship, with all nations; entangling alliances with none; the support of the state governments in all their rights; the preservation of the general government in its whole constitutional vigour; a jealous care of the right of election by the people; a mild and safe corrective of abuses, which are lopped by the sword of revolution where peaceable remedies are unprovided; the supremacy of the civil over the military authority; economy in the public expence; the sacred preservation of the public faith; encouragement of agriculture, and of commerce as its handmaid; the diffusion of information, and arraignment of all abuses at the bar of public reason; freedom of religion, freedom of the press, and freedom of the person, under protection of the habeas corpus, and trial by juries impartially selected. Should we wander from these principles in moments of error or of alarm, let us hasten to retrace our steps, and regain the road which alone leads to peace, liberty, and safety." Of the success of his efforts, notwithstanding his strong conviction of the rectitude of his principles, the new president entertained, however, a becoming distrust.—"With experience enough," said he, "in subordinate offices, to have seen the difficulties of this, the greatest of all, I have learned to expect that it will rarely fall to the lot of imperfect man to retire from this station with the reputation and favor which bring him into it."

State of Affairs in France.—Ratification and Celebration of the Concordatum.—Bonaparte declared First Consul for Life.—Abdication of the King of Sardinia.—Piedmont united to France.—Dissensions in Switzerland.—Heroism of M. Reding.—Armed Mediation of France.—Final Pacification of Switzerland.—Treaty of Alliance between France and the Ottoman Porte, and with the Dey of Algiers.

THE period now arrived for the re-election in France of a fifth of the members of the legislative body and the tribunate. During the preceding session it appeared, that the authority of the first consul was by no means so absolute in those assemblies as had been generally supposed; and the civil code presented for their acceptance was, in consequence of the formidable opposition which it was destined to encounter, withdrawn by him, not without some indications of chagrin and resentment. In his concluding message (December 29, 1801), the first consul declared, "that it was with regret the government found themselves obliged to postpone to another period laws expected by the nation with so much interest. But they were convinced that the time was not yet arrived when these great discussions might be carried on with that calmness and unity of intention which they required." This censure was, perhaps, not unfounded; but the first consul might have learned, from the practice of the constituent powers of the British government, among other salutary lessons, the dignified decorum, which invariably avoids ascribing, even in those cases wherein they differ, improper motives of action to each other. The chief opposers of the plan proposed by the executive government were, however, excluded by the vote of the senate at the period of re-election; among these were the distinguished names of Barthelemy, Chenier, Bailleul, Daunou, Garat, Isnard, &c.; and the ensuing session fully proved that the consular power and influence were not less than regal.

Bonaparte, after getting ten years added to his consulate, now got himself named First Consul of France for life. The next step was the senate's giving him permission to name a successor. This extension of his power gave much alarm to the Emperor of Germany and the English; so much indeed that the imperial court, though obliged by the treaty of Luneville to admit the German indemnities, was greatly averse to the business.

The Queen of Sardinia, sister of Louis XVI. and married to Charles Emanuel II., King of Sardinia (then Prince of Piedmont) in 1775, died at Naples, March 1802; and on the 4th of June following, that monarch abdicated his crown in favor of his brother the Duke d'Aosta. Emanuel still retained the empty title of king, and retired to the vicinity of Rome, where, in the delightful retreat of Frascati, hoping to pass the remainder of his days, absolved from the anxious cares of royalty, in peaceful, though sad and inglorious, obscurity.

The hard fate of the house of Savoy excited throughout Europe universal compassion; and the total desertion of the interests of that house by England, at the treaty of Amiens, could scarcely be forgiven even by those who were most desirous of peace. It is true, that the Sardinian monarch had renounced his alliance with Great Britain; but this was the effect, not of any want of good faith, but of an irresistible and over-ruling compulsion.

In consequence of the refusal of France to restore Piedmont, Great Britain had refused to recognize the new republics of Italy and the ducal monarchy of Etruria. Bonaparte however ventured by an organie senatus consultum formally to unite that principality with its appendages—which, previous to the decree of union, had borne the appellation merely of the 27th military division—to the territory of the French republic. This important acquisition was, by the same decree, divided into six departments under the names of the Po, the Doria, the Sezia, the Stura, the Tanaro, and the department of Maringo, which sent collectively seventeen members to the legislative body.

Another occasion of jealousy, or more properly speaking, of animosity, at this period arose in the conduct of the French government respecting the affairs of Switzerland. The oppression and rapacity of the directorial tyranny had been nowhere more conspicuous than in that country; but, since the establishment of the consular constitution, the general state of things had undergone, as in France, a great amelioration, more particularly in the proceedings which had taken place subsequent to the treaty of Luneville. Nevertheless the first consul was by no means voluntarily inclined to deviate from the policy of the directory in respect to the establishment of a republic, one and indivisible, under a central government; although, in consequence of the strong and energetic remonstrances of the democratic cantons, he had been induced to promise to the patriotic landamman, Aloys Reding, that they should be left to enjoy their ancient laws, and had actually adopted measures upon the whole highly favorable to their interests and wishes.

But the scene soon changed. The opposite party, six of whose most active leaders had been so lately introduced into the senate and council, were eagerly solicitous to re-establish their former plan of a government one and indivisible, dependent necessarily upon France, and destructive equally of the ancient federal rights and the peculiar privileges of the democratic cantons. Unfortunately a recent transaction of great moment, respecting which Aloys Reding, and the majority of the Swiss senate had given high offence to the first consul, strongly disposed him to favor the views of that party which was regarded as more immediately devoted to the interests of France.

At the moment when the first consul gave unequivocal assurances to Aloys Reding, that the rights of the democratic cantons should be maintained inviolate, he had secretly determined upon a measure extremely obnoxious in itself to the Swiss nation: but which he probably flattered himself that this, combined with his other promises and concessions, would render palatable. The object in contemplation of the first consul was no less than the absolute separation from the Helvetic body of the territory called the Valais, and the erection of it into an equal and independent republic.

The motive which induced the first consul to adopt this resolution has been stated in the preceding chapter, and the declaration of December (1801) to Aloys Reding, was followed almost immediately by an order dispatched to General Turreau, to penetrate at the head of a military force into the Valais. This order was forthwith executed without the least show or shadow of resistance, excepting an energetic remonstrance on the part of the Helvetic senate, in the absence of the landamman, dated December 28, 1801, charging General Turreau with "trampling under foot the rights of the Helvetic government, and the law of nations;" and demanding, in the name of justice, "the re-establishment of things on their former footing." General Turreau coolly replied, "that he could not accede to their request without departing from the orders he had received;" and he scrupled not to affirm, "that all he was doing was for the good of the country, and in concurrence with the wishes of the people." The senate also addressed their complaints, through the medium of the landamman, to the first consul in person, without producing the least effect; and it might easily be perceived, that on this favorite point his resolution was taken. A considerable number of communes, nevertheless, of the sovereign district of the Higher Valais, assembled to protest against all attempts at a separation; and they sent a deputation to Berne with this solemn instrument formally authenticated, and containing the declaration, "that they would yield to this separation only so long as they should be enchained and compelled to obey, and that they would constantly consider themselves as still constituting an integral part of the Helvetic republic."

The landamman, Aloys Reding, on his return from Paris, received the deputies of the Valais with distinguished marks of respect, such as he could not but know would prove highly offensive to the French government, and he hesitated not to conclude his reply to the deputation in the following terms: "Hope, however, with your magistrates, that the first consul of the French republic will not be insensible to the proofs of patriotic virtue with which you have filled the times that are recently past. Hope, that just and generous as well as great, he will respect your rights, rendered still more sacred by your misfortunes and your weakness." The landamman ordered the protest of the Valaisians to be sent and deposited in the archives of each canton, as a durable monument of the fidelity of the Valais to its ancient alliances; and he even commanded the Helvetic minister at Paris, M. Stapfer, to communicate to the first consul a copy of this monument. This step excited the extreme resentment of the cabinet of the Tuilleries; and M. Talleyrand, in the name of the first consul, reproached M. Stapfer "for the ostentation of receiving a few individuals calling themselves deputies from the Valais, and publicly admitting their complaints against the French authorities." And he went the length of concluding his note by declaring "that the first consul did not recognize any Helvetic confederation."

Two days afterwards (March 27) M. Stapfer returned a spirited answer to M. Talleyrand, in which he exclaimed, "is it not your government, citizen minister, that by the power of the bayonet has confounded the Valais as well as the Helvetic states in a common mass? Is it not by your warriors that at various times fire and sword have been carried into the Valais, to force its inhabitants to suffer themselves to be governed by laws common to all Helvetia? Is it not you, citizen minister, that signed the treaty of alliance between your nation and the Helvetic republic one and indivisible? Did not the Valais then form an essential part of that indivisible republic; and does not the treaty of Luneville consecrate the whole extent of our territory as it was at the conclusion of that treaty?"

Scarcely had the Landamman Reding set out on his journey to Schweitz, to pass the Easter vacation in the bosom of his family, ere the six persons introduced by the recommendation of the first consul into the senate, and still more recently into the executive council, re-assembled by night on the 17th of April, and virtually displacing the landamman and the rest of his party, erected themselves into a committee of public safety, tore the constitution in pieces, which had been agreed upon by them, and the other members of the provisional government, appointed notables to draw up a new plan, and the next day received a letter from Citizen Verninac, the consular minister in Switzerland, in which he congratulated them "on having used with so much judgment the plenitude of powers which the adjournment had concentrated in their hands." This ambassador also announced to them, that his government would no doubt see, with satisfaction, a measure which tended to consummate the reconciliation of parties; and that the people of Helvetia would surely do justice to the wisdom of their intentions, no less commendable in their object than in the choice of means."

M. Reding, in a letter addressed to the first consul, dated April 22, complained in very indignant terms of this violent and outrageous proceeding; formally denouncing the conduct held by M. Verninac upon the occasion. But to this communication no answer was ever returned, and the first consul, in a speech to the legislative body early in the month of May, declared "the Helvetic body, though recognized abroad, to be still agitated at home by factions wrestling for power. The government, faithful to its fundamental principles, ought not to exercise over an independent nation any other influence than that of advice. It still hoped that the voice of wisdom and moderation would be heard, and that the neighbouring powers to Helvetia would not be forced to interfere to suppress troubles, the continuance of which would menace their own tranquillity."

In a few weeks a new constitutional code was produced by the persons who had usurped the government, founded on principles analogous to those originally adopted by the convention held in the preceding month of September. The Helvetic republic was again pronounced one and indivisible; and almost the first act of the new administration was to recognize, and even to guarantee, the independence of the republic of the Valais. This being accomplished, the policy of the first consul seemed once more in some degree to waver, and without explicitly declaring any opinion as to the intrinsic merit of the new code, he merely expressed a wish to see it tried. But the democratic cantons, justly indignant at this triumph of fraud and violence, and inflexible in their hatred to all political innovation, rejected with scorn the new constitution; and even the aristocratic cantons, by whom it was accepted, scrupled not, as it is affirmed, loudly to declare, that their chief motive for that acceptance was to free the country from the presence of the French troops which still remained there.

Notwithstanding the public accession of the great cantons to the new constitutional code, the most decided symptoms of discontent and disaffection were apparent throughout the country, and actual disturbances broke out in various places, which were quickly repelled by the intervention of the French soldiery—no persons of credit or consequence choosing probably to encourage the spirit of resistance whilst the Helvetic government was supported by the military power of France.

Universal tranquillity being at length restored, the new government, confident in its own strength, ventured to solicit the first consul to withdraw his troops. To this unexpected request he readily and somewhat haughtily acceded. In a very short time, however, the Swiss rulers saw and repented their temerity. But, in reply to a subsequent application from the Helvetic senate, that the withdrawal of the troops might be postponed, M. Verninac was ordered (July 18) to declare to that body, the repugnance which the French government felt to alter its determination. "The first consul," said M. Verninac, "thinks, citizens, landamman and statthalters, that the government of Helvetia will at this day find in the virtues of the Helvetic people more accordance on the principles of political organization, and sufficient resources for maintaining public order and tranquillity. Such are the considerations that determined the first consul. You ought, therefore, to regard his resolution as a pledge of his confidence in the wisdom of the Helvetic people, and in the views of their government, as also of his repugnance to interfere in the domestic affairs of other nations."

The Helvetic government perceiving no remedy, announced in a proclamation dated at Berne, July 20, the approaching departure of the French troops; declaring "Helvetia to be again in possession of her independence, her national manners, and her ancient liberty, and exhorting the people to sacrifice all those regrets, and all those hopes and desires which were no longer compatible with the existing order of things." The democratic cantons inflexibly determined not to submit to this order, and at the same time dreading again to stain their native land with the blood of its bravest citizens, adopted on a sudden the idea of separating from the new Helvetic republic, and returning to the ancient and original confederation of the Waldstätten or forest states, which before the other cantons successively obtained admission, only

BOOK V. comprised Schweitz, Uri, and Underwald. But the diet of Berne, to whom they communicated their design, replied by notifying to them, "that the necessary orders had already been given to triumph over all resistance." And a proclamation was at the same time published by the executive government, containing the following terrific menace: "Cast your eyes on your devastated vallies. Behold the smoaking ruins of your habitations reduced to ashes. This was the work of the unworthy leader, to whose guidance you abandoned yourselves. The torch of discord which they are now labouring to kindle, glares on your destruction."

Transported with indignation, the citizens of the three cantons conjured M. Reding, in this extremity, again to place himself at their head, and with them defend the sacred territory of Helvetia. At the call of his country, this hero and patriot once more unsheathed his sword. The first act of the confederation of Waldstættten, now, after an interval of 500 years revived, was to promulgate a declaration addressed to the rest of Switzerland, in mild, and even pathetic terms. "We do not," said they, "separate because we are inimical or ill-disposed. We will even again unite with any central government that will recognize and guarantee our rights and our liberty; that will put an end to our fears for our holy religion; that will recognize the incontestable right of each canton to have within itself whatever government it may think proper. We will not oppress any one; we will neither attack the rights of others, nor poison their happiness. Be just and equitable then. Friends, neighbours, brothers, and confederates, consider our resolution in its true point of view, and you will agree that we have only acted in obedience to the most urgent necessity, and the most sacred of rights." The insurgents also wrote a letter to M. Talleyrand, stating their grievances, and respectfully soliciting the benevolence and powerful mediation of the first consul.

On the earliest intelligence of the measures resolved on by the three confederate cantons, the troops of the general government were put in motion; and, on the other hand, no sooner was it ascertained that those troops had marched from Berne, than the contiguous cantons of Zug, Glaris, Appenzell, and even the Grisons, sent deputies to Schweitz, to renew the ancient Helvetic oath, to perish all for one and one for all.

Scarcely had the vanguard of the regular troops set foot on the territory of the Waldstættten, than it was attacked and cut to pieces by the militia of Underwald. This was the signal of an almost universal insurrection. It was Zurich that first dared to shut her gates to the army of the government, which thereupon gave orders for the bombardment of that beautiful and populous city. But this barbarity served only to heighten the general rage and resentment. Receiving daily accessions of force, the insurgents subduing all opposition on the part of the government, entered Zurich in triumph about the middle of September, and immediately marched to Berne under the conduct of Aloys Reding, the acknowledged chief of the insurrection, and whose talents, both military and civil, more and more displayed themselves as occasions successively arose. Though apparently secure in a city surrounded with entrenchments and strongly garrisoned, the new landamman Dolder, with his colleagues in office, surrendered at the first summons, on the sole condition of a safeguard for themselves and the garrison to Fribourg, which place was likewise found in a short time untenable, and the troops of the Helvetic government, shattered by repeated attacks, at length took refuge in the Pays-de-Vaud, the only district where they still preserved a party.

In these circumstances, the principal members and adherents of the new constitution, now re-assembled at Lausanne, had no other resource than to invoke as suppliants rather than as friends or allies, the powerful assistance of France. On the other hand, the leaders of the insurgents established without delay a provisional government, and deputed a confidential person to Paris, who arrived in that city on the 28th of September, for the purpose of engaging the first consul to suffer the people of Switzerland to settle their affairs among themselves. At the same time they issued a proclamation, leaving the inhabitants of the several cantons at liberty to choose and regulate their local governments, and recommending a liberal and rational plan for the regulation of the Helvetic confederacy. The general diet also convened at this period by the patriots at Schweitz in a declaration dated September 30, professed in terms of good sense and moderation, "that, far from wishing completely to re-establish the ancient order of things, the most careful attention would be employed as well in the establishment of the general constitution as in the formation of particular institutions; and care would be taken neither to lose sight of the changes which had occurred in the nature of things, nor of the sentiments which these changes had given birth to." And in a short time the plan of a new federal constitution was agreed upon, which appeared perfectly conformable to the previous professions of this assembly.

The agent of the insurgents at Paris had instructions to address himself to the ministers residing there, of the principal powers of Europe, and to solicit their interference and assistance in the objects of his mission. At first he flattered himself, from the result of an interview with M. Talleyrand, that the first consul would put no obstacle in the way of any arrangement which the Swiss might agree upon among themselves. His surprise was therefore great when a proclamation issued the next day from St. Cloud, by the first consul, addressed to the inhabitants of Helvetia, in which he declared, "that it had been determined by him not to interfere farther in their affairs, but as he neither could nor ought to remain insensible to the misery of which they were the victims, he recalled his determination." "I will," added he, "be the mediator of your differences; but my mediation shall be efficacious, such as befits the great people in whose name I speak." The first consul then commanded all hostilities to cease, and required the senate and each canton to send deputies to Paris, to consult with him upon the means of restoring union and tranquillity, and conciliating all parties.

The confidential agent of the Swiss patriots, who had no objection to the interference of France in their own favor, but who now justly apprehended that it might be employed in behalf of the government over which they had obtained so complete a triumph, wrote in urgent terms to the Russian, Prussian, and Austrian ambassadors at Paris, soliciting them jointly to intercede with the first consul, in order to avert the impending evil; but not one of these ministers would design to admit him to an audience. From the English resident, Mr. Merry, he met, however, with a much more favorable reception. To this gentleman he stated, that he was not only as yet without a reply from any quarter, but had reason to fear that his prayers would not be listened to by the Austrian, Russian, and Prussian ministers. He therefore conjured the resident to transmit them to his Britannic majesty's government, "from whom alone his countrymen could have a hope of deriving any assistance in the terrible conflict which he knew they were determined to stand, and which would only cease by the extermination of every virtuous and brave man in the country." The agent then put into the hands of Mr. Merry a note, specifying the various grievances under which the confederated cantons suffered from "that colossal power, which was now," according to this representation, "about to overwhelm them." And imploring the aid and protection of Great Britain, he concluded with saying—"We have only men left us; the revolution, and spoliations without end, have exhausted our means—we are without arms, without ammunition, without stores, and without money to purchase them."

In consequence of the communication thus made to the English government, Lord Hawkesbury in a note to M. Otto, dated October 10, expressed in very proper language the sentiments of deep regret which had been excited in his majesty's mind by the address of the first consul to the Helvetic people. "His majesty," said this minister, "most sincerely laments the convulsions to which the Swiss cantons have for some time past been exposed: but he can consider their late exertions in no other light than as the lawful efforts of a brave and generous people to recover their antient laws and government, and to procure the re-establishment of a system, which experience has demonstrated not only to be favorable to the maintenance of their domestic happiness, but to be perfectly consistent with the tranquillity and security of other powers. With whatever regret his majesty may have perused the late proclamation of the French government, he is yet unwilling to believe that they will farther attempt to control that independent nation in the exercise of their undoubted rights."

Mr. Moore, a respectable and intelligent gentleman, was sent by the English government to Switzerland, in order to establish a communication with the chiefs of the insurrection; and he was instructed to state to them, "that his majesty entertained hopes that his representation to the French government might have the effect of inducing the first consul to abandon his intention of compelling the Swiss nation, by force, to renounce that system of government under which they had so long prospered, and to which they appeared to be almost unanimously anxious to return: In this event his majesty would feel himself bound to abstain from all interference on his part; it being his earnest desire that the Swiss nation should be left at liberty to regulate their own internal concerns without the interposition of any foreign power. If, however, contrary to his majesty's expectations, the French government should persist in the system of coercion announced in the proclamation of the first consul, Mr. Moore was directed to inform himself of the dispositions of the people at large, and also their means of defence; and if they were finally resolved at all hazards to resist the threatened attempt, then he was to communicate to the Swiss government in confidence, that either in the event of a French army having entered the country, or advancing for that purpose, his majesty would accede to their application for pecuniary succours."

On the 3d of October, General Rapp delivered the mandate of the first consul to the exiled senate, at Lausanne; which body expressed, by acclamation, its most lively gratitude for the consular interposition; and on the 6th the patriots of Berne were officially apprised of this proceeding. After a short consultation, they determined to refer the whole to the decision of the diet actually convened at Schweitz. But this assembly justly deemed it inexpedient to attempt any other means of opposition than remonstrances. These were comprised in an official appeal to the first consul (dated October 8th), representing the movements which had taken place in Switzerland, as resulting not from the spirit of party, but from a general sense of the rights and necessities of the Swiss nation—that, far from aiming at any violent innovation, the universal wish was peace, and a mild and equal government; and that they had no doubt of arriving at that essential object of social order, the moment their will and their efforts should cease to be fettered. “General first consul,” said they, “all Europe admires in you the supreme head of an immense power and empire, which, without doubt, according to your own views, will be directed to the good of humanity. Your magnanimity assures us, that you will not make use of it against a people who only desire what you have made them hope; and who only wish what they believe themselves authorised by yourself to do.” Such was the expiring effort of the Swiss patriots, who had made repeated and unavailing applications to the court of Vienna, which refused even to hold any correspondence with them.

On the 12th of October, the council of war also issued a declaration from Basle, expressly disclaiming any intention of resistance.—“Brothers, friends, confederates! Who among us could conceive the thought of measuring ourselves with the numerous and experienced armies of France? No, friends, no: we wish to await peaceably the determination of the first consul. Relying on our conduct, we dare to hope that the first consul of France, who has guaranteed our independence, and who has been deceived by false reports, will, as soon as he shall have been informed of the true state of things, take measures which will secure our honor, and the prosperity and independence of our country.” The troops of the insurgents were, conformably to this statement, in a short time disbanded; and on the 17th of October the senate resumed the possession of Berne.

The diet at Schweitz, more and more sensible how utterly unavailing it were to oppose force to force, declared (October 26) to General Ney, commander of the French army, amounting to 30,000 men, through the medium of Aloys Reding, their president, “that they had taken the resolution of delivering up their powers into the hands of their constituents as soon as the French troops should enter Switzerland, having never entertained the design of opposing them by force of arms. Now that the diet is positively informed that the cities of Basle and Berne are occupied by French troops, it no longer delays to dissolve itself; and at the same time they seize this opportunity of declaring to the general, that, agreeably to the instructions they have received from their constituents, which they consider themselves obliged to conform to, they cannot regard the Helvetic government as established, nor alienate the sacred right which their nation possesses, of forming a constitution for itself—a right which they inherited from their ancestors, and which was confirmed to them by the treaty of Luneville.”

Two days after this declaration, the diet of Schweitz dissolved itself, conformably to the intimation thus given.

On the 31st of October, Mr. Moore wrote to Lord Hawkesbury, from the city of Constance, that he had just received authentic intelligence of the submission of the diet of Switzerland assembled at Schweitz. In consequence of this information, permission was given to the English agent, who came just in time to witness the termination of the business, “to return to England as soon as it might suit his convenience.”

In the midst of these transactions, the French minister of foreign affairs addressed (Oct. 15.) a letter to M. de Cetto, resident on the part of the Elector of Bavaria at Paris, containing a plausible apology for the conduct of the first consul respecting Switzerland, and stating some material facts tending to his vindication. He asserted, “that it was not till blood had flowed, and Helvetia menaced with a general destruction, that the first consul had interposed his mediation. The continental powers adjoining Helvetia have not contemplated without apprehensions the external effects of a disorder, the focus of which was established in that country. In this state of affairs, humanity—the interest of France and of Europe—demanded that the first consul should desist from the determination he had made, not to interfere in the affairs of Switzerland. He has not, however, for one moment ceased to consider, that the most perfect independence ought to be the basis of her constitution. The right of establishing her own organization acquired by Helvetia, was one of the glorious results of the war which France had sustained against the most powerful armies of Europe, and of the treaties which had terminated it.” Speaking of the “turbulent emigrants,” by whose intrigues he insinuated that the late troubles had arisen, he said, “One might conceive that it will be those persons who will endeavour to spread the belief, that the Helvetic republic might be led by a spirit of imitation to establish with the first consul the relations which united him to the Italian republic; but this idea was as far from the expectation of the first consul, as it was opposite to all his determinations; and his formal intention was not to concur in the organization of Switzerland, but for the purpose of insuring to her an absolute independence.”

This was certainly professing a great deal too much. The “absolute independence of Switzerland” was not, and could not be, agreeable to the views of the first consul. In the proclamation of the senate and executive council, issued subsequent to their return to Berne (dated November 13th), after adverting to "the various accusations which a factious hatred had organised against them, they declared, in the face of these accusations, that not one family would be mentioned of whose ruin they had been the cause—ONE individual in whose person the right of citizen had been violated. It was, on the contrary, for having been too indulgent, too confident in the justice of their fellow-citizens; in one word, too little severe; that they had sustained these reverses. The insurrectional authorities ordered, in the course of four weeks, ten times more arrests, odious inquiries, and measures of rigour of all kinds, than they ordered in the course of their existence."

The constitution of 1802 was nevertheless manifestly not adapted to the genius of the Swiss nation. The small democratic cantons, the most warlike and the most active of the confederacy, were so passionately attached to their own forms of government, that no persuasion, no intimidation, no force, could long induce a submission to any other. Of this great truth the first consul appeared to have been, by experience, and the evidence of facts, at length, fully convinced. On the 10th of the following month (December, 1802), the deputies, fifty-six in number, from the eighteen cantons, constituting the consulta, being assembled at Paris, a letter was addressed to them from the first consul, declaring, "that he would fulfil the obligation he had contracted to re-establish tranquillity in Switzerland—and he relied upon the support of the Helvetic deputies. The three important points to be enforced and established at the present moment, were, first, Equality of rights between all the cantons—secondly, Complete renunciation of all family rights, and—thirdly, A federative organization for each canton. He told them, in plain terms, that the French and Italian republics can never suffer the establishment of a government in Switzerland which should be mediately or immediately opposite to the interests of France; that it was the duty of the French government to take care that no hostile system be formed in Switzerland, that open frontier of France. And in regard to the final settlement of disputes between themselves, he gave it as his opinion that no party ought to be triumphant."

On the 12th a deputation from the consulta were admitted to a personal audience of the first consul, at St. Cloud; and in the course of the conference, as reported by the deputation, he explained his intentions very fully and satisfactorily on the subject. "The more I learn," said the first consul, "of your country, the more I am convinced that it cannot with advantage have more than a single government;" but he admitted that "this government must be a federative one. By the representative system the democratic cantons would be subjected to the necessity of payments to which they were unaccustomed. The descendants of William Tell must know neither the restraint of chains, nor the payment of imposts. But, on the other hand, for Berne, and the other great cantons, the attempt at pure democracy were absurd. Your different cantons must of necessity have diversities of constitutional arrangement. With three leading exceptions, you must be re-established nearly in the same political order as before. The inequality of rights which subsisted among the old cantons—the relations between sovereign and subject states—with the prerogatives of the patrician families, must be abolished for ever. Under these corrections of the constitutions of the cantons, Switzerland may possess a federative government of effective vigour. Between two powers, in respect to which there is a balance of force and influence, you are safe. Preserve your neutrality, your laws, your political tranquillity, your good morals, and your fortune cannot but be happy. Confederate government enfeebles great states, but by concentrating, invigorates the energies of those which are small. Of your last constitution I cannot approve. A central government cannot be maintained among you without the presence of French troops. Your present government knows this by experience. Its members spoke the voice of patriotism, in consenting that the French troops should be withdrawn; but their prudence in that consent was not justified by the events which followed."

This discourse, so consolatory to the members of the consulta, and to all Switzerland, did not evaporate in mere words. In a few weeks the final act of mediation was promulgated by the first consul, founded entirely upon the principles inculcated in his speech.

Conformably to this mediatorial decree, the cantons were divided into three classes—the democratic, the aristocratic, and the new or additional cantons, viz. Argovia, the Leman, or Pays de Vaud, Turgovia, St. Gall, and the Tesin; in the latter of which classes the representative system was for the first time introduced into the cantonal governments. The two former classes were re-established with the excellent and salutary modifications suggested by the first consul, and which the diet of Schweiz also had, or professed to have, in contemplation. The diet was to assemble every year in turn, in one of the six great towns, Berne, Soleure, Basle, Zurich, Lucerne, and Fribourg. The canton in which it held its sitting was to be the directorial canton. The avoyer of this canton was to be the landamman of Switzerland. He was to have the charge of BOOK V. all diplomatic negotiations—he was to watch over all the laws and ordinances of the diet, and also those of the particular constitutions. The diet was to be composed of a deputy from each canton, who was to have full powers, limited only by his instructions. The deputies from the nineteen cantons, including the Grisons, to have thirty-five voices. The cantons of Berne, of Zurich, of Vaud, Argovia, St. Gall, and the Grisons, to have three voices each; those of Fribourg, Turgovia, Lucerne, and Tesin, two each; the others, one. The diet was to assemble every year on the 1st of June; it was to continue its sittings but one month: in that time it might conclude treaties of peace, of alliance, and of commerce, with foreign powers. On comparison, this plan of government will be found extremely analogous to that recently promulgated by the patriotic diet of Schweitz.

Owing to the steps taken by the English government, the first consul was induced to make these unexpected concessions, though mingled emotions of spleen and resentment pervaded his breast in consequence of this interference. Aloys Reding was elected landamman of the canton of Schweitz, the general assembly, or landsgeimen of which, in a public fetter, dated April 14, 1803, returned their grateful acknowledgments to the first consul, for "his act of mediation, which had restored to them," as they said, "their ancient constitution."

A treaty of peace, commerce, and alliance, was in the course of the summer concluded at Paris, between the first consul and the Sublime Porte, by which the free navigation of the Black Sea was permitted to the French flag, and all other advantages conferred, which were granted by the Turkish government to the most favored nations; but no stipulation was inserted by which the privileges conceded to the English were in any degree affected. On the other hand, the French government guaranteed to the Ottoman Porte the integrity of all its possessions.

Soon after the conclusion of this treaty, the first consul sent a powerful squadron to the coast of Barbary, which, casting anchor before the city of Algiers, compelled the dey, whose subjects had been guilty of many depredations upon the French commerce, to sign a convention in the highest degree honorable to the Gallic flag, and even to that of the Italian republic. In a letter written by the dey to the first consul, he said, "You require me to enter into terms of amity with the Italian republic. At your request I shall respect its flag equally as your own. To the same request from any other person, I would not for a million of piastres have agreed. You have refused the 200,000 piastres which I asked in compensation for the losses I had sustained on your account. Whether you give or withhold them, we shall equally remain in friendship. Your people are at liberty to come to the coral fishery as soon as they please. Your African company shall enjoy its old privileges. Should any future difference arise, write to me directly, and it shall be settled to your wishes. May God preserve you in health and glory!"

The business of Switzerland being at length disposed of, a fair prospect seemed once more to open, of establishing what should at least bear some faint semblance of amity between the two proud and jealous governments of Great Britain and France; and in the month of November, General Andreossi, who had long been nominated, on the part of the first consul, as ambassador to England, arrived in London, as Lord Whitworth did nearly at the same time on that of his Britannic majesty at Paris.

Thus terminated, for a short time, a long and interesting contest; and it is remarkable, that not one of the great objects, originally aimed at by any of the belligerent powers, was obtained by this appeal to arms. The pride of Bonaparte was indeed gratified, for Great Britain had now acknowledged his sway.

During this summer, Paris was visited by a great number of Englishmen of rank and distinction; among the rest by Mr. Fox, who was received by M. Bonaparte, and indeed by the whole French nation, with the highest marks of respect and honor.

CHAPTER XII.

French Affairs.—Legion of Honor instituted.—Joseph Bonaparte elected Grand Officer.—New Constitution of France.—Bonaparte offended with the Liberty of the Press.—Letter in the Moniteur on the Subject.

BONAPARTE, not satisfied with the sovereignty which the French nation had formally invested him with, under the name of first consul for life, resolved to secure his recent acquirement by a kind of order of nobility, which should support his despotism; and a new constitution which should, to its utmost latitude, give it countenance and sanction.

Accordingly, Roederer, one of the counsellors of state, proposed, in a florid harangue, on the 15th of May, the appointment of a legion of honor, as the best means of supporting the grandeur of the French nation, and of guarding its dominions; nor did he fail to remind them, that although peace was so recently concluded, it was far from improbable but that it might soon be violated.

The project for this new order was then read, the principal provisions of which were as follow: "The legion should be divided into fifteen cohorts, which were to be stationary in different quarters of the empire. Each cohort should consist of seven great officers, twenty commandants, thirty inferior officers, and 350 privates. Each great officer to receive 5000 francs per annum, during life; each commandant 2000 francs, each inferior officer 1000 francs, and each private 250: all for life. Every individual was to swear, on his admission to the legion, on his honor, that he would devote his life and services to the well-being of the republic; to the preservation of its territorial indivisibility; to the defence of its government, its laws, and the property by them consecrated; to oppose, by all the means which justice, reason, and the laws authorize, every undertaking which might tend to the restoration of the ancient forms and government, of the titles and privileges attached to them; and to exert his best and most strenuous efforts for the maintenance of the present order of things. All military men, who had received honorary distinctions of arms from the first consul, were members of the legion; or who had rendered essential service in the defence of liberty in the late war, either in the field or in the councils; and citizens who, by their abilities, knowledge, or talents, had contributed to establish the principles of the republic, or who had been eminent in the administration of justice, or who had by their virtues caused it to be respected, might be nominated candidates."

On the 12th of July following, a decree of the first consul established finally this singular establishment, consisting of nearly 6000 individuals, all of whom were bound, by solemn oath and their individual interest, to look up to the first consul, (who was declared de jure chief of the legion, and president of the great council of the administration of the order), as the soul and spring of all their movements; for whose security they were distributed, a titled and armed body of spies, throughout the whole of the empire; and on whose favor and protection was grounded their sole dependance. By this arrête the administration of their domains was finally arranged in the most minute manner; repositories were appointed for the archives of the order; the mode of electing the great officers of the order was ascertained; and finally, this decree was entered, with every usual ceremonial, into the bulletin of the laws.

On the 18th of July, Citizen Joseph Bonaparte was declared elected grand officer and member of the grand council of administration of the legion of honor, he having a plurality of votes; and thus was permanently organized a privileged order, for the avowed purpose of protecting absolute authority in the person of an individual, and confirmed to him for life; in that very capital, which had witnessed, but a few years before, the proscription of its nobles, and the murder of its sovereign, as the sole means by which these distinctions could be for ever abolished!

A constitution perfectly conformable to his will was all that now remained to be imposed by this fortunate usurper, on his abject and submissive subjects.

It was promulged on the third day after the consulate was confirmed to him for life, was finally determined and accepted in the course of a single sitting of his obsequious legislative body, and was immediately proclaimed to the people in the usual form of a senatus consultum.

It consisted of ten separate heads, the substance of which was as follows:—

"The consuls are for life: the first consul presents the names of the other two to the senate, who may reject the first and second so offered to them, but the third presentation must be accepted. The first consul may name his successor. Should he, however, not choose or neglect so to do, the second or third consuls nominate one, who may be rejected as above; but the third nomination is imperative. The succession must be declared within twenty-four hours after the death of the first consul. The first consul has the right of pardoning in all cases; of making war and peace; ratifies all treaties; nominates all inferior officers; can appoint forty members of the senate of his own absolute authority, which, when entire, consists but of 120; prescribes to them the only subjects they can deliberate upon; and has the power of introducing into every deliberative body a majority of his own creatures."

Thus arbitrarily and absolutely was vested a power in the first consul and his successors, more despotic than any European monarch had ever dreamed of assuming, much less of compelling his subjects to be parties to, by solemnly and gravely declaring, their slavery irrevocably established by laws of their own making.

It would be little worth while to comment further on the other provisions of this detestable code, at once the mockery and punishment of the abject wretches, who preferred the government of this unprincipled stranger to the mild and beneficent sway of the Bourbons.

The public papers and public men condemned the peace and its makers, and constantly abused the first consul in the vilest terms. The "Courrier de Londres," conducted by French emigrants, gave the greatest offence. It was circulated in La Vendée and other French provinces, and its design was to stir up a rebellion in favor of the old monarchy. Bonaparte was highly offended with the liberty of the English press, as will appear by the following article, taken from the Paris official paper, the Moniteur, of the 9th of August, 1802.

"The Times, which is said to be under ministerial inspection, is filled with perpetual invectives against France. Two of its four pages are every day employed in giving currency to the grossest calumnies. All that imagination can depict, that is low, vile, and base, is by that miserable paper attributed to the French government. What is its end? Who pays it? What does it wish to effect?

"A French journal, edited by some miserable emigrants, the remnant of the most impure, a vile refuse, without country, without honor, sullied with crimes which it is not in the power of any amnesty to wash away, outdoes even the Times.

"Eleven bishops, presided over by the atrocious Bishop of Arras, rebels to their country and to the church, have assembled in London. They print libels against the bishops and the French clergy; they injure the government of the pope, who has re-established the peace of the gospel among forty millions of Christians.

"The isle of Jersey is full of brigands, condemned to death by the tribunals for crimes committed subsequent to the peace; for assassinations, robberies, and the practices of an incendiary.

"The treaty of Amiens stipulates, that persons accused of crimes, of murder, for instance, shall be respectively delivered up. The assassins who are at Jersey are, on the contrary, received. They depart from thence unmolested, in fishing-boats, disembark on our coasts, assassinate the richest proprietors, and burn the stacks of corn and the barns.

"Georges wears openly at London his red ribband, as a recompense for the infernal machine which destroyed a part of Paris, and killed thirty women and children, or peaceable citizens. This special protection authorizes a belief, that if he had succeeded he would have been honored with the order of the garter.

"Let us make some reflections on this strange conduct of our neighbours.
